FOREWORD

TRADE CASES reports the full, official texts of all decisions rendered by the higher courts, state and federal, in cases involving antitrust, Federal Trade Commission, and other trade regulation law problems. In addition, many lower court decisions and attorney generals' opinions are included, either in full or in digest. For extra good measure, antitrust consent decrees are included in full text.

The Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts, the Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act are the principal federal laws interpreted and applied by these decisions. The state fair trade acts (involving resale price maintenance), unfair practices act (involving sales below cost), and price discrimination and basic antitrust laws are the state laws concerned in these cases.

This volume, cited 1948-1949 TRADE CASES, contains exact reproductions of the decisions as reported in the "'48-'51 Court Decisions" volume of the CCH Trade Regulation Reports from January 1948 through December 1949.

Decisions are designated by the identical paragraph numbers under which they originally appeared in the Trade Regulation Reports, thus facilitating direct and cross reference.

Each decision is preceded by: (a) the full name of the case; (b) the name of the court, the docket number, and the date of the decision; (c) an accurate, succinct and informative headnote, with emphasis on the main issue; (d) a reference to all paragraphs in the compilations of the Ninth Edition of the Trade Regulation Reports which are pertinent to the subject matter of the case; and (e) the names of attorneys representing the litigants, whenever available.

Effective indexing is provided to afford quick and convenient contact with any case by reference to its paragraph number. The indexing system includes:

(a) Table of Cases (blue pages). Alphabetical, with complete listings under plaintiffs' names and cross references under defendants' names. The official and national reporter citations are included when available.

(b) Indexes (yellow pages). Complete and detailed. In addition to the General Topical Index, covering all of the decisions in the volume, special indexes are provided to:

- (i) Antitrust Consent Decrees
- (ii) Attorney Generals' Opinions
- (iii) Federal Trade Commission Cases
- (iv) Robinson-Patman Act Cases
- (v) State Fair Trade Act Cases
- (vi) State Unfair Practices Act Cases

This thorough indexing affords instant contact with any case (a) by case name, and (b) by subject matter.

In planning and producing TRADE CASES, the aim of the publishers throughout is to make this volume of the utmost utility in the important and extensive field of trade regulation. The user's time is saved by the concentration on the subject of trade regulation (no time is lost leafing through irrelevant cases); by the single reporting medium for courts of all jurisdictions; and by the explanatory headnotes—clearly stated captions written by specialists in trade regulation law.

COURT DECISIONS

[¶ 62,202] Consumers Home Equipment Co., Avery B. Chereton and E. Mallinson v. Federal Trade Commission.

Harry H. Chereton v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. No. 10298, 10299. Decided December 22, 1947.

On petitions to review a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

FTC Order Affirmed—Relevancy of Evidence.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting petitioners, who were engaged in the sale and distribution of silverware, blankets, etc., direct to the purchasing public through house to house canvassers, and usually upon an installment basis, from allowing their salesmen to exhibit to purchasers samples of merchandise of a kind and quality different from that actually delivered, and representing that the merchandise offered for sale was limited in quantity or was offered at a special sales price which was a saving over prices charged by local retail stores, is affirmed. The fact that a number of the transactions of which evidence was given occurred in Michigan, the petitioners' state of residence, does not lessen the relevancy of the evidence as to the interstate practices shown to exist.

Before ALLEN, MCALLISTER and MILLER, Circuit Judges.

Affirming Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 5174.

[Nature of Action]

Per Curiam: Petitioners were found by the Federal Trade Commission to have committed and used unfair and deceptive acts and practices in commerce in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C., § 45. Petitioner Consumers Home Equipment Company is a Michigan corporation having branches in seven states of the United States, and individual petitioners were at the time of the hearing officers and directors of the corporation who formulate and control its policies and practices. The corporate business consists of the sale and distribution of silverware, blankets, mattresses, radios, and other articles of merchandise direct to the purchasing public through house to house canvassers, and usually upon an installment basis. It was found that in the conduct of their business and for the purpose of inducing purchases the petitioners, through their salesmen, had made use in interstate commerce of a sales plan employing false representations and fraudulent schemes. A cease and desist order was issued, commanding all of the petitioners to desist from the illegal practices specified. The findings and the cease and desist order were carefully limited by the Commission to those practices where the evidence showed were performed in interstate, as well as intrastate commerce.

[Findings Sustained by Record]

The findings of the Commission are amply sustained by the record, and hence are binding upon this court. Keasbey & Mattison Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 159 Fed. (2d) 940 (C. C. A. 6). Petitioner corporation contracts with purchasers in different states, delivers goods to different states, and receives payment for the articles sold. It clearly engages in interstate commerce. Federal Trade Commission v. Bunte Bros., Inc., 312 U. S. 349, relied upon by petitioners, presents a totally different fact situation, and has no bearing here. Cf. Brewer & Sons v. Federal Trade Commission, 158 Fed. (2d) 74, 79 (C. C. A. 6). As typical of the deceptive practices engaged in, the salesmen were shown to have exhibited to purchasers samples of merchandise of a kind and quality different from that actually delivered. They represented that the merchandise offered for sale was limited in quantity or was offered at a special sale price which was a saving over prices charged by local retail stores. These representations were shown in a number of instances to be false. When an objection was made to the quality of the merchandise received, the petitioners attempted to force the purchaser to accept the merchandise delivered, by threatening suit or refusing to return the down-payments theretofore made. The numerous letters concerning these transactions received by better business bureaus in Detroit and Toledo, and the petitioners' answers thereto, are evidence that petitioners must have had knowledge of these unfair and deceptive practices.

[Sufficiency of Evidence]

The fact that a number of the transactions of which evidence was given occurred in Michigan, the corporation's state of residence, does not lessen the relevancy of the evidence as to the interstate practices shown to exist. The testimony as to the individual transactions was evidence of the merchandising plan and policy of petitioner Consumer Home Equipment Company, and shows the course of business engaged in by its agents and solicitors. Hills Bros. v. Federal Trade Commission, 9 Fed. (2d) 481 (C. C. A. 9), cert. denied, 270 U. S. 662. Since petitioner Harry H. Chereton, during all the period involved, was an officer and director of the corporation, responsible for its policies and practices, the order properly applies to him as well as to other officers and directors. Sebrone Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 135 Fed. (2d) 676 (C. C. A. 7).

[Order Affirmed]

The order to cease and desist is affirmed, and the petitioners are ordered to comply therewith.

[¶ 62,203] Opinion of the Attorney General of Wisconsin.

Addressed to Joseph E. Tierney, First Deputy District Attorney, Milwaukee County, by John E. Martin, Attorney General, October 8, 1947.

Wisconsin Unfair Sales Act

Unfair Sales—Contingent Gift Prohibited—Effect of Amendment.—A gift of an item of merchandise by a wholesaler or retailer as defined in the Wisconsin Unfair Sales Act, as amended, when such gift is made contingent upon the purchase of any other item of merchandise, is prohibited.

See the Wisconsin Unfair Sales Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8948.

[Request for Interpretation]

We have your request for an interpretation of sec. 100.30 (2), (3), Wisconsin statutes, as amended by ch. 323, L. 1947.

Sec. 100.30 (2) (j), Stats. 1945, provided as follows:

"When one or more items are advertised, offered for sale, or sold with one or more other items at a combined price, or are advertised, offered as a gift, or given with the sale of one or more other items, each and all of said items shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be advertised, offered for sale, or sold, and the price of each item named shall be governed by the provisions of paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2) hereof."

Sec. 100.30 (3), Stats. 1945, provided as follows:

"Any advertising, offer to sell, or sale of any merchandise either by retailers or wholesalers, at less than cost as defined in this section, with the intent, or effect of inducing the purchase of other merchandise or of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor, impairs and prevents fair competition, injures public welfare, and is unfair competition and contrary to public policy and the policy of this section."

Sec. 2, ch. 323, L. 1947, is worded as follows:

> "100.30 (2) (j) When one or more items are advertised, offered for sale * * * sold or * * * offered as a gift, or given tied in or combined with the sale of one or more other items * * * the price of each item * * * shall be * * * subject to the requirements of subsection (2) (a) or (b) hereof."

Sec. 2, ch. 323, L. 1947, is worded as follows:

> "(3) Any advertising, offer to sell, or sale of any item of merchandise either by retailers or wholesalers, at less than cost as defined in this section * * * and any advertising, offer to give, or gift of any item of merchandise contingent upon the sale of any other item of merchandise, with the intent, or effect of inducing the purchase of other merchandise or of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor, impairs and prevents fair competition, injures public welfare, and is unfair competition and contrary to public policy and the policy of this section."

[Question]

Your question is whether the amendments set forth above now make it a violation for a merchant to give away merchandise in combination with other merchandise which is sold to the purchaser. In other words, we assume that the gift is contingent upon the sale.

[Interpretation Prior to Amendment]

On April 8, 1947, the Supreme Court in State ex rel. Heath v. Tankar Gas, Inc., 250 Wis. 218, 26 N. W. 2d 647 considered sec. 100.30 as it stood before the amendment referred to above. The court concluded that sec. 100.30 (2) (j) did not require that each item of merchandise offered for sale had to be offered at a price which would conform to the formula set forth in subsec. (2) (a). The court held that the total price for which merchandise was sold at the combined price, or the sale of merchandise with a gift added, must measure up to the aggregate cost of the goods as determined by the statutory formula.

The court stressed the fact that in sec. 100.30 (3) the term "item" was not used and the reference in the 1945 statutes was to the sale of any merchandise. 250 Wis. 218, 222.

Ch. 323, L. 1947 amends sec. 100.30 (3) by adding the words "item of" in the first line and then adds the following language: "and any advertising, offer to give, or gift of any item of merchandise contingent upon the sale of any other item of merchandise." It is apparent that the words "item of" were deliberately inserted before the word "merchandise." It is also quite apparent that subsec. (3) now specifically refers to gifts of any item of merchandise contingent upon the sale of another item of merchandise. Sec. 100.30 (2) (j) as amended by ch. 323, L. 1947, now provides that each item "given tied in or combined with the sale" of one or more other items shall be subject to the price requirements of subsec. (2) (a) or (b).

[Legislative History of Revision]

On the face of it, it is apparent that the legislature was aiming at the result reached in the Tankar case. We have traced the legislative history of the revision and we will outline it herewith:

1. On March 25, 1947, Bill No. 407 S. was introduced.

This amended sec. 100.21 and 100.30 (4). The first section referred to has nothing to do with our problem and the amendment to subsec. (4) of sec. 100.30 was only for the purpose of increasing the penalties for violation.

2. On April 8, 1947, the Supreme Court handed down the opinion in the Tankar case.

3. On April 16, 1947, a request was received by the legislative reference library for an amendment of Bill 407, S. The draftsman's notes contain the following comment:

> "To take care of State v. Tanker Gas Company (April 8, 1947)"

His notes also contained the following comment:

> "Provide:
> 1. Violation to offer as gift contingent upon purchase.
> 2. Each item in combination when priced separately must sell 6 per cent over cost."

4. On April 17, a proposed draft of amendment 1, S. was delivered and on the same day offered by Senator Busby. The amendment made no changes whatever in the original Bill No. 407, S. but rather added amendments of subsec. (2) (j) and (3) of sec. 100.30.

5. On April 23, 1947, substitute amendment No. 1, S. to Bill 407, S. was offered by the Committee on Labor and Management. This substitute amendment made some changes in the revision of subsec. (4) of sec. 100.30, but only to the extent of reducing the amount of the fines to be levied for violation. The substitute amendment was identical with the first amendment insofar as subsec. (2) (j) is concerned. However, the substitute amendment added language to subsec. (3) of sec. 100.30—language which was not contained in amendment 1, S. This briefly is the history of the amendment of the statute.

[Contingent Gifts Prohibited]

There is no question what the legislature intended to do. The only question is whether they used apt language to accomplish the purpose. Considering the amendment of subsec. (2) (j) of 100.30 alone, one might conclude that the changes made were not sufficient to escape the interpretation made by the court in the Tankar case. However, when we consider the amendment to subsec. (3) of sec. 100.30 there can be little doubt that the legislature was aiming squarely at gifts of any items of merchandise contingent upon the sale of some other item of merchandise. Such contingent gifts are now defined as unfair competition and contrary to the policy of this statute.

The legislature certainly intended to do something or it would not have gone to the lengths it did in amending this statute. If the language actually used will permit of an interpretation that will effectuate the clearly apparent legislative intent, we are justified in adopting such construction. As we have pointed out above, the language of subsec. (2) (j) is not such as unmistakably prohibits gifts. We must consider, however, that the legislature perhaps did not intend to prohibit an outright gift of merchandise, but sought only to prohibit gifts that were tied in, combined with, or contingent upon sales of other merchandise. For example, the statute clearly does not prohibit a merchant from giving away a can of corn or a bar of soap if he desires to do so. We believe it does prohibit, however, the offer of a gift of a bar of soap contingent upon the customer purchasing 3 bars of the same kind or a different kind of soap.

[Applies to Wholesalers and Retailers]

The interpretation set forth above applies to wholesalers and retailers as defined in subsec. (2) of sec. 100.30. It is our conclusion, therefore, that a gift of merchandise contingent upon a purchase of other merchandise, is now prohibited.

[¶ 62,204] Cargill, Incorporated v. The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, et al.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, No. 9426. December 23, 1947.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Conspiracy—Order Stopping Trading—Valid Measure for Price Fixing.—A judgment dismissing a complaint alleging a conspiracy to restrain trade by entering an order stoping trading in grain futures is affirmed. The order was made pursuant to lawful authority to terminate trading and liquidate contracts, and did not constitute illegal price fixing or restraint of commerce.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.339 and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2024.19.

Affirming the judgment of the District Court, reported at '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp., ¶ 57,581.

Before EVANS and MINTON, Circuit Judges, and LINDLEY, District Judge.

[Nature of Action]

MINTON, Circuit Judge: The District Court sustained a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's amended and supplemental complaint, and the plaintiff has appealed. These material facts are alleged.

The plaintiff, a Delaware corporation, is a large dealer in grain. It is not a member of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, and its contracts herein referred to were handled through a member of the Board. The defendant Chicago Board of Trade, herein referred to as the Board, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Illinois. The defendant Board of Trade Clearing Corporation, herein referred to as Clearing, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Delaware and is an affiliate of the Board. The individual defendants are either officers or directors of the Board or of Clearing and as such officers and directors acted for and on behalf of the Board and Clearing in the actions hereinafter complained of.

The plaintiff in its business enters into futures contracts on the Board. It acquires such contracts in what are known as hedging operations and relies upon the defendants to maintain an orderly market in grain futures under conditions that will reflect the general value of grain. The Board and Clearing operate under certain rules, regulations, and by-laws by which Clearing becomes substituted as a seller to the buyer and a buyer to the seller upon all contracts for future delivery. All contracts of members for nonmembers are cleared through Clearing and are subject to the charter, by-laws, and regulations of Clearing. Unless otherwise provided, when a commodity is sold for delivery in any month, delivery may be made by the seller on any business day he elects in the month, and if not previously delivered, then delivery must be made on the last business day of the month. The Board has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a contract market for grains, pursuant to the provisions of the Commodity Exchange Act.[1]

[Board Rules]

The Board had in existence at all times mentioned in the amended and supplemental complaint a Rule 251, which reads as follows:

"Rule 251. Emergencies.—The Board shall have power to declare any day to be a holiday or to close the Exchange or to stop trading in any security or in any of the future contracts of any commodity, by reason of any emergency or otherwise, and to make such Regulations in regard to deliveries and settlement prices as it may deem proper because thereof. All Exchange contracts shall be subject to the exercise by the Clearing House of the powers reserved to the Clearing House by its Charter, By-Laws, and Resolutions."

[Notice of Price Increases]

On and prior to May 8, 1946, the Office of Price Administration had maintained a ceiling on grains. On that date, the Government authorities notified the Board that effective May 13, 1946, the ceiling prices on grains would be substantially raised. The Government authorities at the time requested and recommended to the Board that all futures contracts open at the close of business on May 11 be settled at the then ceiling. On and prior to May 12, 1946, the plaintiff had entered into contracts of purchase for the delivery of corn in May, July, and September of 1946; oats in December, 1946; wheat in September and December, 1946; and rye in September, 1946.

[Conspiracy Alleged]

It is alleged that upon receipt of the notification from the Government authorities of the impending price increases, the defendants immediately entered into a conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade and commerce in grain and grain futures, in violation of the Sherman Act.[2] The plaintiff brings this civil action as provided in Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act.[3]

The acts of the defendants, complained of as parts of the conspiracy and combination in violation of the Sherman Act and in furtherance thereof, are the enactments of certain regulations by the Board and the effectuation thereof by Clearing. On May 12, 1946, the Board, acting under Emergency Rule 251, promulgated Regulation 1894 which forbade trading in futures contracts outstanding at the close of the business day May 11, except for purposes of liquidation, and directed that such liquidation take place at or below the old ceiling prices, and without consideration of the increased ceiling prices in determining penalties on defaults of such futures contracts. The plaintiff thereupon filed its first complaint in this action based upon the deprivation of benefits due it on its futures contracts of purchase.

On May 31, the Board, again acting under Rule 251, enacted its Regulations 1897 and 1898 which repealed Regulation 1894 by directing settlement of the now defaulted May futures contracts at the new ceilings and by reinstating the trading in futures contracts outstanding as of June 1 at or below the new ceiling prices. On June 4, the defendants caused Clearing to notify all its members that other parties were contesting the validity of Regulations 1897 and 1898, and to warn them that they would have to return monies paid thereunder if the Regulations were adjudged invalid. At this time, the plaintiff was entitled to receive from Clearing large sums of money under its May futures contracts, and also, by virtue of the rising prices, under its July, September, and December contracts. These sums, it is alleged, have not been fully paid.

On June 13, 1946, the Board enacted its Regulation 1899 which stopped as of that day all trading in futures contracts of the plaintiff and of others similarly situated and ordered Clearing to settle such contracts as of the closing exchange prices on that day. This regulation has been carried into effect, and the plaintiff allegedly has been deprived of the benefits of its contracts, the possible profits having been greatly increased by the lapse of the O. P. A. ceilings on grain on June 30, 1946.

After setting forth grounds for equity jurisdiction, the complaint seeks judgment against the defendants and each of them for treble damages in the sum of $10,624,867.50, plus costs and attorneys' fees, and injunctions against their price-fixing and interference with free and open trading.

The sole charge of this amended and supplemental complaint, then, is that the defendants' actions in promulgating and enforcing these regulations were a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The regulations of the Board are not challenged except as they are alleged to have violated the Sherman Act.

[Regulations Held Binding]

We have held in Daniel et al. v. The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago et al., this day decided, that these regulations were valid and binding upon members of the contract market. They are likewise binding upon one who, like the plaintiff, is not a member but trades on the market through members. W. A. Thomson v. Alexander W. Thomson et al., 315 Ill. 521, 530, 146 N. E. 451, 455.

As we understand the plaintiff, as far as its position is concerned it makes no difference whether the Board's regulations are valid or invalid. The plaintiff contends that they amount to price-fixing and are in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act.

The defendant Board is the largest grain market in the world. When the Office of Price Administration announced the increases in ceiling prices on grains, a crisis and an emergency confronted the Board, and the Board acted under Rule 251, applicable to emergencies. The Board owed a duty to the public and to all parties trading upon the market to act in the utmost good faith in the general interest. As we held in Daniel et al. v. The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago et al., supra, if the defendants acted in good faith, they were authorized by the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the Board and Clearing, which were binding upon the plaintiff as a trader in the market, to act for both parties to the transactions in situations involving the termination of trade in certain futures contracts and the liquidation thereof. This was not price-fixing. It was the establishment of a measure of damages for the liquidation of the contracts terminated and in which there was to be no further trading. Thereafter, these contracts were not in the market for anything but settlement or liquidation upon the terms set forth in the regulations. There was no trading in these contracts at the liquidation figure, but a clearing of the way for trading. Here we have the settlement of liquidation of contracts which the parties by their duly authorized agents have terminated. The settlement is upon terms that the parties through their agents have agreed upon. Such termination and settlement is not price-fixing any more than any termination and settlement of contractual obligations by mutual agreement of the parties is price-fixing. No other trading on the market was affected by the settlement of these contracts.

[No Restraint of Trade]

Neither is the termination and settlement an illegal restraint of commerce. Almost every act of an agency such as the Board and Clearing affects or restrains commerce in some respect, but such restraints as may be within the rule of reason are not unlawful. Board of Trade of the City of Chicago et al. v. United States, 246 U. S. 231, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683. The acts of the defendants rather than being in restraint of commerce, were in aid of commerce in facilitating future trading on the market. Only the bad faith of the defendants in the discharge of their duties under the emergency in which they purported to act can vitiate the defendants' action. No such claim of bad faith is made in this case.

[No Price Fixing]

We have been cited no case which holds that such action as is here charged to the defendants amounts to price-fixing. We have been cited cases such as United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., In. et al., 310 U. S. 150, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129, and United States v. Trenton Potteries Company et al., 273 U. S. 392, 47 S. Ct. 377, 71 L. Ed. 700. These cases do not define and delineate what is price-fixing. They go only to the proposition that if there is price-fixing, it is per se an unreasonable restraint of trade. We, of course, would so hold here if we thought the defendants' acts were price-fixing. We are of the opinion that such acts do not constitute price-fixing. There was no trading in any grain commodity on the market maintained by the defendant Board as a result of the Board's action taken with respect to the plaintiff's futures contracts. Trading on these contracts was stopped and liquidation was provided for under the rules, regulations, and by-laws which, in the absence of bad faith amounting to fraud, bound all the parties.

[Judgment Affirmed]

The District Court properly sustained a motion to dismiss, and the judgment is affirmed.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Conspiracy—Order Stopping Trading—Valid Measure for Price Fixing.—A judgment dismissing an amended complaint alleging a conspiracy to restrain trade by stopping trading in grain futures is affirmed on the authority of Cargill, Incorporated v. The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, et al., reported at ¶ 62,204, supra.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.339, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2024.19.

Before EVANS and MINTON, Circuit Judges, and LINDLEY, District Judge.

MINTON, Circuit Judge: In this case an amended complaint was dismissed on motion. From judgment of dismissal the plaintiff has appealed.

The allegations of the amended complaint parallel the allegations in Cargill, Incorporated, v. The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago et al., this day decided, although in a more concise form. The averments of the plaintiff's amended complaint charge a violation of the Sherman Act,[1] just as in the Cargill case. On the authority of that case, the judgment in this case is affirmed.

In the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. No. 38660. December 15, 1947.

Appeal from the Sixth Judicial District Court, Parish of Madison.

Louisiana Unfair Sales Act

Sales Below Cost—Constitutionality of Statute—Jurisdiction of Court.—In a suit for an injunction to restrain violations of the Louisiana Unfair Sales Act, the defense of unconstitutionality of the Act was raised. On appeal by defendant from a judgment for plaintiff, it is held that the Supreme Court does not have appellate jurisdiction, inasmuch as (1) this is not a case wherein a law of the state has been declared unconstitutional, and (2) the jurisdictional amount is not shown to be involved, the loss claimed being based on conjecture as to future events.

See the Louisiana Unfair Sales Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8328.

[Nature of Action]

HAWTHORNE, J.: Plaintiff, Louisiana Wholesale Distributors Association, Inc., a non-profit corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state, instituted this injunction suit against I. Rosenzweig as the sole owner and operator of a large retail store known as the Pic-Kwickly Grocery, located in the City of Tallulah, Louisiana.

[Violations Alleged]

In this petition plaintiff alleged that on April 12, 1947, and subsequent thereto defendant caused numerous pamphlets to be circulated in Tallulah to the effect that at certain times he would sell certain popular brands of cigarettes at $1.75 per carton, tax included, and 18¢ per package, tax included; that on April 12, 1947, he did actually sell for said prices cigarettes to six persons named in the petition; that the advertisement and sales consummated by defendant were in direct contravention of law and particularly in violation of the express provisions of the Louisiana Unfair Sales Act, Act 338 of 1940, as amended by Act 79 of 1942 and subsequently by Act 256 of 1946; that under the terms and conditions of said act, it is unlawful for any person, outside the City of New Orleans, to sell these cigarettes at less than $2.00 per carton or 20¢ per package. The petition further alleged that, under the terms and conditions of the act, petitioner is entitled to an injunction permanently restraining, prohibiting, and enjoining the defendant from continuing to advertise or sell said commodities in violation of the act.

Petitioner then prayed for the usual citation, and, after regular proceedings had, for a permanent writ of injunction forever restraining, prohibiting, and enjoining the defendant from advertising and selling the aforesaid commodities in violation of the law.

[Defense of Unconstitutionality]

Answering this petition, defendant admitted all the material allegations of fact, but denied that the plaintiff was entitled to injunctive relief for the reason that the said act is wholly unconstitutional in that it violates the due process and the equal protection of the laws provisions of the Constitutions of the United States and this state, and, further, that the act is a price-fixing statute and class legislation and precludes defendant from freely contracting with regard to the property and things which he owns.

[Judgment Appealed]

After trial in the lower court, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, decreeing the act in question to be constitutional and granting unto plaintiff the injunctive relief prayed for. From this judgment defendant has appealed to this court.

[No Appellate Jurisdiction]

We shall not discuss the merits of this case, since we take cognizance ex proprio motu of the fact that we do not have appellate jurisdiction of this case. Dupey v. Greffin's Executor et al., 1 Mart. (N. S.) 198; Lafon's Executors v. Lafon, 1 Mart. (N. S.) 703; Kerr v. Kerr et al., 14 La. 177; Foundation Finance Co., Inc., v. Robbins et al., 144 So. 293 (La. App.).

[Louisiana Constitution]

Article VII, Section 10, of the Louisiana Constitution of 1921 defines the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases involving constitutional questions thus:

"It shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases wherein the constitutionality or legality of any tax, local improvement assessment, toll or impost levied by the State, or by any parish, municipality, board, or subdivision of the State is contested, or where the legality, or constitutionality of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed by a parish, municipal corporation, board, or subdivision of the State shall be in contest whatever may be the amount thereof, and in all cases wherein an ordinance of a parish, municipal corporation, board, or subdivision of the State, or a law of this State has been declared unconstitutional. * * *" (Italics ours.)

This case is not a contest over the constitutionality or legality of any tax, local improvement assessment, etc., imposed by the state or any subdivision thereof, nor is it a contest over the legality or constitutionality of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed by the state or any subdivision thereof, nor is it a case wherein a law of this state has been declared unconstitutional. On the contrary, it is a suit in which plaintiff seeks an injunction prohibiting the defendant from violating the terms and provisions of Act 338 of 1940, as amended. The only defense, that is, that the statute is unconstitutional, the lower court concluded was without merit in holding that the statute was constitutional.

An examination in its entirety of Article VII, Section 10, of the Louisiana Constitution discloses that this is not a case in which this court is given appellate jurisdiction, and for this reason this court is without such jurisdiction.

[Jurisdictional Amount Lacking]

After this case was argued before this court and submitted for decision, the court took cognizance of the fact that there was a serious doubt that it has appellate jurisdiction. Accordingly we requested counsel to file briefs on the question, and counsel for both sides have complied, urging that we have jurisdiction of the case under Article VII, Section 10, of the Louisiana Constitution of 1921, because it is a civil suit where the amount in dispute exceeds $2000.00. An affidavit also was filed on behalf of the appellee to the effect that the amount involved in the case exceeds $2000.00. It is alleged in the affidavit:

"In the event that this injunction had not been obtained from the District Court, it would have become necessary for retail outlets to cut their price in order to meet this 'loss-leader' practice, which would, in a period of less than twenty-four hours, cause the members of plaintiff corporation to lose a sum in excess of $2000.00. * * *

"That the Louisiana Wholesale Distributors Assn., Inc., collects an excess of $10,000.00 per year from its members as dues and this membership could not afford to continue paying said dues to said organization where the use of 'loss-leader' practices as engaged in by the defendant herein are continuous, * * * that said corporation under such circumstances would suffer a decided loss in dues in excess of the jurisdictional minimum of $2000.00."

[Claim Based on Conjecture]

We do not in any way question the good faith of the affiant in this affidavit, but it is obvious that the loss claimed is based on conjecture as to future events, and conclusions of the affiant from such conjecture. Undoubtedly such presumptions cannot inject an "amount in dispute or * * * fund to be distributed" in excess of $2000.00 into this injunction proceeding.

[Case Ordered Transferred]

For the reasons assigned, this case is ordered transferred to the Court of Appeal, Second Circuit, provided that the record be filed in that court within 30 days from the date on which this decree shall become final; otherwise the appeal shall be dismissed. The appellant is to pay the costs of appeal to the Supreme Court; all other costs shall abide final disposition of the case.

In the United States District Court for the District of Delaware. Civil Action No. 259. October 29, 1947.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent License—Reasonable Royalties—Motion to Furnish Bond.—An action charging misuse of patents in violation of the Sherman Act resulted in a judgment requiring defendants to grant licenses at reasonable royalties, in which jurisdiction was retained to enforce compliance. The motion of defendants to require a competitor, which has intervened for determination of the terms and conditions on which it should be granted a license, to furnish bond to insure payment of royalties, is denied. Defendant cannot require intervener to take a license which covers all of defendant's patents. Intervener is given the right to take a license under the four patents which it seeks. The court will then fix a reasonable royalty.

C. Edward Duffy (of Logan, Duffy & Boggs), of Wilmington, Del., Charles M. McKnight, of Tulsa, Oklahoma, Robert F. Davis and Richard K. Stevens (of Stevens, Davis & Miller), of Washington, D. C., for Magee-Hale Park-O-Meter Company, intervener.

[Syllabus]

The present matter arises on motion of the Vehicular defendants to require Magee-Hale Park-O-Meter Company to furnish a bond of $250,000 to insure the payment to Vehicular of royalties when this court determines what a reasonable royalty will be. See 7 F. R. D. 336. Magee-Hale has retaliated with seven of its own motions. They are (1) to dismiss Vehicular's counterclaim in answer to Magee-Hale's petition of intervention; (2) a motion for summary judgment declaring Vehicular's patents invalid; (3) to dismiss Vehicular's "alternative counterclaim"; (4) to require Vehicular to designate what claims of its patents are alleged to be infringed; (5) to dismiss Vehicular's counterclaims because of "unclean hands"; (6) leave to charge Vehicular with "unfair and damaging actions" because it has started a patent infringement suit against Magee-Hale; and (7) for an order requiring Vehicular to file a $100,000 bond to protect Magee-Hale for damages it is suffering because Vehicular has brought suit for infringement.

[Nature of Action]

Leahy, District Judge: Out of the several varieties of motions there appear basic issues. Vehicular is willing to give Magee-Hale a license but it must be on the same terms as govern its other licensees; i. e., Magee-Hale must take a license involving over 25 patents and covering about 5 pending applications for parking meters and parts thereof, at a fixed percentage of royalty common to all licensees. Magee-Hale first took the position that out of Vehicular's group of patents it was merely interested in Nos. 2,118,318; 2,168,302; 2,198,422; and 2,284,221; and it petitioned the court to fix a reasonable royalty for these patents and not the remainder. After the parties would adduce evidence on this question and the court would decide what a reasonable royalty would be, Magee-Hale stated it wished to reserve to itself the right to refuse to take any license on the basis fixed by the court; but it would thereafter take its chances on defending an infringement suit by Vehicular. After oral argument and by way of briefs, Magee-Hale now states it wants to take a license under the four patents mentioned, have the court determine a reasonable royalty which Magee-Hale will be bound to accept, but under three conditions (1) the acceptance of the license will not serve as an admission of the validity of Vehicular's patents and the license will not preclude Magee-Hale from urging as a defense that the patents are invalid in any action brought under the license or in any action involving the patents; (2) that the acceptance by Magee-Hale of a license at the royalty fixed by the court will not constitute an admission by Magee-Hale that any of its past or future operations are within the scope of the claims of the patents; and (3) the acceptance of the license will not serve as a waiver to urge any other defense in any action under the license.

[Right to Intervene]

This court is not the proper place for litigious business men to stress and strain as they try to make a deal. Magee-Hale has the right to intervene here. Vehicular does not have the right to insist that if Magee-Hale is to take a license it must include all parking-meter patents owned by it. Magee-Hale does not have the right to take up this court's time in a determination of what is a reasonable royalty and then regard its decision as an advisory opinion and walk away without taking any license at all. More than that, Magee-Hale will not be heard to say that it will abide by the royalty rate fixed by the court but only with specific conditions.

[Intervener May Take License under Four Patents]

As I am not to be a party to any negotiations, I shall leave the parties free to negotiate elsewhere. The matter will be resolved in this fashion: Magee-Hale will not be required to take a license covering all Vehicular's patents but only the four Magee-Hale wants; Magee-Hale has thirty days to consider but there are to be no reservations or conditions. It simply takes a license under the four patents. This court proceeds to fix what it considers a fair and reasonable royalty. Any and all risks as to future legal quarrels between the parties, over the patents or the license, if one is granted, are to be assumed by the parties. Otherwise, the petition of intervention and its prayers will be dismissed.

[Motions for Bonds Denied]

One other matter should be determined at this time. The Vehicular defendants have filed a motion to require Magee-Hale to furnish a bond in the amount of $250,000 to insure the payment to defendant Vehicular Parking, Ltd. of royalties on a reasonable basis. In turn, Magee-Hale seeks a bond from Vehicular of $100,000 because of damage to Magee-Hale by reason of loss of customers arising from the threat of the patent infringement counterclaim. Vehicular defendants say the Magee-Hale claim "is so absurd and so utterly devoid of the many supporting elements, universally recognized as necessary for serious consideration of a motion of this sort, as to require no further comment." This description of Vehicular aptly describes both motions for a bond. Accordingly, the motion of each party for the kind of bond sought by each will be denied.

[Other Motions Not Decided]

I have considered the other motions of Magee-Hale but I do not think it necessary to pass on them at this time. Depending upon further events, Magee-Hale may renew its application at some future time.

[¶ 62,208] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to Mr. James W. Clark, Commissioner, Department of Business Research and Development, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General, November 24, 1947.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Published Price List—Current Delivered Invoice or Replacement Cost—Prima Facie Evidence.—A price list which is prepared by a manufacturer and circulated among wholesalers, jobbers and sales representatives, but which is not available to the retailer except when displayed to him by a sales representative, is not "published" within the meaning of the Act. In the absence of a published list price, the retail sale of goods at a price less than the current delivered invoice or replacement cost, whichever is lower, plus eight per cent thereof, for the purpose or with the effect of destroying competition, is prima facie proof of violation of the Act. "Current delivered invoice" refers to the invoice delivered at or about the time of the sale.

See the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428.

[Statutory Provision]

Your letter of November 20 is directed to M. S., Sec. 325.52. That section consists of three paragraphs and reads:

"Any sale made by the retail vendor at less than eight per cent above the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, where the manufacturer publishes a list price; or, in the absence of such a list price, at less than eight per cent above the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors or destroying competition, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of sections 325.02 to 325.07.

"No prosecution shall be had nor any action at law for damages or injunctive relief shall lie where the vendor sells at a price not less than 15 per cent above the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, where the manufacturer publishes a list price; or, in the absence of such a list price, at not less than 15 per cent above the current delivered invoice or replacement cost.

"Any sale made by a wholesale vendor at less than two per cent above the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, where the manufacturer publishes a list price; or, in the absence of such a list price, at less than two per cent above the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors or destroying competition, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of sections 325.02 to 325.07."

You comment that the section indicates that any sale made by a retail vendor at less than eight per cent above the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, for the purpose or with the effect of injuring or destroying competition, shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of Secs. 325.02 to 325.07.

You comment that many manufacturers prepare and circulate price lists among wholesalers, jobbers and sales representatives, but not among retailers. Often sales representatives display such a price list, and at such times it is available to the retailer. In that connection you submit the question:

Question

As applied to the retailer, would such manufacturer's published price list in the hands of another be considered a manufacturer's published price list?

You comment further that this section, 325.52, states that in the absence of such a price list, retail sales at less than eight per cent above the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, for the purpose or with the effect of injuring or destroying competition, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of Secs. 325.02 to 325.07. In that connection, you submit the second question:

Does the retail vendor have a choice between using the actual current delivered invoice and replacement cost; or must he be guided by Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5, (1), which limits him to the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, whichever is lower?

You also comment that Sec. 325.52 refers to the manufacturer's published list price, less his published discounts, but Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5 (2), refers to the manufacturer's published list price and discounts then currently in effect. In that connection you ask the third question:

Does Sec. 325.52 imply that the manufacturer's published list price, which the retail vendor must use, is the list price currently in effect?

Opinion

1. At the outset, we will bear in mind that Sec. 325.52 does not lay down a rule of conduct. It does not forbid a retailer from selling goods at less than a minimum specified price. It merely establishes a rule of evidence. The rule established is that when the retailer sells for less than the manufacturer's published list price, plus eight per cent, less the published discounts if the manufacturer publishes a list price, or if the manufacturer does not publish a list price, then, if the retailer sells at a price less than the current delivered invoice or replacement cost, plus eight per cent thereof, and if, in either case, basing the cost on either formula, this is done for the purpose of injuring his competitor, or with the effect of injuring his competitor, or with the effect of destroying competition, or for the purpose of destroying competition, then this is prima facie proof of violation of Secs. 325.02 to 325.07. The manufacturer's price to which reference is made is not a secret price. It is his published list price. The discounts are not secret discounts, but published discounts. The statute recognizes the possibility or probability that not all manufacturers publish a list price and it provides an alternative where such list price is not published. The first question involves a list price made available to a limited number of persons, but apparently not available to the retailer.

Published means to make public; to make known to people in general. 35 W. & P. 445.

Accordingly, when the list price is not availiable to the retailer so that he may consult it when he needs to and when he has use for it, I would not consider it published within the meaning of this statute.

2. In the absence of such a published list price, the rule depends upon the current delivered invoice or replacement cost. In the application of the law to any particular case, the first thing to be determined is whether as applied to this particular retailer there is a manufacturer's published list price. If it is determined that there is not, then the case is governed by the current delivered invoice or replacement cost. I fail to see that the retailer has any choice in the matter when the list is not published and is not available to him. In such case, the manufacturer's list price is simply eliminated.

3. Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5, relates to cost as the term is used in this act. Should a person be accused of selling below cost which is forbidden in Sec. 325.04, we look to Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5, to learn the meaning of the term cost. We read that it means (1) the actual current delivered invoice or replacement cost, whichever is lower, not including customary cash discounts, plus the cost of doing business at that location by the vendor. (2) Where a manufacturer publishes a list price and discounts, we will consider the cost as shown by the manufacturer's published list price and discounts in effect at the time that the sale is made, plus his cost of doing business. That is made prima facie evidence of the cost. Sec. 325.01, Subd. 5 (2) refers to these items of the manufacturer's published list price and manufacturer's discounts then currently in effect, that is, in effect at the time of the sale. Sec. 325.52 does not mention whether the list price is the one which was in effect when the retailer purchased his goods and does not state whether the published discounts are the discounts in effect at the time that the retailer purchased his goods, but both these sections refer to the same subjects and they are a part of the same act. Consequently, it is my opinion that they must be read together. Sec. 325.52 refers to current delivered invoice and it is my opinion that that refers to the invoice delivered at or about the time of the sale.

We will bear in mind that both of these statutes are statutes relating to evidence or proof. The proof is not conclusive. It is only prima facie. If a retailer is accused of selling below cost and he proves that his actual cost is less than the cost that would be established by the formula in these prima facie evidence rules, and if there is no evidence to dispute his actual cost which is lower, then he has not offended the statute.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Review of Previous Ruling—Conspiracy—Concerted Refusal to Lease Films.—Upon a re-examination of its previous ruling, the Court affirms its decision that uniform participation in a system of doing business which results in restraint of commerce is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy. The concerted refusal by owners of all other available theatres and distributors of 80% of the feature motion pictures, to lease films to plaintiff, violates the Act. The evidence was competent and sufficient to prove damages, and the injunction was not too wide in scope.

Affirming 150 Fed. (2d) 738, reported at '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. ¶ 57,401.

Before Biggs, Maris and McLaughlin, Circuit Judges.

[Reversal Sought]

Per Curiam: The appellants insist that this court should review its previous decision, 150 F. 2d 738 and in effect reverse itself because, it is said, the court below on remand modified certain essential findings of fact. This, the appellants contend, necessitates a judgment in the appellants' favor under Schad v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, 3 Cir., 136 F. 2d 991. Out of an abundance of caution we have reexamined our previous ruling in the light of the entire record and find it to be correct. We are of the opinion now, as we were of the opinion then, that the principles ot Interstate Circuit v. U. S., 306 U. S. 208, 225, 227, rule the case at bar.

[No Abuse of Discretion]

The appellants assert also that the injunction entered by the court below was too wide in scope. The sweep of the injunction is broad but in view of all the circumstances we cannot say that the learned trial judge abused his legal discretion in entering the decree.

We find also, contrary to the assertions of the appellants, that the evidence offered was competent and sufficient to prove the appellee's damages under Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U. S. 251. Cf. the earlier decisions in Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359, 379, and Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson Co., 282 U. S. 555, 563. This phase of the case at bar is most competently analyzed, as are its other aspects, in the opinion of the court below. See 69 F. Supp. 103.

[Judgment Affirmed]

The judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

[¶ 62,210] Ray Carlton v. Paul Manuel, doing business under the firm name and style of "I-X-L Laundry Company".

In the Supreme Court of the State of Nevada. No. 3494. December 10, 1947.

Nevada—Common Law—Monopoly

Combination in Restraint of Trade—Personal Services Not a Commodity at Common Law.—A laundry route owner who had his customers' laundry processed by the operator of a large laundry may not maintain an action against the laundry operator for conspiring with other laundry operators to reduce the rate of discount given to route owners. Nevada has no antitrust law, and personal services, such as the laundry work done by defendant for plaintiff, cannot be the subject of a monopoly at common law. Evidence of conspiracy was properly excluded.

See Vol. 2, ¶ 8535.

Concurring Opinion—Legislation Recommended.—The concerted action of the laundry operators in organizing to reduce the discount allowed to route owners was unduly oppressive and arbitrary. The subject of the prohibition or regulation of monopolies and trusts should be considered and acted upon by the Nevada legislature.

See Vol. 2, ¶ 8535.

For appellant: Morgan, Brown & Wells, and Oscar Zapf.

For respondent: Sidney W. Robinson.

By the Court, EATHER, C. J.: The evidence in this case establishes the fact that on or about the 5th day of February, 1945, appellant purchased a business in Reno, Washoe County, Nevada, consisting of a laundry route, from one Ken Darrah. The evidence further establishes the fact that at the time of purchase of said business, the laundry work and dry cleaning work of the customers of said laundry route was processed and finished by respondent doing business under the firm name and style of "I-X-L Laundry." At the time of the purchase of said business by said appellant, he and his immediate predecessor in interest were allowed a trade discount of thirty-two per cent on the published public list price of laundry and dry cleaning for all such work brought to the plant of respondent. The evidence further establishes the fact that at no time was there in existence any written agreement as between respondent and appellant covering the matter of the aforesaid discount rate or any other matters pertaining to said business relationship, and further, that respondent was under no obligation to perform services for appellant, and that appellant was under no obligation to bring laundry or dry cleaning to the plant of respondent for processing. In other words, the evidence establishes the fact that each item of work done and performed by respondent for appellant constituted a separate transaction and that neither of the parties had any continuing contractual relationship of any kind with the other.

This situation prevailed until on or about the 19th day of November, 1945, at which time appellant was notified by respondent that the discount rate of thirty-two per cent previously allowed to appellant for appellant's work would be reduced to twenty-five per cent. The evidence does not indicate that after said notification any other discount rate was allowed by respondent to appellant in connection with laundry or dry cleaning work performed by respondent for appellant. The parties continued to do business with each other at said new reduced discount rate until on or about the 14th day of March, 1946, at which time appellant ceased transacting business with respondent. The evidence further establishes the fact that for the period from February 5, 1945, until November 26, 1945, appellant paid to respondent the cost of all laundry and dry cleaning performed by respondent for appellant at the established list price less a discount of thirty-two per cent, and that from November 26, 1945, until on or about the 4th day of March 1946, appellant paid to respondent the cost of all laundry and dry cleaning performed by respondent for appellant at the list price thereof, less a discount of twenty-five per cent, and that no payments were made by appellant to respondent for work done between the period from March 4, 1946, to and including March 14, 1946.

This action was commenced in the trial court by respondent for the purpose of recovering for the value of said laundry and dry cleaning performed by respondent for appellant for said period from March 4, 1946 until March 14, 1946, said value of said work, labor and services being computed upon the established list price for said laundry and dry cleaning less a discount of twenty-five per cent, said discount being the same allowed to and paid to appellant for such work done since on or about the 26th day of November, 1945. Appellant denied owing any money to respondent, and set up various affirmative defenses which give rise to this appeal.

[Portions of the opinion dealing with the questions of discount rate and violation of War Labor Board regulations are omitted as not pertinent to the scope of these reports.]

[Conspiracy Alleged]

We will now consider appellant's first and third assignments of error relating to the exclusion of testimony pertaining to the alleged conspiracy and the finding of the trial court that the contractual relationship between appellant and respondent subsequent to November 26, 1945 was based upon a twenty-five per cent discount rate.

[Common Law Applies]

At the outset we wish to observe that the Legislature of the State of Nevada has never deemed it advisable to enact any statute governing matters pertaining to monopolies, combinations, or restraints of trade, and consequently, in arriving at a determination of this matter, we are obliged of necessity to rely solely upon the principles of the common law pertaining thereto. At common law, personal services cannot be the subject of a technical monopoly, a monopoly being predicable only on rights or interest in property. See 41 C. J., p. 172, sec. 170, wherein the following language is used, amply supported by substantial authority.

"An agreement fixing the price of labor is not forbidden by the common law. Nor is labor a 'commodity', 'article of merchandise', 'product,' or 'convenience,' 'repair', 'any article or thing whatsoever,' or 'trade,' or 'commerce,' within the meaning of federal or state anti-trust acts, and an agreement to fix the price of labor is not forbidden by any of these statutes; and this is so whether the labor is physical or intellectual or a combination of the two. Nor is an agreement fixing and regulating the price of labor a 'trust'. The foregoing principles have been applied to agreements fixing the price of laundry work, or fixing the price for dyeing and dressing of furs. They also have been applied to agreements between physicians fixing charges for professional services, and to agreements fixing and maintaining the rates of commission and brokerage to be charged by the members of an association of dealers."

See also the case of Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle, 114 S. W. 997, at 1002:

"* * * and at common law personal service—an occupation—could not be the subject of a monopoly. In discussing that question, in the case of State ex rel.

v. Associated Press, 159 Mo., loc. cit. 456, 60 S. W. 91, 104, 51 L. R. A. 151, 81 Am. St. Rep. 368, this court used this language: 'But there is nothing here on which a monopoly can attach. The business is one of mere personal service—an occupation. Unless there is 'property' to be 'affected with a public interest there is no basis laid for the fact or the charge of a monopoly.' "

The only type of combinations or monopolies or restraints of trade which fell within the ban of common law principles were those monopolies, combinations or restraints of trade which tended in any way to limit, fix, control, maintain or regulate the price or production of any article of trade or manufacture or the use of the same. Labor was never deemed to be a commodity at common law, and combinations affecting personal services were not unlawful or the subject of actions for damages. These common law principles have been adhered to in connection with judicial construction of statutes regulating monopolies, combinations and restraints of trade, and even under such statutes, labor or personal services have never been construed to constitute a commodity or article of trade. See the case of Rohlf v. Kasemeier, 118 N. W. 276, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1284, wherein the following language is used by the Iowa Court:

> "If we were to adopt the view so strongly presented by appellant's counsel, it would be on the assumption that the associated words 'merchandise' and 'commodity' include the wages to be paid for labor, because labor is a sort of merchandise, subject to barter and sale as other goods. * * * We are constrained to hold that labor is not a commodity within the meaning of the act now in question. As supporting this conclusion, see Hunt v. Riverside Club, 140 Mich. 538, 104 N. W. 40, 13 Detroit Leg. N. 264; Queen v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 24 S. W. 397, 22 L. R. A. 483. It seems to be the almost universal holding that it is no crime for any number of persons without an unlawful object in view to associate themselves together, and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain classes of men, or work under a certain price or without certain conditions. Carew v. Rutherford, 105 Mass. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 134, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Rogers v. Evarts (Sup.) 17 N. Y. Supp. 268; United States v. Moore (C. C.) 129 Fed. 630. * * * it follows that the word 'commodity', when used with reference to prices, should not be held to include labor. No case has been cited which supports appellant's contention, and we have not been able to find any."

[No Commodity Involved]

It is our opinion that in the instant case no commodity as such is involved and that consequently the conspiracy alleged in appellant's second affirmative defense does not constitute a cause of action under common law principles within the State of Nevada. The purpose of the alleged conspiracy was to maintain a reduced discount rate as between appellant and respondent in connection with personal services furnished by respondent for appellant. Such personal services are not a commodity at common law, and consequently any conspiracy with reference thereto would not violate any common law principle or give rise to a cause of action for damages in connection therewith. Laundry services have in several cases been held to constitute a matter of personal services rather than the production of a commodity, and in this connection, we expressly refer to the case of State of Arkansas ex rel. Moose v. Aaron Frank, 169 S. W. 333, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1149:

> "If the business of laundering is not a commodity, then an agreement fixing prices for the performance of that service is not within the inhibition of the antitrust act. No other word or term in that act could include that business. The act does use the word 'repair', but it cannot be seriously contended that this word is sufficient to embrace the business of laundering. It may be true that to some extent launderies do repair the clothes which they wash, but it does this as a mere incident to that business; and by such service they merely 'repair' the damage which they have done in performing their service of making the clothes clean. The business of laundering is a mere service done, whether performed by hand or by machinery, and an agreement to regulate the price to be charged therefor is in its last analysis merely an agreement to fix the price of labor, or services, and the legislature of this state has not made such an agreement unlawful."

We also refer in this connection to the case of State of Louisiana v. McClellan, 94 So. 748, 31 A. L. R. 527:

> "When we come, therefore, to consider the section referred to in connection with the business of laundry as shown by the statement of facts, there is left no possibility of doubt that such business is utterly and totally foreign to the 'trade and commerce' which the lawmakers had in view, and the restraint of which it was the object and purpose of the statute to prevent.

"The business of the laundry is not to lease or to sell, nor does a laundry deal in goods, wares, and merchandise, or other commodities. Nor has it anything to do with the fixing of the prices of commodities. In other words, there is absolutely nothing in connection with the business carried on by the laundry, or the method pursued in operating the laundry business, that would bring the laundry within any definition of 'trade' or 'commerce', in the sense in which those words are used in the statute, or that would even suggest to the ordinary mind that such laundry was a concern engaged in trade and commerce. We are unable to conceive of any rule of interpretation by which the terms of the statute can be so broadened or enlarged as to bring the laundry business thereunder."

"Our conclusion is that the laundry business operated in the City of New Orleans, as disclosed by the evidence, is not 'trade or commerce', in the sense that said words are used in sections 2 and 4 of Act 11 of the extra session of 1915; and that said laundry business was not included within the prohibition of said sections of said act."

While it is true that both of the foregoing cases arose under antitrust statutes, nevertheless, said statutes were but declaratory of common law principles, and common law principles were used in connection with interpreting the statutes involved. By an application of said common law principles, it has been determined that a laundry business is a business involving personal services rather than commodities, and consequently that no action involving monopolies, combinations, or restraints in trade, can be maintained in connection with agreements fixing the price, or tending to fix the price of such personal services. Various other cases supporting this view are to be found in an extensive annotation to the aforesaid case of State v. McClellan, supra, in 31 A. L. R. at page 533.

In connection with this phase of the matter, counsel for appellant has cited at length, and placed considerable reliance upon the case of Endicott v. Rosenthal, 16 P. (2nd) 673. However, we do not believe that the ruling in said case should find any application in a state governed solely by common law principles, since said case is predicated solely upon a California statute section, said section being section 1673 of the California Civil Code. It is admitted by the Supreme Court of the State of California that said section is much broader in its terms than was the statute under consideration in the foregoing case of State v. McClellan, in that the California statute referred not only to trade, but also to businesses of any kind. Under said California statute, the Supreme Court of California held that:

"It could not logically be maintained that persons engaged in the industry of cleaners and dyers of wearing apparel were not engaged in some kind of business."

It will be seen that said California statute referring to "businesses of any kind" enacted a measure much broader than any interpretation of what constitutes "trade" or "commodity" at common law. We do not believe that said California case, under the circumstances, should be construed to over-ride the generally prevailing common law principles applicable to this case as hereinabove enunciated.

Upon the trial of this matter, the lower court specifically referred to and relied upon the case of Goldfield Consolidated Mines Company v. Goldfield Miners' Union No. 220, decided by the late Judge Farrington, in 159 Fed., p. 500. Said case involved an agreement and combination among various mine operators within the State of Nevada, which had for its purpose the following five objectives, namely:

"First, to reduce the wages of the men employed by the various members of the association; second, to resume operations, giving preference to old employes; third, to reduce the cost of living in Goldfield District 20 percent; fourth, to have no further dealings with the Goldfield Miners' Union, or any organization affiliating with the Western Federation of Miners; fifth, to require each person presenting himself to any member of the association for employment, to sign, as a condition of such employment, an agreement that he is not, and during the period of his employment will not become, a member of respondent union. The fifth item may be regarded as the means agreed upon to accomplish the first and fourth."

It will be observed that the purposes of the aforesaid combination were much broader in their scope than were the purposes of the conspiracy alleged in appellant's second cross-complaint and counterclaim. In referring to such combination, Judge Farrington stated as follows:

"An unlawful conspiracy is a combination between two or more persons to do a lawful act by criminal or unlawful means." 8 CYC. 620," and further held with reference to the foregoing quoted purposes of said combination, that:

"None of the proposed acts are either unlawful or criminal. For these reasons I must hold that complainant, in entering into an agreement with the other members of the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association, which is embodied in the resolutions of December 7, 1907, was not guilty of any unlawful conspiracy against the respondents."

In said decision the following language is also used:

"It is a constitutional right of an employer to refuse to have any business relations with any person or with any labor organization, and it is immaterial what his reasons are, whether good or bad, well or ill formed, or entirely trivial and whimsical."

"The right of an employer to refuse to employ any particular individual, or any class of individuals, is neither greater nor less than the right of a man to refuse to work for any particular individual, or class of individuals. The reason for the refusal can in no wise control, enlarge or diminish the legal right of refusal, the right to employ, or the right to refuse to be employed.

"It is a part of every man's civil right that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with any one with whom he can make contracts. 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 587." (Cooley on Torts, second edition, sec. 278, p. 328.)

The foregoing case was not decided by this court but rather by the Federal Circuit Court for the District of Nevada. However, since said decision arose within the state, the rule set forth therein is persuasive of what the common law is within this state. Furthermore, this court has quoted said decision with approval in the case of Branson v. I. W. W., 30 Nev. 270, at page 295.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that in view of the testimony of appellant himself to the effect that he had no continuing contract with respondent, and that his contractual relationship with respondent was of a very nebulous character, and could be terminated at the whim of either appellant or respondent, respondent committed no wrong in entering into the combination alleged to have been entered into by him in appellant's second cross-complaint and counterclaim. If the testimony had indicated that a contractual relationship existed between appellant and respondent which continued for a specified term, and if said testimony had indicated that a combination or conspiracy was entered into for the purpose of destroying said contractual right, appellant's offered testimony with reference to the existence of a conspiracy might have been material. However, at the time the testimony relating to the conspiracy was offered in evidence by appellant, appellant's own testimony negatived the existence of any such contract, and to the contrary established the fact that no such contract existed. We conclude, therefore, that the trial court did not err in excluding such testimony, in view of the fact that respondent, in reducing the established discount rate to appellant from thirty-two per cent to twenty-five per cent, did nothing more than he had an absolute right to do. Since respondent had the absolute right to reduce said discount rate and since the services performed by respondent for appellant were, at common law, not the subject of monopolies, combinations, or restraints of trade, as hereinabove found to be the case, the combination or conspiracy complained of by appellant was not a combination or conspiracy to do a wrongful act or an act in contravention of common law principles. Since respondent had the right to reduce said discount rate, the fact that he may have conspired to reduce the same with various other laundry operators was an immaterial matter when judged by the principles of common law applicable to this case, and consequently, any testimony in support of such conspiracy would have been immaterial to a determination of the rights of the parties. See, in this connection, the case of Bohn Manufacturing Company v. Hollis, 55 N. W. 1119:

"What one man may lawfully do singly, two or more may lawfully agree to do jointly. The number who unite to do the act cannot change its character from lawful to unlawful. The gist of a private action for the wrongful act of many is not the combination or conspiracy, but the damage done or threatened to the plaintiff by the acts of the defendants. If the act be unlawful, the combination of many to commit it may aggravate the injury, but cannot change the character of the act. In a few cases there may be some loose remarks apparently to the contrary, but they evidently have their origin in a confused and inaccurate idea of the law of criminal conspiracy, and in failure to distinguish between an unlawful act and a criminal one. It can never be a crime to combine to commit a lawful act, but it may be a crime for several to conspire to commit an unlawful act, which, if done by one individual alone, although unlawful, would not be criminal. Hence, the fact that the defendants associated themselves together to do the act complained of is wholly immaterial in this case. We have referred to this for the reason that counsel has laid great stress upon the fact of the combination of a large number of persons, as if that, of itself, rendered their conduct actionable. Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. Div. 598, (1892) App. Cas. 25; Parker v. Huntington, 2 Gray, 124; Wellington v. Small, 3 Cush. 145; Payne v. Railway Co., 13 Lea, 507."

"A conspiracy consists of an unlawful combination of two or more persons to do that which is contrary to law, or to do that which is wrongful and harmful towards another person. It may be punished criminally by indictment, or civilly by an action on the case in the nature of conspiracy if damage has been occasioned to the person against whom it is directed. It may also consist of an unlawful combination to carry out an object not in itself unlawful by unlawful means. The essential elements, whether of a criminal or actionable conspiracy, are, in my opinion, the same, though to sustain an action special damages must be proved."

"The above was said by Lord Brampton in the case of Quinn v. Leatham, (1901) A. C. 495, 70 L. J. P. C. 76, 65 J. P. 708, 50 W. R. 139, 85 L. T. N. S. 289, 17 Times L. Rep. 749, 1 British Ru. Cas. 197. See also, 5 R. C. L. 1091, sec. 41; Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2nd ed.) 832; Harris v. Com., 113 Va. 746, 73 S. E. 561, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458, Ann. Cas. 1913 E, 697.

"The mere operation of a lawful business by lawful means, as a combination between corporations or individuals to draw to themselves business from other competitors, however hurtful to the latter, is not a conspiracy which is actionable." 5 R. C. L. 1095, sec. 44.

"In the case of West Virginia, etc. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. 591, 594, 56 L. R. A., 804, 88 Am. St. Rep., 895, it was said: 'Counsel for plaintiff put emphasis on the charge of conspiracy and malice; but there can be no conspiracy to do a legitimate act,—an act which the law allows,—nor malice therein. To give action there must not only be conspiracy, but conspiracy to do a wrongful act. If the act is lawful, no matter how many unite to do it [sic]. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Ass'n, (Minn.) 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, * * *

"It is no crime for any number of persons, without any unlawful object in view, to associate and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men, or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions. Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287.'

"'The definition or description which seems to be more generally adopted is that a conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons, by some concerted action, to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose, not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means.' Harris v. Com., 113 Va. 746, 73 S. E. 561, 562, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458, Ann. Cas. 1913 E, 597 and cases there cited.'"

This principle of law finds approval in numerous authorities, and it is sufficient of our purpose to cite but one further in support thereof, namely, the case of Lindsey v. Montana Federation of Labor, 96 P. 127, at 130:

"But there can be found running through our legal literature many remarkable statements that an act perfectly lawful when done by one person becomes by some sort of legerdemain criminal when done by two or more persons acting in concert, and this upon the theory that the concerted action amounts to a conspiracy. But with this doctrine we do not agree. If an individual is clothed with a right when acting alone, he does not lose such right merely by acting with others, each of whom is clothed with the same right. If the act done is lawful, the combination of several persons to commit it does not render it unlawful. In other words, the mere combination of action is not an element which gives character to the act."

We conclude, therefore, that appellant's first assignment of error is not well taken and that the trial court properly excluded testimony relative to the matter of conspiracy in view of the fact that we are dealing solely with the common law principles hereinabove propounded.

With reference to the question of whether or not the parties to this action were dealing with each other on a twenty-five per cent or thirty-two per cent discount rate subsequent to November 26, 1945, it is sufficient to state that there is ample evidence in the record to justify the trial court in finding that the twenty-five per cent discount rate prevailed between the parties after November 26, 1945. All of the dealings between the parties subsequent to said date were had upon said basis and all bills for services performed by respondent for appellant were settled upon said basis. None of the testimony offered by appellant and excluded by the trial court upon the objection of respondent would in any way have altered the testimony with reference to said matter and consequently, we are of the opinion that the trial court properly found that the relationship of the parties subsequent to November 26, 1945, was governed by the twenty-five per cent discount rate.

[Judgment Affirmed]

The judgment and decision of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

[Concurring Opinion]

HORSEY, J.: I concur in the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Eather, but not without reluctance.

[Defendants' Action Oppressive]

I am opposed to, and detest, monopoly, and, in my view, the concerted action of the laundry owners of the City of Reno in organizing the Washoe County Laundry Association, evidently for the purpose of reducing the discount allowed the laundry drivers, from 32 per cent to 25 per cent upon the gross business turned in by them from the operation of their laundry routes, thereby reducing the compensation of such drivers more than 20 per cent, and without prior collective bargaining, was unduly oppressive and arbitrary. The collective action of the members of the association, in the letter they dispatched to the laundry drivers, including the appellant, on November 19, 1945, notifying them of such reduction to become effective November 26, 1945, appears to me to have been a bold and brazen manifestation of the power and spirit of the monopolistic combination which had been formed, and which destroyed, as to the business theretofore transacted upon an individual basis with the laundry drivers, all competition. The association evidently included practically all of the laundry businesses in the City of Reno. The letter amounted to an ultimatum. The effect of it was that the drivers, who had their established laundry routes and their savings invested therein, were told, in effect, to pay the increased charge for the laundry, or go out of business in Reno, as there was no laundry, or laundries, of any consequence in the city which were nonmembers of the association, with whom the drivers could deal on a competitive basis.

[No Nevada Statute]

We are completely powerless, however, to make these views effective, for the reason that there is no statute in the State of Nevada prohibiting monopolies or agreements in restraint of trade.

In the absence of statute, our only recourse is to the common law, and the common law exempts from the prohibition of monopolistic combinations or agreements in restraint of trade, those relating to personal services. And all the authorities classify the laundry business, or those operating same, as being engaged in merely the rendition of personal service. In addition to the cases cited by Chief Justice Eather, I cite: Morris v. Colman, 18 Vesey Jr.'s Reports, p. 436, and State ex rel. Star Publishing Co. v. Associated Press, 159 Mo. 456, 60 S. W. 91,104, 51 L. R. A. 151.

[Legislation Recommended]

The opinion and decision of the California Supreme Court in the case of Endicott v. Rosenthal, 16 P. (2d) 673, related to a dyers' and cleaners' association, not different in principle, as to whether or not it related exclusively to personal services, from the laundry business. The court was able, upon the basis of Section 1673 of the California Civil Code, which by its terms applied to "business" of any kind, to hold such association unlawful. Nevada not having any statute prohibiting monopolies or agreements in unreasonable restraint of trade, we are powerless, because of the absence of any legal basis, to so hold in the instant case.

It would seem that the subject of the prohibition or regulation of monopolies and trusts is one which should commend itself to the legislative branch of our state government, for appropriate consideration and action.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division. Civil No. 2797. December 22, 1947.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Preliminary Injunction—Forum Non Conveniens.—A preliminiary injunction will issue to prohibit maintenance of an action brought under Section 12 of the Clayton Act in the District Court in Delaware, when it is shown that since all of the business of those parties is transacted in Texas and New Mexico, although some of the parties are incorporated in Delaware, the convenience of the parties in meeting the issues and presenting evidence may best be furthered by the trial of an action in the District Court in Texas.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.10.

Joe A. Worsham and Joe Irion Worsham, Dallas, Texas, for plaintiffs.

Thompson, Meek & Goldberg, Dallas, Texas, Thurman Arnold, Washington, D. C., for defendant. George S. Wright, Dallas, Texas, for interveners.

ATWELL, D. J.: In a suit in a federal court of Delaware, No. 1077, styled Tivoli Realty, Inc. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., and thirteen other moving picture concerns, which, for brevity, will hereafter be referred to as No. 1077, the plaintiff sought $750,000 in damages and certain equitable restraints, on the ground that it had built on Hackberry Street in or near Dallas, Texas, a theater which was completed and begun to exhibit on September 26th, 1947. On November 7th, 1947, No. 1077 had been filed in Delaware under Sec. 12 of the Clayton Act for the alleged damages mentioned. The principal stockholder in Tivoli Realty, Inc., the plaintiff in No. 1077, is I. B. Adelman. His wife owns one share of the stock, and Harry Sachs owns a few of the shares.

Mr. Adelman and Mr. Sachs were employees of the Interstate Circuit, and the Texas Consolidated Theaters, Inc., the plaintiffs in this suit, for approximately ten years. They claim in No. 1077 that all of the defendants in that suit conspired to prevent them from securing pictures for this new suburban theater. They also contend that Dallas is a large city and that a large part of the moving picture shows are downtown and that traffic conditions are such that there was a justification for an attempt to have a theater outside of the accustomed theater district.

Plaintiffs in this suit own and operate one hundred seventy-one motion picture theaters in Texas, and eight in New Mexico. Neither of the plaintiffs in this suit transacts any business in the state of Delaware, nor outside of the states of Texas and New Mexico.

In No. 1077 there is pleaded, in addition to the alleged conspiracy, an injunction issued in this court ten years ago, and the claim is made that that injunction is being violated by the defendants in No. 1077.

Upon the presentment of the verified complaint on December 8th, 1947, a rule was issued requiring the Tivoli Realty, Inc. to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue. On December 22nd, 1947, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss, and an affidavit of I. B. Adelman in support of his allegations in No. 1077, and for the purpose of defeating the claim of the plaintiffs, that this is the most convenient forum for the determination of the issues shown to exist in No. 1077, as well as in this case.

The defendant, through earnest counsel, invokes the various reasons against an application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens, to-wit:

(a) That the suits under scrutiny must be substantially the same. The question may be ruled against the defendant on the facts shown.

(b) That the doctrine of the most convenient forum will not rule where jurisdiction is granted under a special statute. Cases holding that, in substance, are largely federal employees' actions for damages. The wholesome reason for not requiring a working man to seek some distant forum for the securing of his rights growing out of an injury while he is at work, can hardly be found in cases like these under discussion.

(c) A citation of stockholder suits against the management of a corporation is hardly in point, because such suits are really suits by the corporation and are provided for in long recognized equity powers.

(d) That the domicile of the defendants in No. 1077 must be recognized as the state of incorporation, which, for nearly all of the defendants in that suit, is in the state of Delaware. That rule of venue is of little or no interest if and when a corporation born in that state has its main office and place of business elsewhere and merely makes use of the state of its incorporation for the purpose of furnishing an agent upon whom service may be had.

The dawning of the day of practicability instead of continuation of the night of technicality, has been welcomed by both bench and bar in a simplification of the rules of both civil and criminal procedure. That satisfactory direction of the hunt for justice has been recently recognized by the Supreme Court with reference to this very doctrine of convenience in a statement which means, in substance, that it is high time that the facts of each case be considered rather than cumbersome and wholly unnecessary technicalities.

There is no substantial nor satisfactory answer on the merits to the complaint and statements of the plaintiffs with the convenience of the parties in the meetings of the issues and the presentment of a vast amount of testimony may be furthered and recognized by listening to and granting the plaintiffs' plea for a solution of the differences between these litigants in a court situated near the scene of the happenings. The charge that the plaintiff in No. 1077 is acting in a vexatious and inequitable manner, is serious.

Cases presented by counsel on both sides may be placed together rather than reviewed by the court. Among them are: B. & O. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44; Steelman v. All Continent, 301 U. S. 278; B. & O. v. Clem, 36 F. (S) 703; Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501; Koster v. Lumbermen's Mutual, 330 U. S. 518; Rogers v. Guaranty, 288 U. S. 123; International Mill v. Columbia, 292 U. S. 511; N. P. Ry. Co. v. Richey & Gilbert, 232 F. 355; Crosley Corp. v. Westinghouse, 130 F. (2) 474; Hoffman v. Foraker, 274 U. S. 21; Cole v. Cunningham, 113 U. S. 107; Stonite Products Co. v. Melvin Lloyd Co., 315 U. S. 564; Miles v. Illinois Central, 315 U. S. 698; Sacco v. B. & O., 56 F. (s) 959; Momand v. Paramount, 19 F. (s) 102; U. S. v. National City Lines, 7 F. R. S. 456, 1947.

I have said nothing about No. 1077 having parties who are not parties in No. 2797, this suit, because there is no force in that argument since all of the parties who are in No. 1077 have voluntarily intervened, and are now parties in this suit.

Preliminary injunction must issue.

New York Fair Trade Act

Injunction Pendente Lite—Sale at Less than Fair Trade Price.—A motion to restrain defendants from selling a trade-marked product pending the trial of an action for violation of the New York Fair Trade Act is denied inasmuch as the complaint fails to allege that defendants advertise or offer for sale at retail the product in question. The facts stated do not compel an inference to that effect, but support equally well the conclusion that the price quoted is the wholesale price.

See the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.75; Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7354.

CHURCH, J.: Motion by the plaintiff for an injunction pendente lite is denied. This is an application by the plaintiff to restrain the defendants pending the trial from selling or offering for sale the "Steam-O-Matic" iron, a trade marked product, for less than fair-trade retail price of $18.95. As stated in its memorandum, "plaintiff seeks an injunction forbidding the offer to sell at any price lower than $18.95 retail." The defendants deny that they offer or have offered the article in question for sale at retail at a price lower than the price stated. The defendants do not deny that they are offering the iron for sale at the wholesale price of $14.95. The complaint contains no allegation that the defendants advertise or offer for sale at retail the iron in question. Before it can obtain the drastic relief demanded by this motion, the plaintiff must satisfy the court that the defendants are selling or offering to sell at retail. This the plaintiff fails to do. The facts stated in support of the motion do not compel the inference that the defendants are selling or offering to sell the iron at retail for the price quoted and the facts stated support equally well the conclusion that the price quoted by the defendants is the wholesale price (see Lucien Le Long, Inc., v. H. Mohr & Co., 169 Misc., 560; aff'd 257 App. Div., 820). Order signed.

[¶ 62,213] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to James W. Clark, Commissioner, Business Research and Development, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. December 2, 1947.

Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act

Sales Below Cost—Furnishing of Services.—The serving of meals by the operators of public eating places at less than the cost to the vendor does not violate the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act. The Act does not prohibit the sale below cost of prepared food, which cost includes not merely the cost of materials used, but the cost of services rendered as well.

See the Minnesota Unfair Trade Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8428.

[Question]

Your letter of December 1 relates that a number of establishments in the business of serving food to the public are reported to furnish this service at less than the cost to the vendors. You submit the question:

Is this a violation of Minnesota Statutes, Section 325.04, if the vendor does so for the purpose or with the effect of injuring or destroying competition?

Opinion

M. S., Sec. 325.01, Subd. 2, defines retailer to mean any person selling any commodity, article, goods, wares or merchandise to the consumer and not for the purpose of resale in any form. The same section in Subd. 11 defines retailer to mean any person selling a commodity to consumers for use.

The same section in Subd. 8 defines commodity to mean any subject of commerce.

Sec. 325.04 defines unfair discrimination to consist of selling, offering for sale or advertising for sale any commodity, article, goods, wares or merchandise at less than the cost thereof to the vendor, or the giving, offering to give, or advertising the intent to give away any commodity, article, goods, wares, or merchandise for the purpose or with the effect of injuring competitors and destroying competition.

[Legislative Intent]

It appears to me that the underlying thought in Sec. 325.04 is to prohibit certain sales. The serving of prepared food is something more than the mere sale of the merchandise or the commodity. The ordinary meal served at a public eating place involves a variety of viands. The service furnished is an important part in the serving of a meal. The services are furnished by the cook and the waiters in combination. It would appear to me that when the legislature used the language that it did in the sections above mentioned, it did not intend to describe the service of a meal for a consideration. If it did so intend, the language which it selected to express its thought appears to be inadequate for the purpose.

[Cost Includes Services]

In computing the cost of a prepared meal from a variety of ingredients and a combination of services of different persons, we cannot merely consider the cost of the materials used.

[Statute Does Not Apply]

It appears to me that Sec. 325.04 is not intended to apply to the sale of prepared meals and the service furnished in connection therewith.

[¶ 62,214] Opinion of the Attorney General of Minnesota.

Addressed to James W. Clark, Commissioner, Department of Business Research and Development, by J. A. A. Burnquist, Attorney General, Charles E. Houston, Assistant Attorney General. December 27, 1947.

Minnesota Fair Trade Act

Trading Stamps—Contract Provisions.—The giving of trading stamps with the sale of merchandise under resale price maintenance contracts is not prohibited by the Minnesota Fair Trade Act unless an express prohibition is found in the contract. The law does not concern itself with trifles. If the value of the stamps were substantial rather than trifling, a different problem would be presented.

See the Minnesota Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8424; Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7314.

[Facts]

Your letter of November 10 relates these facts:

> "A common practice of retail business establishments is to give coupons, commonly called 'trading stamps,' to retail purchasers of merchandise produced by manufacturers who have complied with all applicable provisions of The Fair Trade Act, Minnesota Statutes 1945, Section 325.08 to 325.14 inclusive.
> "In so doing, the foregoing retail business establishments do not limit the giving of coupons to purchasers of fair traded merchandise but offer and give coupons to purchasers of any item of merchandise sold, whether such item is fair traded or not. In addition, no special offer such as the giving of extra coupons for the purchase of fair traded merchandise is made.
> "However, when fair traded merchandise is sold at retail for the minimum price established by contract, the exchange value of the coupon or coupons forces the net cost of the fair traded merchandise to the retail purchaser below the established minimum contract price. * * * "

In connection with these facts, you submit this question:

[Question]

Does the giving of such coupons constitute a violation of the Fair Trade Act?

Opinion

M. S., Sec. 325.08, permits the making of certain contracts establishing a minimum price at which certain goods may be sold by merchants. When such contracts are made, they are enforceable. It appears that the policy of the law is to approve the making of such contracts. Sec. 325.09 specifies certain conduct there mentioned to be a violation of the resale price restriction. Among the things specified as a violation is the offering or the making of any concession of any kind, whether by the giving of coupons or otherwise, in connection with such sale.

It is my opinion that the giving of trading stamps does not violate a contract made under the Fair Trade Act unless the contract itself expressly prohibits the giving of such stamps. I am inclined to the opinion that the well-known principle applies that the law does not concern itself with trifles. Anyone interested in the study of the question will find the following cases well considered: Weco Products Co. v. Mill City Cut Rate Drug Stores, 55 Cal. App. (2d) 684, 131 P. (2d) 856 (1943); Bristol-Myers Co. v. L. Bamberger & Co. (1937) 122 N. J. Eq. 559, 195 A. 625 (affirmed on opinion of court below in (1938) 124 N. J. Eq. 235, 1 A. (2d) 332); Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Bros. (1939) (Pa.) 6 A. (2d) 843; Sperry & Hutchinson Co. v. McBridge (Mass.) 30 N. E. (2d) 269, 131 A. L. R. 1234.

If the value of the trading stamps is substantial rather than trifling, a different problem would be presented.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Alleged Civil Contempt—Power to Enforce Decree Limited to Parties.—A petition by a motion picture exhibitor for an order adjudging certain motion picture distributors and exhibitors to be in contempt of a final decree entered in an action brought by the United States under the antitrust laws is denied where petitioner was not a party to the action. Rule 71 of the federal Rules of Civil Procedure does not apply, inasmuch as the decree was not "made in favor" of petitioner. Petitioner has not made application to intervene, and the power of the Court to enforce the decree is, by its terms, limited to the parties to the action.

For petitioner: Morris & Lovejoy, Winslow M. Lovejoy, Houston H. Wasson.

For defendants: Dwight, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, John F. Caskey, Frederick W. R. Pride, Robert E. Nickerson.

For plaintiff: Tom C. Clark, Attorney General.

[Nature of Action]

BRIGHT, D. J.: New Salinas Theatres, Inc., not a party to the above entitled action, petitions for an order adjudging the defendant's Twentieth Centry-Fox Film Corporation and National Theatres Corporation to be in contempt of the final decree entered herein on December 31, 1946, and for damages and counsel fees, alleging that said defendants have violated section III subdivision (6), which restrains said defendants "from expanding its present theatre holdings in any manner whatsoever exempt as permitted in the preceding paragraph". (An exception which at present has no materiality.)

It appears without dispute that petitioner is and since 1939 has been engaged in the business of exhibiting motion pictures in the Vogue Theatre in Salinas, California. On April 7, 1946, it purchased a lot in Watsonville, California, for the purpose of constructing a new motion picture theatre thereon and is proceeding with the construction thereof. No theatre had been constructed at the date of this application.

The defendant National Theatres Corporation is the owner through subsidiaries of two-thirds of the stock of Fox Salinas Theatres, Ltd., which has since 1931 been the lessee and operator of the Fox California Theatre in Salinas, and in association with Borg and Peters, has been the operator of the El Rey Theatre there. Fox Salinas is also the lessee of the Strand Theatre in that city, which has been subleased to Borg and Peters, at a fixed rental. These were the only motion picture theatres in Salinas until petitioner erected the Vogue in 1939.

In that year, Borg and Peters acquired title to a piece of property in Salinas for the purpose of erecting a theatre thereon, and entered into negotiations with Fox Salinas for the purpose of having the latter acquire a one-half interest in the site and pay one-half of the construction cost of the new theatre. Nothing was done, largely because of the impact of the war, until August 21, 1945, when Fox Salinas did acquire the one-half interest. Shortly thereafter a contract for the construction of the theatre on the site was executed and construction commenced. The opinion upon which the decree in question was entered was filed in this action on June 11, 1946. When the decree was filed on December 31, 1946 (which provided for a ninety day stay in the event of an appeal which was thereafter taken) the construction of the theatre was substantially completed, the only work remaining to be done was some decorating and painting, the alteration of some doors and hardware and the installation of sets and projection equipment. On March 31, 1947, when the stay mentioned expired, the theatre was ready for operation but its actual opening did not take place until April 10, 1947, and since then it has been continuously operating.

West Coast Theatres, substantially all of whose stock is owned through a subsidiary by the defendant National Theatres Corporation, is the lessee of the only three theatres in Watsonville—the Fox, the State and the Pajaro, which latter was closed shortly after it was leased in 1936. During the war, it was determined to open the Pajaro but it was found that extensive renovation and remodeling would have to be done to comply with building ordinances. The lease expires in 1949 and West Coast has been unable to make satisfactory arrangements for the purchase of the property. In February 1946, it secured an option to purchase other property for the purpose of erecting a theatre thereon. The purchase was completed on February 27, 1946, and title taken on May 1, 1946. On May 5, 1947, it commenced excavation for the theatre. West Coast claims that the erection of the theatre on the new site would be for the purpose of replacing its Pajora theatre when the lease is terminated or expires.

[Defendant's Contention]

Defendant National Theatre claims that its action in Salinas and Watsonville with reference to new theatres would not in any way violate the provision of the decree quoted, for the reason that in Salinas the property had been acquired and the theatre practically completed at the time the decree was signed, and in Watsonville, that the construction of the new theatre would not be an expansion of its theatre holdings but merely a replacement of the Pajaro, which is closed and which it cannot reasonably be expected to renovate and remodel unless it can obtain title, which it has been unable to do.

The decree entered in this action on December 31, 1946, also provided in section VIII:

"Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to the judgment and no others, to apply to the court at any time for such orders or direction as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction, modification, or carrying out of the same, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof, or for other or further relief."

Counsel for the plaintiff in this action were present in court at the time of the argument of the motion but did not join in or oppose the motion.

[Civil Contempt]

Both parties agree that the petitioner's application is to punish for a civil contempt. The defendants oppose the motion on the grounds (1) that petitioner, not being a party, has no standing to institute this proceeding (a) because the decree expressly prohibits, and (b) because it is not an aggrieved party; (2) that the proceeding is premature because of a pending appeal from the final judgment mentioned to the United States Supreme Court; (3) because petitioner's moving papers are defective under rule 16 of the local rules of this court, in that they fail to set out with particularity the claim for damages and the evidence upon which the amount of damages may be determined; (4) that no civil contempt may be found unless a plain violation of the decree is proved; and (5) the two defendants have not violated the provision of the decree first above quoted under the facts as previously outlined in this memorandum.

In my opinion, it will not be necessary to decide any of the objections above stated except the first.

It is to be observed that the clause in the decree of December 31, 1946, reserving jurisdiction in the court, was only for the benefit of the parties to the action "and no others". Plaintiff claims that it is authorized to pursue the present remedy by rule 71 of the federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides:

"Rule 71. Process in Behalf of and Against Persons Not Parties. When an order is made in favor of a person who is not a party to the action, he may enforce obedience to the order by the same process as if he were a party; and, when obedience to an order may be lawfully enforced against a person who is not a party, he is liable to the same process for enforcing obedience to the order as if he were a party."

[Decree Not "Made in Favor" of Petitioner]

The decree was not "made in favor" of the petitioner and it is not a successor in interest of any party. It was made in favor only of the parties to the litigation and by its terms expressly reserved the right to enforce only to the parties "and no others".

Petitioner argues that it is a proper party under the anti-trust statutes, which do not confine their enforcement to the United States or any of its agencies alone, and specifically calls attention to sections 15 and 26 of Title 15 U. S. C. of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

Section 15 provides that "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the anti-trust laws may sue therefore in any district court of the United States * * * and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

Section 26 provides that "Any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws, * * * and upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate a preliminary injunction may issue."

These sections obviously provide for the bringing by the petitioner of a plenary suit in its own name, if grounds sufficient to justify one exist. Neither of them, in my opinion, authorizes petitioner, neither a party to nor an intervenor in this suit, to take affirmative action therein. That action, in my judgment, and under the express terms of the decree, can only be taken by one of the parties to it.

[Case Cited]

Petitioner cites the case of United States v. Vehicular Parking, Limited, et al., 7 F. R. D. 336. That case, in my opinion, is not at all parallel. Rule 71 was not involved, only an application to intervene. There the defendants had been found guilty under the antitrust laws, and a judgment had been entered requiring the defendants, among other things, to grant reasonable royalties. The Magee-Hale Park-O-Meter Company requested permission to intervene under rule 24 (a) of the Federal Rules and the application was granted. The court in that judgment had retained jurisdiction "for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the court at any time for * * * the enforcement or compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof." Petitioner was in the business of manufacturing and selling parking meters, and the defendants in the action had accused it of infringing certain claims of four of the patents referred to in the judgment and had offered a license under all of the patents but at a royalty which petitioner believed to be unreasonable. Judge Leahy, granting the application to intervene, wrote:

> "The real difficulty in the case is that the judgment does not specifically permit any party requesting a license to apply to the court for determination of the reasonableness of the royalty. * * * Petitioner is affected by the judgment equally with the parties to it, as is any other competitor in the same field. It would obviously be most unreasonable to limit the judgment's application to the parties to the suit. Without pausing to consider whether, from a point of view of semantics, petitioner might not qualify as a party through the Department of Justice, which represents the public, I hold that the petitioner may intervene in this proceeding by permission of the court under Rule 24 (b)."

[No Application to Intervene]

Petitioner has not made application to intervene here, and the power of the court to enforce the decree is, by its very terms, limited to the parties of the action.

In view of this holding, it is not necessary for me to decide any of the other questions presented.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, Shreveport Division. Civil Action No. 2209. January 21, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Application to Take Depositions—Subpoenas Ducem Tecum—Motions to Strike and Quash Granted.—A motion by plaintiff to strike or limit defendant's application to take depositions, and a motion to quash subpoenas ducem tecum are granted in an action brought by the United States charging producers of hydrocarbons with conspiring to monopolize trade, in violation of the antitrust laws, upon findings that (1) defendant failed to comply with the requirement of Rule 26 (a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure that permission to take depositions be granted by the court; (2) the Attorney General, whose official duties are performed in Washington, D. C., can not be required to appear at Marshall, Texas; (3) testimony sought from the Attorney General and from the United States Attorney is shown to be irrelevant; and (4) the charge that the plaintiff comes into court with "unclean hands" is groundless, since it is not contended that plaintiff has committed acts involving the merits of the case.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.211, 1230, 1240.141, 1260, 1610.345; see also comment on complaint, '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. ¶ 54,134.

For Plaintiff: Tom C. Clark, Attorney General, John F. Sonnett, George B. Haddock, W. B. Watson Snyder, and Jas. R. Browning, Special and Assistants Attorney General, Washington, D. C.; Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney.

For Defendants: John M. Madison; W. S. Wilkinson; Wilkinson, Lewis & Wilkinson; Jno. T. Gayton, J. R. Goff, Sidney G. Meyers, all of Shreveport, La.; Vernon Roberts, Ada, Okla.

[Nature of Action]

DAWKINS, J.: The Government brought this suit under the provisions of Section 4 of the Act of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, commonly known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, charging some fifteen corporations and eighteen individuals with conspiring to "restrain unreasonably and to monopolize trade and commerce in the liquid and gaseous carbohydrates" taken from the Cotton Valley Field of Webster Parish, as follows:

"Said combination and conspiracy has consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action among the defendants the substantial terms of which have been and are the defendants.

"(a) Agree to jointly engage in and exclude others from the business of extracting, processing and refining various separate hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products from over 85% of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from said Field and not reinjected therein, which said business of extracting, processing and refining was in addition to that required to separate said hydrocarbons from said natural flow or to reinject the residue thereof into the Field;

"(b) Agree to jointly engage in and exclude others from the business of distributing and selling all of the hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products jointly extracted, processed or refined by the defendants from over 85% of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Field and not reinjected therein.

"(c) Agree to jointly sell through channels of distribution jointly selected by the defendants all of the hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products extracted, processed or refined by the defendants from over 85% of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Field and not reinjected therein.

"(d) Agree upon fixed and uniform prices and terms and conditions of sale for each of the hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products extracted, processed or refined by the defendants from over 85% of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Field and not reinjected therein, and agree to sell each of said hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products at the said fixed and uniform prices and upon said terms and conditions of sale."

The bill itself, under the heading "Background" enumerates the conditions prevailing in the field, which brought about the original joint action of the defendants as follows:

"The Cotton Valley Oil Field is located in Webster Parish in the State of Louisiana. Whenever the term 'Field' is hereinafter used, it is intended to mean the said Cotton Valley Oil Field including the natural underground reservoirs in said Field in which hydrocarbons are present.

"The Field contains hydrocarbons in both liquid and gaseous forms. These hydrocarbons are under high pressure within the reservoirs, and in the exploitation of the Field this pressure is utilized to bring both the liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons to the surface of the ground. This flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons as it reached the surface is sometimes hereinafter referred to as the 'natural flow' from the Field. The greater part of the hydrocarbons in the Field are found at depths in excess of 8,000 feet. The ratio of gaseous to liquid hydrocarbons in the Field is in excess of 10,000 cubic feet of gas to one barrel of liquid. The cost of producing liquid hydrocarbons from individual wells is high. Rights to produce hydrocarbons from the Field are owned by more than thirty individuals and corporations. The production of gaseous and liquid hydrocarbons from the Field without reinjecting a part thereof into the Field would result in the rapid reduction of the underground gas pressure necessary to the ultimate recovery of both liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons from the Field. It is economically impracticable for individual owners to reinject a part of the gaseous and liquid hydrocarbons into the Field.

"In an effort to find a solution to these problems the producers in the Field erected an experimental injection station in 1939. From this experiment it was determined that certain of the liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons could be separated from the natural flow from the reservoirs and the residue could be returned to the reservoirs under pressure, permitting the exploitation of the Field without serious reduction of the pressure within the natural reservoirs. To accomplish this objective the producers of over half of all gaseous and liquid hydrocarbons from the Field entered into an agreement in the spring of 1940 which is known as the Cotton Valley Unitization and Pressure Maintenance Agreement, hereinafter referred to as 'the Agreement'. Thereafter other producers of hydrocarbons from the Field joined and became parties to the Agreement, and at the time of the filing of this complaint the parties thereto produced in excess of 90 per cent of all hydrocarbons taken from the Field. All of the defendants herein are parties to the Agreement or participated in activities related thereto. The purpose of the Agreement as set out in the preamble thereof is that 'of more properly conserving the resources of said common oil, gas and other hydrocarbon field, pool or reservoir, and for the prevention of underground and surface waste.' The Agreement provides for the unitization of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons within a substantial part of the underground reservoirs of the Field and the pooling of lands containing these substances, for the production of these substances by a joint agency to be known as the Operators' Committee, and the apportionment of the substance so produced to the owners of individual rights in the area covered by the Agreement on an agreed upon basis. The Operators' Committee is authorized by the Agreement to exercise the sole right to drill in the area covered by the Agreement with certain limited exceptions, to enter into contracts for the extension of that area and to plan, co-ordinate and execute the development and operations within that area for unitized substances. As a part of this development the Operators' Committee is specifically authorized to construct and maintain a modern recycling, pressure maintenance and liquid hydrocarbon extraction and processing plant. The Agreement stipulates that all unitized substances produced from the area covered by the Agreement, except such as may be used for production or development purposes or for repressuring or recycling, shall be apportioned among the owners and allocated on an acreage basis to the several tracts of land comprising such area except that the Operators' Committee shall be empowered to dispose of the gas produced for all owners.

"Pursuant to power delegated by Act Number 225 of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana of 1936, and by Act Number 157 of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, of 1940, the Commissioner of Conservation of the State of Louisiana issued Order Number 10-B, dated July 1, 1940, and Order Number 10-C, dated January 28, 1941, approving the Agreement only in so far as it provided for the unit operation and development of the area covered by the Agreement and the reinjection into the reservoir under pressure of a part of the liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from said Field."

The results of the alleged acts in restraint of trade and commerce are listed under the heading "Effects".

"The aforesaid combination and conspiracy and the acts and things done by defendants in forming and effectuating said combination and conspiracy, were intended by the defendants to and have had the following effects:

"(a) Excluded other persons and companies from the business of extracting, processing and refining various separate hydrocarbons and hydrocarbon products, from over 85 per cent of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Field and not reinjected therein;

"(b) Excluded persons and companies other than the defendants and those jointly selected by the defendants from an opportunity to engage in the business of selling and distributing liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons jointly produced by the defendants from said Field and the hydrocarbon products jointly processed, extracted or refined by the defendants therefrom;

"(c) Excluded persons and companies other than the defendants and those jointly selected by the defendants from an opportunity to engage in the business of transporting liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons jointly produced by the defendants from said Field and the hydrocarbon products jointly processed, extracted or refined by the defendants therefrom; and

"(d) Eliminated competition among the defendants, and between the defendants and others, in the extraction, processing and refining, in the transportation, in the distribution, and in the sale of hydrocarbon products extracted from over 85 per cent of the natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Field and not reinjected therein."

[Motion to Strike Application]

The bill was filed on June 17, 1947. Numerous motions were presented by various defendants, and on October 22, 1947, the Government filed a motion to "strike or limit" defendant, Magnolia Petroleum Company's application to take oral depositions. Up to that time there was no record in this court of said Company's effort to take such depositions for the process had been gotten out in the Eastern and Southern Districts of Texas. Attached to the motion to strike were copies of notices, addressed to the Attorney General and some four of his assistants, to the United States Attorney of this district, and to the numerous attorneys representing the corporations and individuals, that the depositions would be taken as follows: On October 27, 1947, Tom Clark, Attorney General, Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney for this district, Myron Blalock and Jack Blalock of Marshall, Texas, and L. G. Dufilho of Shreveport, in the State Court House at Marshall, Texas; on October 28th, depositions of Sylvester Dayson (or Dyson), president of Premier Oil Refining Co. of Longview, Texas, and J. Zeppa of Tyler in the state courthouse of Tyler, Texas; and on October 29th, J. R. Parten, president Woodley Petroleum Co., Marlin Sandlin, Myron Blalock and Jack Blalock of Houston, Texas, in the state courthouse in that city.

[Subpoenas Ducem Tecum]

There was also attached to said motions to strike, of the plaintiff, subpoenas ducem tecum, or to produce, addressed to the Attorney General and to the said U. S. Attorney of this district, as follows: to Tom Clark, Attorney General, demanding that he produce at Marshall, Texas, at the time of giving his deposition on October 27, 1947, documents and records as set forth in the footnote below[1]; to Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney, documents and records as shown in footnote.[2]

[Grounds of Motion]

The grounds of the motion to strike or limit as follows:

"1. Said Notice was filed by defendant Magnolia Petroleum Company before answer without first obtaining leave of this Court.

[1] "All letters, telegrams, and other communications of every kind or copies thereof (together with copies of replies thereto) received by the Department of Justice of the United States (during the period extending from August 1, 1945, to the date of institution of this action) from private individuals, corporations or associations (including parties to this action) relating to methods of operations conducted by defendant, Magnolia Petroleum Company, or any other defendant herein, alone or in association with other defendants (or any number thereof) in or in connection with the production, processing and manufacturing of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Cotton Valley Field of Webster Parish."

[2] "All letters, telegrams, and other communications of every kind thereof (together with copies of replies thereto) received by the Department of Justice of the United States (during the period extending from August 1, 1945, to the date of institution of this action) from private individuals, corporations or associations (including parties to this action) relating to methods of operations conducted by defendant, Magnolia Petroleum Company, or any other defendant herein, alone or in association with other defendants (or any number thereof) in or in connection with the production, processing and manufacturing of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the Cotton Valley Field of Webster Parish."

"2. Said Notice seeks to require the attendance of nonresidents of the district in which the depositions are to be taken in a county other than that in which served and at a place more than 40 miles from the place of service without an order of the Court.

"3. The depositions to be taken pursuant to said Notice could not serve either the purpose of discovery or as evidence in the above entitled action.

"4. The examination contemplated by the Notice would relate to matters which are privileged and which are not relevant to the subject matter involved in the above entitled action.

"5. The examination contemplated by said Notice would relate to information obtained by the attorneys and agents of the Plaintiff in anticipation of litigation and in preparation for trial, and the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions and legal theories of said attorneys, and no showing has been made that denial of disclosure concerning said matters will unfairly prejudice the defendant Magnolia Petroleum Company or cause said defendant undue hardship or injustice.

"6. The taking of depositions contemplated by said Notice would cause unreasonable annoyance, embarrassment and oppression to the Plaintiff and to the witnesses.

"7. Said notice seeks to require the attendance of Tom C. Clark, Attorney General of the United States, at a place remote from his duties at the seat of Federal Government in Washington, D. C., to submit to examination in a preliminary hearing relating to matters of State and of a confidential nature and not relevant to the subject matter involved in the above entitled case, without any showing as to the possible materiality of the testimony of said Tom C. Clark. That said Notice is therefore unduly oppressive and harassing, is contrary to the public interest, and is against public order.

"8. Said notice seeks to require the attendance of Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney, Western District of Louisiana, at a place remote from his office and duties at Shreveport, Louisiana, to submit to examination in a preliminary hearing relating to matters concerning which he has no personal knowledge, without any showing as to the possible materiality of his testimony. That said Notice is therefore unduly oppressive and harassing, is contrary to the public interest, and is against public policy.

"9. That the examination contemplated by said Notice would relate to matters the disclosure of which is prohibited by Department of Justice Order Number 3229, issued pursuant to the authority of Revised Statute 161, 5 U. S. C. 22."

[Disposition of Motion]

(1) The motion to strike might be disposed of by a simple reference to Rule 26 (a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, which allows the taking of depositions before issue joined, before the filing of an answer "by leave of the court" in which the suit is pending. No application was made to or granted by this court for the taking of said depositions. See Application of Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation (D. C. N. Y. 1945) 4 F. R. D. 264; Deskin v. Zinker, 6 F. R. D. 615. (Amendment to this rule has been made authorizing taking of depositions without permission of the court before issue joined but the Attorney General has given an opinion that it will not become effective until March 1948.) However, since the taking of the depositions was stayed by this court and the dates therefor have long since passed, it is thought proper for the guidance of the parties in the future, that the Court should rule upon the issues raised by the motion to strike.

[Notice to Attorney General]

(2) As to the notice to the Attorney General and his assistants, the court may take cognizance of the fact that his official duties are performed in Washington, D. C. many times the distance of 40 miles, within which a witness may be required to appear, and these witnesses can not be made to respond. Rule 45 (d) (2).

As to the United States Attorney, Shreveport is some 37 miles from Marshall, Texas. The rule just cited provides that "a resident of the district in which a deposition is to be taken may be required to attend, etc. A nonresident of the district (in which the deposition is to be taken) may be required to attend * * * within 40 miles of the place of service, or at such other place as may be fixed by the court." In this instance there was no place fixed by the court, for the reason no order for the taking of the deposition of the District Attorney was obtained, but if the right to take it had existed at the time, without this order, then he was within the range which permitted him to be summoned to Marshall, Texas, since he was "a non resident of the district" in which the deposition was to be taken.

[Purpose of Depositions]

(3) The third point of the motion to strike, that the "depositions could not serve the purpose of discovery or as evidence" involves much of what is raised in Nos. 4 and 5.

In response to the motion to strike, Magnolia Petroleum Co., at whose instance the notice to take the depositions was issued, has answered, stating in substance what it expected to prove thereby (a) that the suit of the Government was not filed in good faith, (b) that the United States is only a nominal party and the real plaintiff, not named in the case, is the Premier Oil Refining Company of Texas, "its president, officers, directors and stockholders", (c) that it was filed to pay a political debt of the present national administration, (d) its purpose is to further the final [sic] interest of the said corporation, its officers and stockholders, (e) for which reasons the Plaintiff and the Attorney General come into court with "unclean hands", (f) that the purpose is to permit or foster a monopoly on behalf of said corporation in the Cotton Valley field, (g) that plaintiffs are using Woodley Petroleum Co., a subsidiary of the Premier Oil Refining Co., whose officers and stockholders are largely common to those of the former, as a nominal defendant to have it enter "a sort of plea of guilty and thereby 'run interference' for the plaintiff and the said Premier Oil Refining Co., to help it achieve a monopoly over distillate from the Cotton Valley Oil field or to insure a future treble damage suit for" it and plaintiff. The three succeeding paragraphs (h) (i) and (j) are largely elaborations of the preceding ones; (k) denies that the communications between the Attorney General and the persons named are confidential, (l) that the information sought would enable the Court to understand the "background" of the suit to enable it to balance equities, (m) unless it, Magnolia Petroleum Company is permitted access to the information thus sought, it would be "deprived of its day in court" and be denied due process of law. Paragraphs (n) and (o) are also elaborations of matters covered by preceding numbers.

Rule 26 provides (a) for the taking of oral depositions "for the purpose of discovery or for use as evidence in the action or for both purposes * * * in accordance with these rules * * *;" (b) * * * regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved * * * in the pending action * * *.

Defendant, Magnolia Petroleum Company (called Magnolia) charges that the suit was not filed in good faith, not because it does not state a cause of action under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, but because, as this defendant alleges, action was induced by political considerations and to pay a political debt to the Premier Refining Co. (called Premier), not made a party. It would seem sufficient to say that, if the complaint alleges facts, which, under the law, would entitle the plaintiff to relief, and this were substantially proven, the Court could not decline to award judgment even though it might have been inspired in the manner charged. Suppose, on final hearing it should be shown that defendants had violated the anti-trust statute to the extent and in the manner charged and Magnolia was able to show that the Attorney General, his assistants and the United States Attorney had acted at the instance of Premier for the reasons which Magnolia alleges, then this could not thwart a lawful result.

[Testimony Sought is Irrelevant]

It is the conclusion that the matters charged in paragraphs (a) to (f) inclusive, show that the testimony sought from the Attorney General and the United States Attorney is irrelevant.

As to the charge (h) that Woodley Petroleum Company (called Woodley) was made party defendant for the purposes stated, when in reality its interest was the same as Premier, if it should be found at the trial that the former is not a bona fide defendant, the bill as to it should be dismissed, and otherwise what has been said as to the preceding paragraphs applies in this instance.

With respect to the charge (i) that for the reasons alleged in the preceding paragraphs the plaintiff (United States) comes into court with "unclean hands", it is believed that this principle should be confined to matters wherein the party so charged was guilty of some act or acts which were similar to those complained of or attributed to the defendants, or that complainant had committed others of a nature such that good conscience with respect to the subject matter would not permit the complainant to be heard. The answer in no sense charges that these Government officers have participated in acts involving the merits of the matter, which would deprive the Government of its right to insist that the defendants be held to account for their alleged wrongdoing. A simple illustration, it is thought, will serve to show the irrelevancy of these charges. Should the National Administration change between now and the trial of this case on the merits, and the new Attorney General should determine to go forward with it, no one could seriously contend that the alleged conduct of the present officers could serve to prevent that course. Then, too, fundamentally, officers of the United States can not bind it either adversely or favorably by action intended to serve their personal ends. Its right to proceed and to have relief according to the facts proven under the complaint can not be diminished by the conduct of its agents. These observations apply equally to paragraphs (j) to (o) inclusive.

[Subpoenas Quashed]

From what has been said it follows that the subpoenas ducem tecum should be recalled and quashed.

Motions for More Definite Statement of Facts

Motions for more definite statement of facts have been filed by a number of defendants. Counsel for one or more of these have asked and will be granted further hearing thereon, and until this has been done, said motions will not be disposed of.

This course will also be pursued as to the exceptions that the complaint fails to state facts upon which relief can be granted. After the motions for more definite statements are out of the way, it will be time to determine whether the bill alleges a cause of action.

Proper decree should be presented.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, Eastern Division. Equity No. 12546. Filed October 10, 1947.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Effect of Prior Judgment or Decree—Motion to Strike Overruled.—Plaintiff sued defendant in Missouri for infringement of certain glass-making machinery patents. A decree entered in Ohio in a government antitrust action against plaintiff enjoined plaintiff from proceeding in its suit against defendant. Defendant counterclaimed for damages; plaintiff replied, setting up a judgment for plaintiff in the infringement suit. Defendant's amended counterclaim contends that plaintiff's judgment was obtained by fraud, and that its use as a defense violates the decree in the government suit. A motion by plaintiff to strike all reference to the decree is overruled. The decree is admissible as prima facie evidence on the issue whether the judgment in the infringement case should be set aside. The counterclaim satisfies the requirement of Section 5 of the Clayton Act that it plead an action brought "under" the antitrust laws.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2025.12.

For defendant: Kingsland, Rogers & Ezell and Jacob M. Lashly, all of St. Louis, Missouri.

Memorandum and Order on Plaintiff's Motion to Strike Out Parts of Defendant's Second Amended and Supplemental Counterclaim

HULEN, J.: Plaintiff has filed a motion to strike from Count V of the second amended and supplemental counterclaim all reference to the judgment, findings and record in the case of United States v. Hartford-Empire Co., et al., referred to in this cause as the "Toledo case", on the ground that such allegations are "immaterial, impertinent and prejudicial". Counts I to IV of the counterclaim seek to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been suffered in consequence of antitrust law violations by plaintiff. Count V of the counterclaim asks to have the order and judgment in case number 7453 set aside because obtained by plaintiff by fraud. Count V not containing any jury issues, the allegations complained of by plaintiff do not present a serious question. This is conceded by plaintiff. The purpose of the motion now before the Court is that the parties may "know in advance of any trial of those issues (under Count V of the counterclaim) whether the Toledo decree is or is not admissible as prima facie evidence".

[Preliminary Observations]

The pleadings have not been made up in this case. We do not consider the present procedure and motion the proper time and means to make a final ruling on admissibility of evidence. Aside from the record in the trial such matters could properly be disposed of at a pre-trial conference when the issues in the case have been made up. We propose to hold such a conference at the proper time. However, it may serve some purpose if we make some preliminary observations on the question presented.

[Plaintiff's Contentions]

We have read the briefs submitted. As we understand plaintiff's position it is that proceedings in the Toledo case are inadmissible in any cause unless made admissible in evidence under the antitrust statute (15 U. S. C. 16), and that the Toledo judgment is not admissible in trial of the issues in Count V of the counterclaim because it does not plead an action brought "under said laws" as provided in Section 16 (15 U. S. C. 16). The statute provides that a final judgment or decree in any criminal prosecution or suit brought on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws that a defendant has violated the antitrust laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against the defendant "under" the antitrust laws as to which the decree in the Government action would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

[Amended Counterclaim]

As we view Count V of the amended counterclaim it presents two issues—at most. First, and principally—that any effort by plaintiff to avail itself of the decree of this Court in cause No. 7453 as a defense to Counts I, II, III and IV of the counterclaim would constitute a violation by plaintiff of the decree in the Toledo case.

Second, that the decree in cause No. 7453 was obtained by the plaintiff by fraud, and for that reason should be annulled.

I.

[Prior Judgment as Defense]

We do not think Section 16 is decisive on the first question. Plaintiff instituted this litigation in 1938 by complaint charging defendant with infringement of certain patents alleged to be vested in the plaintiff. Plaintiff prayed for an injunction and an accounting. The decree in the Toledo case, entered October 31, 1945, stopped the plaintiff from proceeding under its complaint as the case then stood. Defendant then filed a counterclaim in two counts seeking damages under the provisions of Section 15 of tthe antitrust act (15 U. S. C. 15). To the counterclaim plaintiff filed a reply and as its "fifth" and "sixth" defenses set up the judgment in case No. 7453 in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant, "that plaintiff was the owner of valid patent rights therein described; that defendant was infringing same; that plaintiff was entitled to the relief given and that defendant had no valid defense to such action" and that the defendant was bound by that judgment. Defendant then filed its second amended and supplemental counterclaim, adding Count V alleging (paragraph 13) that the fifth and sixth defense set up in the plaintiff's reply was an attempt on plaintiff's part "to make further use of * * * patents and of the decree adjudging said patents valid and infringed by this defendant" which action on the part of plaintiff was in violation of the injunctive order in the Toledo case. What would have been defendant's position under the pleadings as they stood prior to the filing of its second amended and supplemental counterclaim we are not called upon to decide. Rule 7, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, is plainly to the effect that an answer to a counterclaim is the last permitted pleading. When the plaintiff filed its reply to defendant's original counterclaim defendant found itself in a quandary as to how to meet the fifth and sixth defense set up in the counterclaim in view of Rule 7. We do not think defendant is subject to criticism for filing an amended counterclaim, informing the court and the plaintiff of its position on the "fifth" and "sixth" defense rather than hazard the chance that the court would permit introduction of evidence to meet the issue without a pleading. "The new rules * * * restrict the pleadings to the task of general notice-giving * * *. The way is now clear, consistent with recognized privileges, for the parties to obtain the fullest possible knowledge of the issues and facts before trial." (See Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495.) We will construe the pleadings "with the liberal atmosphere surrounding" the new rules, under the mandate of the Supreme Court. It is our opinion that the decree in the Toledo case, and so much of the record as is necessary to present the issue raised in Count V, resulting from plaintiff's attempt to avail itself of the judgment in case No. 7453, as a defense in this cause, should be admitted in this cause if offered. With that evidence and such other relevant facts as the parties care to offer, the Court will then be in a position to pass on that question if and when it is presented.

[Judgment Admissible to Prove Fraud]

Plaintiff would construe Count V of the amended counterclaim as a suit in equity to set aside a judgment alleged to have been procured by fraud. Assuming, but not deciding, that this Court now has jurisdiction to entertain such a proceeding, would the record in the Toledo case be admissible in support of the defendant's position? At the outset we observe that under Section 16 (15 U. S. C. 16) only a "final judgment or decree" rendered in a Government proceeding "shall be prima facie evidence" in certain proceedings brought by a third party against the defendant in the Government action. Much more is contained in the pleading complained of by the plaintiff. However, it is plaintiff's position that no part of the Toledo proceeding is admissible in evidence under Count V of the counterclaim because the counterclaim does present an action "under" the antitrust laws.

[Case Arising "Under" Antitrust Laws]

The authorities are not uniform in their holding, on the facts of the particular case, as to when a case may be said to arise under the Constitution or laws of the United States, and particularly under the antitrust laws, although they are all based on the well recognized principle of law that whenever it appears that the correct decision of the case depends on the construction of the law of the United States, or that some title, right, privilege or immunity on which recovery depends will be defeated by one construction of the law or sustained by the opposite construction, then a case arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Let us examine the facts of this case and see where plaintiff's contention would lead. Plaintiff urges that the Toledo judgment is inadmissible in evidence in the trial of Count V. Therefore it must be plaintiff's position that this Court must try de novo the issue of violation of the antitrust laws by the plaintiff which were, among others, tried and finally adjudicated in the Toledo case. If we should try that issue anew under Count V of the counterclaim and perchance reach the conclusion that the defendant has failed to sustain its position, the paradoxical situation would then be presented of plaintiff having been convicted of violating the antitrust laws in the district court in the State of Ohio, but on part of the same issues as were found against plaintiff in that case the plaintiff would be found innocent in the district court in Missouri and a judgment which the plaintiff was enjoined from taking any action on other than the dismissal by the Toledo, Ohio, district court would be found a valid judgment by the Missouri district court. Only the most persuasive authority of a superior court would lead this Court to a ruling on evidence contemplative of the possibility of such a result.

[Toledo Decree Admissible]

For all practical purposes defendant's action is for damages and Count V of defendant's counterclaim is a part of the defendant's pleading in its cause of action for damages. It is the defendant's position that under the decree in the Toledo case the judgment of this Court in case No. 7453 no longer has any force or effect. Based on the decree in the Toledo case, and Section 15 of the antitrust Act (15 U. S. C. 15) defendant seeks damages against the plaintiff under Counts I, II, III and IV of the amended counterclaim. There is no dispute between the parties that these counts of the amended counterclaim constitute an action brought "under" the antitrust Act (15 U. S. C. 16). Plaintiff has injected the judgment of this Court in case No. 7453 into these proceedings as a defense to an action "under" laws of the United States. The defendant replies to this move by the plaintiff with the charge that the judgment in case No. 7453 should be set aside because obtained by the plaintiff by fraud. It follows, we conclude, that the judgment in case No. 7453 is so inextricably connected with the issues under Counts I, II, III and IV, as raised by plaintiff, it cannot be disassociated from them solely for the purpose of Count V of the amended counterclaim. If defendant has filed a separate action setting up solely the matters contained in Count V of the counterclaim, and if defendant's position is correct as to the effect of the Toledo Judgment, such a case would be terminated as moot because under the decree in the Toledo case the plaintiff could take no action other than a dismissal in case No. 7453. The effect of Count V of the counterclaim serves only to form the pleadings on the first four counts of the amended counterclaim and if offered, and the Court entertains jurisdiction, the decree in the Toledo cases would be admissible in this case on the issue whether this Court should set aside the judgment in case No. 7453.

ORDER

Motion of plaintiff to strike from the second amended and supplemental counterclaim the allegations referred to in the motion, is overruled.

In the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District of Texas. No. 13,832. October 17, 1947.

Texas Antitrust Act

Secondary Boycott—Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade—Injunction Affirmed.—An attempt by a teamsters union to obtain a union shop contract from an employer by inducing other transportation companies to cease doing business with him until he should accede to the union's demands constitutes a conspiracy in restraint of trade under the Texas antitrust laws. A concerted attempt to restrain the pursuit of a business or to boycott a business establishment or to induce others to do so is a conspiracy in restraint of trade under the Texas law, whether the attempt is made by a union or by others. An injunction restraining such conduct is affirmed, with a direction to disregard a paragraph of the decree which is held to be an improper restraint of appellants' right to disseminate information.

For appellee: Bowyer, Gray, Thomas, Crozier & Jaffe, Dallas, Texas.

[Parties]

YOUNG, J.: The appeal was from an order of injunction granted upon final hearing and following a labor dispute.

Plaintiffs below were Zanes Freight Agency, a copartnership composed of W. R. Zanes, Sr., W. R. Zanes, Jr., and Grover Funderburk; Merchants Delivery, Inc., and Zanes-Ewalt Warehouse, a corporation. Zanes Freight Agency is engaged in the pickup and delivery of goods, wares and merchandise in the City of Dallas, having contracts with four railroads and written or verbal contracts with some twenty-four truck lines, whereby freight is picked up in their trucks and delivered to depots of truck lines and railroads for customers of all concerned; likewise picking up freight at railroad and truck line depots for delivery to various consignees, all of which service is performed wholly within the City of Dallas. The business of Merchants Delivery, Inc., is the delivery of packages from local wholesale and retail merchants to their city customers, also handling pool car shipments for Acme Freight Company. Zanes-Ewalt Warehouse maintains and operates a city warehouse where commodities are stored and receipts issued therefor. Plaintiff concerns operate separately in the matter of business establishments, offices, books and employees, but are owned by above individuals.

Adverse parties herein are Local Union No. 745 and C. B. Kepke, successor to James B. Turner, individually, and as business agent of Local No. 745, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, all hereinafter styled labor defendants; the twenty-four companies already mentioned being styled truck line defendants, operating freight lines into the City of Dallas, with common carrier permits issued by the Railroad Commission of Texas and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

[Labor Dispute]

A temporary injunction had heretofore issued, June 4, 1946, in [a] suit filed the previous May 11th, in connection with the following antecedent facts: On February 21, 1946 an election had been held among employees of Zanes Freight Agency under National Labor Relations Board supervision to determine whether Local No. 745 should be designated as bargaining agent for certain of the company employees, to-wit: Drivers, their helpers, station men and mechanics; office and supervisory employees having been excluded from such election. Out of approximately sixty employees eligible to vote, thirty-nine cast valid votes, twenty-seven for the union and twelve against; and, as a result, on March 13, the union was designated by NLRB to represent such employees for purpose of collective bargaining. Shortly thereafter business agent Turner of Local 745 presented to Zanes Freight Agency a contract which the union desired to consummate between the Agency and employees of such company represented by it; Mr. Zanes, Sr., not accepting the contract but submitting a counter proposal, rejected by Turner who insisted that his form of contract and no other be signed. Principal difference between the parties was a proviso for the "union shop," and no further negotiations were carried on. Turner then went to see some of Zanes freight employees, talking to between five and seven at Southern Pacific docks, Dallas, inquring if they were still ready to strike; and on April 22, 1946 the union put a picket line (no Zanes employees) at both the place of business of Zanes Freight Agency, 1500 South Preston, and in vicinity of the MKT Railway Freight Office, carrying placards worded "Zanes Freight Agency employees on strike. Truck Drivers Local No. 745 A. F. of L."

[Requests for Boycott]

Zanes Freight Agency also had pickup and delivery agreements with the following railroads: MK&T Railway Company of Texas, St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, T. & N. O. Railway Company, C. R. I. & G. Railway, F. W. & D. C. Railway and T. & P. Railway Company. Coincident with picketing, the following notices were sent generally to truck line defendants, railroads and others by Local 745, such notices being posted on company bulletin boards by Union stewards of the companies employing Local 745 members:

"Office of the Secretary-Treasurer * * * JAS. B. TURNER, Secretary-Treasurer DALLAS GENERAL DRIVERS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND HELPERS LOCAL UNION NO. 745, 1727 Young St., Dallas, Texas. AFFILIATIONS: LOCAL Texas State Federation of Labor, Dallas Central Labor Council, NATIONAL American Federation of Labor, and International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers. April 22, 1946.

"Dear Sir: Effective Monday, April 22, Zanes Freight Agency of Dallas, Texas will be on strike by the Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 745. Please refrain from doing business with said Cartage Company until this dispute is settled."

"4-27-46 SPECIAL BULLETIN TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: DALLAS GENERAL DRIVERS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND HELPERS LOCAL UNION NO. 745 HAS THE FOLLOWING FIRMS ON STRIKE, OR ON THE UNFAIR LIST, AND WE DO NOT WANT YOU TO DO BUSINESS IN ANY MANNER WITH THE FIRMS LISTED BELOW. JOHNSON MOTOR FREIGHT LINES, BRASWELL FREIGHT LINES, ZANES FREIGHT AGENCY, MERCHANTS DELIVERY SERVICE, BINYON-O'KEEFE STORAGE COMPANY, ZANES-EWALT CORP. BONDED WAREHOUSE. THIS UNION WILL APPRECIATE ALL YOUR COOPERATION IN THIS MATTER AND WE EXPECT THE SAME. GENERAL DRIVERS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND HELPERS LOCAL UNION NO. 745, DALLAS, TEXAS."

"TRUCK DRIVERS LOCAL UNION NO. 745 A. F. OF L. ON STRIKE AGAINST THE ZANES FREIGHT AGENCY. PLEASE DO NOT BE MISLED—TRUCK DRIVERS LOCAL NO. 745 ARE ON STRIKE AND WE HAVE THIS FIRM ON OUR WE DON'T PATRONIZE LIST. REMEMBER WE ARE STILL ON STRIKE. DALLAS GENERAL DRIVERS—LOCAL UNION NO. 745, A. F. OF L."

Labor defendants also sent out telegrams, viz.:

"April 22, 1946. Mr. Forest T. Bice, Cotton Belt Railroad, 910 Young Street, Dallas, Texas. Zanes Freight Agency on strike by the Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 745. Please cooperate to the fullest extent of your ability on this matter. T. T. Neal, General Organizer. Charge to Local Union No. 745."——

"Mr. T. W. Waldrop, Southern Pacific Transportation Company, Houston, Texas. April 25, 1946. Southern Pacific Lines using Zanes Freight Agency which we have on strike at Dallas. Continued use of this company after Monday, April 29 will necessitate Over-the-Road Division of the Southern Conference of Teamsters instituting Action against Southern Pacific Motor Transport Company. Advise you contact me immediately. Will be at Whitmore Hotel until early Saturday morning and at Hotel New Orleans, La. all day Saturday. Dexter L. Lewis, International Representative."——

"May 1, 1946. Mr. T. W. Waldrop, Vice President and Gen. Manager, Southern Pacific Bldg., Southern Pacific Transportation Co., Houston, Texas. Mr. B. C. James, Ass't Vice Pres., Texas & Pacific Bldg., Texas & Pacific Transports Co., Dallas, Texas. Mr. H. R. Moore, Jr., Southwestern Transportation Co., Texarkana, Texas. The company doing business with Zanes Freight Agency, Dallas, Texas which our Union Local No. 745 has on strike—we are maintaining the picket line on this company—your contract provides no crossing of picket line. We will not permit technicalities to be used for the purpose of giving succor to our enemies. I am at this time calling upon you people to discontinue business with Zanes or suffer the consequences that we will initiate, Dexter L. Lewis, International Representative."——

"MKT A. J. Pickett, Ry. Exchange Building, St. Louis, Missouri. H. W. Horton, 508 National Building, Pine Bluff, Arkansas. W. M. Crawford, Grand Lodge Representative, 108 East Ninth, Fort Worth, Texas. April 24, 1946. Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 745 has won an NLRB election with Zanes Freight Agency, a cartage company that handles railway freight in the City of Dallas. They refuse to sign our uniform City Pickup and Delivery contract. Have Company on strike and picket on. Please have your local Chairman refuse to handle merchandise for said cartage company. T. T. Neal International Representative. Charged to Local Union No. 745."

Union representatives further called upon the customers of Zanes Freight Agency named in their petition, among others, stating that the two principals were in dispute and demanding support of said concerns by their withdrawal of patronage from plaintiff agency. Immediately all truck line defendants except two[1] ceased doing business with plaintiffs; as did John Sexton Company, a customer under contract with Merchants Delivery, Inc.[2]

[Picketing]

Then ensued a period covered by the temporary injunction of June 4, 1946, when in January 1947 a new and independent controversy arose between defendant Union and Zanes-Ewalt Warehouse. On January 1, this appellee had acquired quarters at Hawkins Street and Pacific Avenue in the City of Dallas, under a lease from the building owner, Eagle Ford Land and Development Company, which premises, up to December 31, 1946, had been occupied by Texas & Pacific Terminal Warehouse Company. No contractual relations existed between the two lessees, Zanes-Ewalt assumed no obligation of such former tenant, nor did there exist any connection between lessor and successive lessees in matter of stockholders, officers or directors. Defendant union had secured an employment contract covering employees of Texas & Pacific Terminal Warehouse Company and, in taking over the building, a continuation of employment to some eighteen of these workers was offered by Zanes-Ewalt; it being contended that the latter should recognize the prior union contract. Recognition was refused; M. R. Dixon, assistant business manager of the

[1] Texas & Pacific Transport Company and Southern Pacific Transportation Company; and, as to these, Dexter L. Lewis, International Representative of the Teamsters Union, on May 1, 1946, sent letters to NLRB, National Wage Adjustment Board and Department of Labor, giving notice of intention to strike because of existence of a labor dispute, the issue being that such companies "are doing business with Zanes Freight Agency, which Local Union No. 745 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters has on strike."

[2] Contracts between the Union and all truck line defendants contained the proviso: "The employer shall not request, instruct or require any employee to go through a picket line of a striking union * * *" (to which was added in "Over-the-Road" or intercity contracts "nor to handle 'unfair goods,' declared so by the Unions signed to this agreement.") union, filing complaint with the NLRB and, on January 6, placing a picket at the premises, telling Zanes-Ewalt employees of the union that they could then go on strike. When the picket line was established, and as a result of conference between Dixon and representatives of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Union employees of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, whose tracks ran into the warehouse, would not deliver freight to Zanes-Ewalt or their customers in the warehouse because of the picket line. In the same connection there was testimony that trucks belonging to three different companies attempted to enter the warehouse premises at Pacific and Hawkins Streets and, when approached by the picket, backed out of the gate and would not enter.

[Injunctive Relief]

Without further detail from a rather lengthy statement of facts, the court on March 5, 1947 entered judgment of permanent injunction of which the following summary is material: (1) Paragraphs one and two, in general, restrained appellant union and non-appealing truck line defendants from a secondary boycott against plaintiff "notwithstanding the provisions of any contract existing between the said Local No. 745 and any of such defendants relating to the crossing of picket lines and the handling of so-called 'unfair goods' or so designated as 'unfair' by the labor union defendants"; paragraph three prohibited secondary picketing of railroads, truck lines and named customers of plaintiffs in consequence of any dispute between the plaintiffs and union, also providing against ambulatory pickets "to follow or accompany plaintiffs' trucks or vehicles while operating in the usual course of business"; (2) labor defendants were authorized to establish a picket line at the place of business of Zanes Freight Agency and Zanes-Ewalt Warehouse with following provisos: (a) Picketing shall be peaceful and not to interfere with ingress or egress to either of said such places of business; and (b) shall not extend beyond the Freight Agency premises at 1500 South Preston Street "either actually or constructively"; (c) said picket line at plaintiffs' warehouse shall be on the Pacific and Hawkins Street side and not extend to within one hundred feet of the railroad track entering said warehouse and in nowise to interfere with movement of freight, in and out, over each track; (d) or interfere with delivery of freight or movement thereof in and out of the two places of business by common carriers, either truck line defendants or railroads; (e) picket line shall be for the limited purpose of persuading employees of plaintiff to leave their employment or dissuading third parties from becoming employees, and not to consist of more than two pickets at any one time at either place; (f) pickets shall be limited to hours from 6:00 A. M. to 7:00 P. M. daily unless employees (other than officers, supervisors, clerical help, etc.) are present and performing usual functions at other times; (g) that should any of the named railroads or truck lines, while operating under common carrier permits, their servants or employees, refuse to deliver freight to plaintiffs or accept freight at their premises because of presence of pickets, then upon notice the picket line shall be removed and not be reestablished until after acceptance or delivery of the freight involved or movement of trains and trucks has been completed.

[Coercion Prohibited]

Under paragraphs five, six and seven of the judgment, labor defendants were restrained from doing any acts with respect to contractual relationships between plaintiffs and railroads, also T. & P. and Southern Transportation Companies, by way of intimidation or coercion to terminate contracts; the letter transportation companies being in turn restrained from terminating contracts with plaintiffs on account of activities of labor defendants under the foregoing circumstances; and the same restraint, in effect, was made applicable to named customers.

Upon cross action of certain truck line defendants, appellants were enjoined from authorizing any strike of employees or picketing on or about the premises of such defendants on account of any labor dispute between Local 745 and plaintiffs or any provision of contract existing between said Local and the particular defendants. Under paragraph eight labor defendants were accorded the right of "publicizing the controversy with plaintiffs in an accurate, peaceful and truthful manner, without threats, coercion or intimidation, actual or implied, against any of the parties herein mentioned, except as herein limited."

[Issues]

The appeal was by labor defendants only, the points presented being in substance that (1) a labor dispute existed between appellants and appellees (plaintiffs below) and their non-striking employees; (2) picketing as invoked by appellants is privileged under the free speech guaranties of both Constitutions of Texas and the United States; (3) picketing under the instant circumstances is privileged and authorized by Arts. 5152 and 5153, Texas Revised Statutes; (4) refusal of defendants to cross a picket line or handle "unfair freight" is not illegal; (5) the trial court had no jurisdiction to restrain defendant truck lines from interchanging freight with plaintiffs, such matters being within the exclusive jurisdiction either of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Texas Railroad Commission; (6) the judgment of injunction and any laws of Texas upon which it might be purportedly based are unconstitutional and void because in violation of Art. 1, sec. 8, Art. 6, and Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, United States Constitution; also too vague and indefinite for enforcement.

From above points and opening statement of appellants' brief, plaintiffs' cause of action is assumed to be one merely to restrain the picketing of their places of business, but the union's right to peacefully picket as contemplated by Arts. 5152, 5154, V. A. S., is nowhere brought in question. On the other hand, material allegations of plaintiffs' trial petition raise issues challenging the right of the union in concert with others to engage in activities resulting in a secondary boycott, interference with plaintiffs' contracts, violation of the Texas antitrust laws, creation and carrying on of restrictions in the free pursuit of a lawful business, and prevention or lessening of competition in aid of commerce. In the same connection, a labor dispute may be assumed as the basis of controversy, the litigation following a refusal on part of Zanes Freight Agency to sign a closed shop agreement with defendant union.[3]

The activities of appellants pursuant to strike were twofold in nature: First, consisting of letters, telegrams, personal calls, etc., giving notice of strike and invoking the proviso in contracts of truck line defendants against crossing of picket lines; second, the actual picketing of plaintiffs' places of business, consisting of the usual marching to-and-fro before the establishments involved in the dispute, accompanied by the display and carrying of signs, placards or banners bearing statements of grievance touching the particular controversy. Teller, Labor Disputes, Vol. 1, Sec. 109.

By stipulation of the parties and otherwise, the material facts herein are not controverted. Obviously, under the first phase of these strike activities (notices, messages and communications), a cessation of business relations with plaintiffs was demanded of the persons addressed, a refusal inviting similar consequences to themselves. Turner, union agent, frankly stated that the purpose of his calls upon both carriers and customers was to advertise the strike and to get them not to do business with Zanes; testifying:

> "Q. But, your object was that you wanted these people not to do business with him? A. Until this grievance was settled.
> "Q. That's right by way of punishment against him because he wouldn't sign your contract, isn't that true? A. That's right, sir. * * *
> "Q. You said a moment ago that where you do all these things that have been done in this case, and the party you are dealing with, your adversary, suffers some damages, so far as you are concerned that is only incidental? Is that your testimony? A. That's right, sir.
> "Q. And, if a man's business, by your activities, is completely destroyed, that is still incidental so far as you are concerned; is that correct? A. That's right, sir."

Vincent, an employee of H. J. Heinz Company, testified:

> "A. During our negotiations with the union, in which they negotiated a contract with us, Mr. Neal Hodges (Union agent) made the statement that they were going to put Mr. Zanes out of business if he didn't get in line with the union."

As a result, all except the railroads and two truck line defendants ceased doing business with Zanes Freight and other plaintiffs, to the Agency's immediate damage, it being stipulated that "Zanes Freight Agency sustained pecuniary loss and damage as a result of the activities engaged in by the defendant labor union, the exact amount of which is impossible of estimation and calculation at this time."

[3] Placard displayed by pickets at the Agency premises stated that Zanes Employees were on strike, although only three or four actually quit as a result of strike.

[Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade]

The foregoing facts conclusively establish a conspiracy in restraint of trade or secondary boycott; such activities on part of a labor organization being violative of Texas statutes defining trusts, conspiracies against trade, pools and monoplies, as our courts have consistently held from an early date. Arts. 7426, 7428, V. A. S.; Webb v. Cooks', Waiters' and Waitresses' Union, 205 S. W. 465; Borden Company v. Teamsters Local No. 133, 152 S. W. (2d) 828 [4 LABOR CASES ¶ 60,446]; Carpenters Union v. Ritter's Cafe, 138 S. W. (2d) 223, 149 S. W. (2d) 694; 86 L. Ed. 1143; 315 U. S. 722.

[Unlawful Activities]

Aside from the above aspect of boycott, these labor activities seeking to breach subsisting contracts between plaintiffs, truck line drivers and railroads, to which the local was neither a party nor in privity, are uniformly deemed tortious and enjoinable. Evans v. McKay, 212 S. W. 680; Texas Operators v. Galveston Operators, 132 S. W. (2d) 299; Carpenters Union v. Ritter, supra; Borden Company v. Local No. 133, supra. Likewise, as to the restraint against all nonappealing truck lines. The record discloses that these common carriers, upon insistence and demand of labor defendants, were refusing to accept freight from plaintiffs tendered in due course of business. This was clearly in violation of their duty as common carriers under Arts. 882, 884, 6360, V. A. S., to transport all tendered freight, constituting an unlawful act. Burlington Transportation Co. v. Hathaway, Iowa, 149 A. L. R. 1238.

But appellants strenuously argue (1) that all related dealings with truck lines, railroads and customers of plaintiff were simply incidents of "peaceful picketing" as authorized by Arts. 5152, 5153, 5154, V. A. S., and the Fourteenth Amendment, United States Constitution, guaranteeing the right of free speech; (2) that neither the common law nor Texas antitrust laws prohibit a labor combination from acts promotive of its own legitimate aims and purposes, even though others may be injured thereby; defendants in the instant case merely seeking public support in the obtaining of better wages, hours and conditions of employment; citing Harris v. Thomas, 217 S. W. 1068; Cline v. Insurance Exchange, 154 S. W. (2d) 491, affirmed 166 S. W. (2d) 677; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Milk Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U. S. 287; A. F. of L. v. Swing, 312 U. S. 321; Carlson v. California, 310 U. S. 106; Pastry Drivers, etc. v. Wohl, 315 U. S. 769; Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, 301 U. S. 468.

However proper may have been appellants' labor objective, the "peaceful picketing" contemplated under Art. 5153, V. A. S., must be conducted by "lawful means"; Justice Brandeis in the Senn case, supra, pointing out that the term implies "not only absence of violence, but absence of any unlawful act." In Borden Co. v. Local No. 133, supra, the court, after a review of the Swing and Meadowmoor cases, decided that the state court was not thereby precluded from affording protective relief where picketing involved "such conduct as the State is authorized to declare unlawful, or the breach of such laws as are necessary for the protection and welfare of its residents"; concluding that > "The anti-trust laws of this state, R. S. Articles 7426 and 7428 and Articles 1632, 1634, and 1635 of the Penal Code, which prohibit any attempt to create restrictions in the full pursuit of any lawful business, or any agreement or threat to boycott a person or association by a refusal to buy from or sell to him or it, or to induce others to do so, are in full force and effect. Their constitutionality has recently been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Tigner v. State of Texas, 310 U. S. 141, 60 S. Ct. 879, 84 L. Ed. 1124, 130 A. L. R. 1321, and they have not been repealed or modified by the statutes which provide for the creation of labor organizations and for peaceful picketing (R. S. Articles 5152, 5153, 5154), in so far as they apply to the state of facts in the instant case."

[Permissible Regulation of Picketing]

The second phase of strike activity—peaceful picketing—was permitted along with such regulations as the trial court considered reasonable in view of the attendant facts. Though the judgment provided that individual picketing should be for the limited purpose of persuading employees to leave said employment or the dissuading of third parties from the employment,[4] labor defendants were permitted to fully publicize their dispute by way of distribution of handbills, posting of notices on bulletin boards of various customers, truck line defendants and railroads. As viewed by the trial court, it was only the threats, intimidation, acts of coercion, unlawful interference with contractual relations and acts violative of the antitrust laws that became items of restraint.

Appellants complain, however, that their right to peacefully picket is subject to none of the limitations imposed by judgment perforce of the identification of that activity with freedom of speech under the Fourteenth Amendment, United States Constitution. Places of allowed picketing were at 1500 South Preston and at Pacific and Hawkins Streets, Dallas, limitations thereon generally being: Pickets shall not interfere with ingress and egress to premises; extent of picket line specified and prohibited during certain hours; prohibiting interference with movement of freight into and out of the premises and that the picketing should be peaceful.

Identification of picketing with the freedom of speech clause (U. S. Constitution) was first announced in Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, supra, 1937, viz:

> "Members of a union might, without special statutory authorization by a state, make known the facts of a labor dispute, for freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution."

There is no doubt, since above pronouncement and under succeeding decisions of the United States Supreme Court, that picketing in a labor dispute is a form of communication and, as such, has the cited constitutional protection. But implicit in these same decisions is the conclusion that "peaceful picketing" may involve something more than the exercise of freedom of speech, i. e., "dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute" (Thornhill v. Ala.); and it is this "something more" (words or acts having the effect of force) that may be the subject of reasonable regulation. The concurrence by Justice Douglas in Pastry Drivers, etc. v. Wohl, supra, goes on to say:

> "Picketing by an organized group is more than free speech since it involves patrol of a particular locality, and since the very presence of a picket line may induce action of one kind or another, quite irrespective of the nature of the ideas which are being disseminated. Hence those aspects of picketing make it the subject of restrictive regulation." (Emphasis ours.)

The main opinion (Wohl) likewise points out that

> "A state is not required to tolerate in all places and all circumstances even peaceful picketing by an individual."

And a conclusive answer to the insistence that picketing is constitutionally immune from all regulations may be found in Carpenters Union v. Ritter's Cafe, supra (affirmed by U. S. Supreme Court), where, in the dissenting opinion of Justice Reed, one of the most liberal members of that court, it is stated:

> "We are not here forced, as the Court assumes, to support a constitutional interpretation that peaceful picketing 'must be wholly immune from regulation by the community in order to protect the general interest.' We do not doubt the right of the state to impose not only some but many restrictions upon peaceful picketing. Reasonable numbers, quietness, truthful placards, open ingress and egress, suitable hours or other proper limitations, not destructive of the right to tell of labor difficulties, may be required." (Italics ours.)

The restrictions complained of herein, not being inconsistent with the right of free speech, but adjusted to it, we are not prepared to say that same were in anywise unwarranted or unreasonable.

[Jurisdiction]

Appellants further contend that the refusal of truck line defendants to accept appellees' freight was a matter solely within the jurisdiction of either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Texas Railroad Commission. Neither of the plaintiffs was a common carrier of freight and, owing to the nature of their several businesses, a certificate as such from the named Commissions was not required. Even conceding a right of the union to complain in such particular, we think that it was these administrative bodies that had no jurisdiction. Plaintiffs' suit was for prevention of boycott, against interference by labor defendants with third party contracts and to restrain the union in concert with others from violating the Texas antitrust laws, involving common law and statutory rights that the courts alone were competent to determine. 49 U. S. Code, sec 22; L. & N. Ry. Co. v. Cook Brewing Co., 223 U. S. 70; 56 L. Ed. 355; 11 Am. Jur. 129.

[Indefiniteness]

The entire judgment is attacked as vague and indefinite in various paragraphs and recitals. To the contrary, all parts thereof appear sufficiently definite and certain, labor defendants being clearly advised of what they can and cannot do. Reach of the injunction to "Disputes hereinafter arising" might ordinarily be censurable as prejudging future activities conceivably lawful. But the language in context relates to secondary picketing—always an illegal labor activity in Texas—according to the Borden case, supra, and now made expressly so by statutory enactment; see Senate Bill 167, 50th Leg. 1947, Art. 5154f, Vernon's Annotated Statutes.

[Improper Restraint on Communication]

However, in view of recent Supreme Court decisions identifying right of free speech with peaceful picketing, the wording of sec. E, paragraph three, of the judgment would appear as unduly limiting appellants' right to disseminate information relevant to its interest concerning the facts of a labor dispute. See Thornhill and Carlson cases, supra. The subdivision in question, expressly limiting instant picketing to persuasion and dissuasion of employees, may thus be disregarded and the general provision of paragraph eight substituted therefor, reading: "Nothing herein shall be construed to limit the right of C. B. Kepke and the Labor Union Defendants from publicizing the controversy with plaintiffs in an accurate, peaceful and truthful manner, without threats, coercion or intimidation, actual or implied, against any of the parties herein mentioned," except as limited by other paragraphs and portions of the injunction.

Otherwise, all points of appeal are overruled and judgment of the trial court affirmed.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Motion to Dismiss—Forum Non Conveniens—Doctrine Inapplicable.—A motion to dismiss a complaint charging a conspiracy to deprive an independent exhibitor of the right to negotiate for the exhibition of "first run" motion pictures on the ground of forum non conveniens is denied when it is found that defendants, by their failure to object promptly to the forum, have deprived plaintiffs of the opportunity to plead statutory exemptions to a statute of limitations raised by defendants. Defendants cannot answer, take depositions of plaintiffs, have plaintiffs incur pre-trial expenses, and then, after many months have passed, seek dismissal on the ground of forum non conveniens. If the complaint were dismissed, the action would have to be recommenced in another district after the expiration of the statutory exemption.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291, 1640.435, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.

[Motion to Dismiss]

RYAN, J.: All eleven defendants move to dismiss the complaint without prejudice.

The stated grounds of the motion are that "a fairer determination of the issues would be had, at greater convenience to this Court, to the parties and to the witnesses and personnel most directly concerned with this action, if the action were brought in Louisville, Kentucky in the District Court for the Western District of Kentucky."

This action is brought by plaintiffs under the "Sherman Act," 15 U. S. C. A. Sections 1 to 7 inclusive, and the "Clayton Act," 15 U. S. C. A. Sections 12 to 17 inclusive.

Plaintiff, Fifth and Walnut, Inc., a corporation of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, has its principal office in Louisville, Kentucky. Since December 10, 1943, it has leased and operated the National Theatre located at Fifth and Walnut Streets in Louisville. Plaintiff, Albert J. Hoffman, a resident of Indianapolis, Indiana, has owned the National Theatre since January 20, 1943 from which date to December 10, 1943 he operated the theatre at which time, while continuing in title to the fee, he leased the theatre to Fifth and Walnut, Inc.

All eleven defendants are engaged in the motion picture industry, as producers, distributors or exhibitors. Nine of the eleven defendants are described in the complaint as distributors. Five of these nine are incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware—Loew's Incorporated, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., Universal Pictures Company, Inc., United Artists Corporation and Republic Pictures Corporation; the remaining four—Paramount Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation and Columbia Pictures Corporation are incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. All nine distribute motion picture films throughout the United States and have their principal offices in New York City.

Of the two remaining defendants, one—United Artists Theatre Circuit, Inc., is a Maryland Corporation and the other—Marcus Loew Booking Agency is a New York corporation. The former owns Loew's United Artists Theatre and operates it in conjunction with Marcus Loew Booking Agency, a subsidiary of the defendant, Loew's Incorporated. It is not disputed that all eleven defendants irrespective of the state of their origin transact business and maintain offices in New York City within this district.

The facts recited herein are alleged in the complaint and for the purposes of this motion only are deemed established by affidavits submitted.

The complaint alleges that defendants have conspired and agreed together to deprive and have deprived plaintiffs of the right to negotiate for the exhibition and showing of "first run" pictures at the National Theatre in Louisville.

The defendants in their answers deny this charge. They allege that their refusal to license pictures for first run at this theatre was prompted solely by economic reasons and sound legitimate business considerations. They say, in explaining any apparent uniformity and similarity in conduct, that they individually and separately arrived at the same conclusion—that each of them would make more money and realize higher rental if his respective pictures were licensed first run to theatres other than the National.

As an affirmative defense defendants plead a one-year statute of limitations effective in Kentucky. Their moving affidavit concerning this defense makes the following comments (pp. 14-15):

> "It is very well established that there is no federal statute of limitations applicable to anti-trust actions brought under the Federal Laws. Therefore, the local statute of limitations should govern this question."
> "However, a very important subsidiary question has been raised by the answers of these defendants and will be raised at the trial, namely, the question of the Statute of Limitations that is applicable here."

And, defendants seek to invoke the doctrine of forum non conveniens.

Entering upon a determination of the merits of the motion the court is mindful of the admonition, "But unless the balance is strongly in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff's choice of forum should rarely be disturbed." Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501, 508.

At the very outset the court is led to a consideration of the historical facts of this litigation. The complaint herein was filed on July 11, 1946 and defendants were served in this district within a day or two thereafter. By stipulations, defendants' time to answer was extended and issue was joined by the service of their answers on September 26, 1946. Notice of this motion was first given plaintiffs on May 17, 1947; it was returnable on May 23, 1947 at which time it was marked "off" the calendar by consent of both sides. It was not returned to the motion calendar and submitted for consideration until the December, 1947 Term.

The notice of motion was served ten months after the commencement of the action and eight months after issue was joined. It was not brought on for submission to the court until seven months later, or almost fifteen months after service of answer. This long delay does not impress one as being the course usually taken by defendants who feel that they have been vexed, harassed or oppressed by plaintiffs' choice of an inconvenient forum. It is not the spontaneous hue and outcry of persons who have been outraged.

The court does not adopt plaintiffs' interpretation of Rule 12 (b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, that this motion should be denied because not made before answer. The objection of forum non conveniens is not a defense to improper venue, which must be asserted by preliminary motion or answer. It is simply a motion which may be addressed to the discretion of the court at any time. Weiss et al. v. Routh et al., 149 Fed. (2d) 193; Burdick v. Freeman, 120 N. Y. 420; Collard v. Beach, 81 App. Div. 58. It may be raised after as well as before answer, but the objection should be taken with reasonable and appropriate promptness. (An examination of the Gulf Oil case, supra, and Koster v. Lumbermens Mutual Co., 330 U. S. 518, shows that the defendants in those actions objected to the forum before answer.)

Defendants cannot answer, take depositions of plaintiffs, permit plaintiffs to examine witnesses on deposition, have plaintiffs incur pre-trial expenses in excess of $7500 (out of which $690 costs were paid to each of defendants' counsel to reimburse them for expenses on the taking of depositions in Kentucky), and prepare for trial and, finally after many months have passed, raise an objection to the forum for the first time. Such inaction does not prompt the court to exercise discretion in their favor.

The court is not impressed by defendants' complaint of the added inconvenience and cost of securing the attendance of expert witnesses in New York over what it would incur in having the same witnesses testify in Kentucky. "Furthermore, the plea of inconvenience loses some of its persuasiveness in the mouth of a highly solvent defendant, particularly one charged with personal wrongdoing." Harvard Law Review, Vol. 60, p. 933; Cf. dissent of Mr. Justice Cardozo in Rogers v. Guaranty Trust Co., 288 U. S. 123, 151, and Mr. Justice Jackson concurring in Miles v. Illinois Central R. R., 315 U. S. 698, 706-08. The court cannot find that the forum selected by plaintiffs is inconvenient to the point of oppression.

The defense of the Kentucky statute of limitations pleaded in the answer of defendants is as they describe it "a very important subsidiary question," and particularly so on this application.

By the law of the State of Kentucky, a one-year statute of limitations governs this action. The plaintiffs rely in large measure, to meet this pleaded defense, on the Act of Congress passed October 10, 1942 (c. 589, 56 Stat. 781) as amended June 30, 1945 (c. 213, 59 Stat. 306), which plaintiffs contend (and it seems rightly so) suspended the running of the statute of limitations on any violation of the anti-trust laws until June 30, 1946.

Plaintiffs contend that if this action has to be recommenced in Kentucky after June 30, 1947 (as it will have to be if at all in the event the motion is granted), plaintiffs will lose the benefit of these statutes. The defendants to counter this objection now suggest in a supplemental memorandum submitted in support of the motion that,

> "If this court should fear that the granting of this motion would result in plaintiffs' being barred by the applicable statute of limitations in the forum where the action is reinstituted, it could condition dismissal of the complaint upon an agreement by the defendants that, for the purpose of applying the appropriate statute of limitations, the action, if reinstituted promptly in the appropriate forum, would be deemed to have been commenced on July 11, 1946." (pp. 1-2.)

The ultimate value of the defense of the Kentucky statute of limitations is not determined on this motion. It is sufficient to find that it does raise an important and substantial question, and the only apparent answer to it which plaintiffs can make would have to be predicated upon the Act of Congress of October 10, 1942 and June 30, 1945, supra, and these acts do not extend the time in which suit may be commenced beyond June 30, 1947.

Mr. Justice Jackson in the Gulf Oil case, supra, at p. 506, observes: "In all cases in which the doctrine of forum non conveniens comes into play, it presupposes at least two forums in which the defendant is amenable to process; the doctrine furnishes criteria for choice between them." The choice of forums indicated by Mr. Justice Jackson must be a fair and real one with equal opportunity for successful conduct of the action by plaintiff in both. Defendants, by their failure to object promptly to the forum have deprived plaintiffs of the opportunity to plead in Kentucky the exemptions to the statute of limitations granted by Act of Congress.

Defendants' offer to limit the plea of the defense of the statute of limitations does not appeal to the court.

The very grave and present possibility that by the granting of this motion to dismiss, the plaintiffs will be deprived of the right to plead these statutes in answer to the defense of the statute of limitations is sufficient to impel the court to deny the motion. Jurisdiction has been retained frequently because a statute of limitations has barred suit elsewhere. Williamson v. Palmer, 181 Misc. 610; Randle v. Inecto, 131 Misc. 261; The Yale Law Journal, Vol. 56, p. 1237, footnote 22.

To justify the exercise of discretion in the granting of this motion the basis for it should exist and be found in the facts of the litigation itself. The court should not, by imposing conditions or by accepting stipulations from the defendants, bring about a change in the factual situation to warrant a favorable determination, where without such conditions and stipulations such action would not be equitable.

But, above all, the plaintiffs assert that under the special venue provisions of the Clayton Act, they have an absolute right to bring this action in this district and that their choice of a forum cannot be defeated on any ground if jurisdiction over the defendants is obtained.

Section 12 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 22) provides:

> "Any suit, action, or proceeding under the anti-trust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

All of the defendants are corporations, inhabitants of and are found and transact business within this district.

Section 12 of the Clayton Act, supra, is unmistakably a special venue provision and as such falls squarely within the boundaries set by Mr. Justice Jackson in the Gulf Oil case, supra, wherein he wrote:

> "It is true that in cases under the Federal Employers' Liability Act we have held that plaintiff's choice of a forum cannot be defeated on the basis of forum non conveniens. But this was because the special venue act under which those cases are brought was believed to require it. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44; Miles v. Illinois Central R. R., 315 U. S. 698." (p. 505.)

In passing upon the application of Section 12 of the Clayton Act, it was held in Momand v. Paramount Pictures Distributing Co., Inc. et al., 19 Fed. Supp. 102, at 103, by the District Court of Massachusetts, that:

> "In the case at bar, a citizen of the United States is invoking the jurisdiction of the federal courts to enforce in her own right a remedy given to her by acts of Congress. These statutes expressly confer upon the court jurisdiction to entertain such a suit and give to the plaintiff a choice of districts in which to sue. Eastman Kodak Co. of New York v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U. S. 359, 47 S. Ct. 400, 71 L. Ed. 684; Haskell v. Aluminum Co. of America (D. C.), 14 F. 2d 864."
> "I do not find anything in the federal statutes, or in the adjudication, which suggests that the court has any such discretionary power, or any such control over the plaintiff's remedy."

Of the special venue provision in Section 6 of the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 56), Mr. Justice Reed in Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44, at p. 52, stated:

> "Section 6 establishes venue for an action in the federal courts. * * * It is clear that the allowance or denial of this federal privilege is a matter of federal law, not a matter of state law under Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64, 72."

And, the court went on to say at page 54:

> "When the section was enacted, it filled the entire field of venue in federal courts.

A privilege of venue, granted by the legislative body which created this right of action, cannot be frustrated for reasons of convenience or expense."

That portion of Section 6 of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, which was held to be dispositive of the Kepner case, supra, reads as follows:

"Under this chapter an action may be brought in a district court of the United States, in the district of the residence of the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be doing business at the time of commencing such action."

The wide choice of venue granted to plaintiffs under this provision is strikingly similar to Section 12 of the Clayton Act hereinabove quoted.

The opinion in United States v. National City Lines, Inc., et al., 7 F. R. D. 456, cited by defendants cannot be accepted or applied. It appears to be an attempted judicial limitation of a clear and definite special venue act affording plaintiffs a privilege of venue, which should not be denied them.

[Motion Denied]

For all the foregoing reasons the motion is denied.

[¶ 62,220] Opinion of the Attorney General of Montana.

Addressed to the State Board of Food Distributors, Ex Officio Montana Trade Commission, Helena, Montana, by R. V. Bottomly, Attorney General. Official Opinion Vol. 22, No. 102. February 9, 1948.

Montana Unfair Practices Act

Implied Powers of Commission—Authority to Call Conference.—If, in the judgment of the State Board of Food Distributors, Ex Officio Montana Trade Commission, a conference will aid the Commission in carrying out the purposes of the Act, it is within the implied powers of the Commission to provide by rule for the calling and holding of such a conference.

See the Montana Unfair Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8488.

[Question]

You have requested my opinion as to the authority of your board to call a conference with reference to wholesale prices within the State of Montana, under the Unfair Practices Act, and to expend funds of the commission in defraying the expenses of such conference. You have advised me as follows:

"This application, although informal, was made under the provisions of Rule XXVII of the established rules of the Montana Trade Commission. This rule provides that the Commission may call such a conference after reasonable public notice of the time and place, and that a transcript of the conference proceedings shall be made and filed in the office of the Commission.

"This procedure, set up by Rule XXVII will require the expenditure of public funds for the compilation of the transcript and the public notices . . .".

[Rule XXVII]

Rule XXVII promulgated by your commission, insofar as pertinent here, provides:

"(s) Purpose. The Unfair Practices Act Conference procedure has for its purpose the establishment, by the Commission, of rules in the interest of more efficiently administering the Unfair Practices Act. This procedure affords opportunity for voluntary participation by interested parties in the formulation of rules to provide for adjusting trade practices in conformity to the Unfair Practices Act. These rules may also contain provisions to foster and promote fair competitive conditions and to establish standards of ethical business practices in harmony with public policy under the provisions of the Unfair Practices Act of Montana."

Section 14 of Chapter 80, Laws of 1937, known as the "Unfair Practices Act," provides:

"The legislature declares that the purpose of this act is to safeguard the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition, by prohibiting unfair and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented. This Act shall be literally construed that its beneficial purposes may be subserved." (Emphasis supplied.)

[Construction of Act]

Giving to the Act a literal construction as provided in Section 14, it is clear the legislature intended that the commission have broad powers and discretion in the administration of the Act to the end that the purpose thereof be fulfilled. Thus it follows that any action deemed necessary or advisable by the commission to obtain the ends intended by the legislature in the administration of the Act, as expressed in Section 14, supra, is within its power and authority, express or implied.

[Implied Powers]

The Supreme Court of Montana in the case of Guillot v. State Highway Com., et al., 102 Mont. 149, 153, 154, 56 Pac. (2d) 1062, in speaking of the implied powers of a board or commission, said:

"But the powers which an officer, commission or department may exercise are not confined to those expressly granted by the Constitution or statutes of the state."

"'In addition to powers expressly conferred upon him by law, an officer has by implication such powers as are necessary for the due and efficient exercise of those expressly granted, or such as may be fairly implied therefrom. But no power will be implied other than those which are necessary for the effective exercise and discharge of the powers and duties expressly conferred.'"

And further, in the Guillot case, supra, the Court said:

"Where the legislature sees fit to confer upon a board or commission such broad general powers, the repository of the power is vested with discretion in choosing the means and methods of accomplishing the result expected, and, in the absence of fraud or manifest abuse of that discretion, its determination is conclusive."

[Appropriation for Expenses]

The legislature has made an appropriation to the commission "for salaries and expenses." The term "salaries and expenses" is defined in the appropriation bill to include "operation," which in turn is defined as "all other expenditures which are necessary for the operation of the department, board, bureau, commission or institution to which the appropriation applies, including wages of employees paid to temporary employees for work not considered of a continuous nature." See House Bill No. 437, Laws of 1947, page 749.

[Authority to Conduct Hearings]

It is my opinion that the provisions of Section 12B, which was added by the amendment to Chapter 80, Laws of 1937, by Section 3 of Chapter 50, Laws of 1939, under which the Commission is given certain specific authority in conducting hearings and investigations "which, in the opinion of the Commission, are necessary and proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it . . ." clearly show the legislature contemplated hearings and investigations by the Commission, other than those specifically provided with regard to the retail trade. This but strengthens my answer to your question.

[Implied Power to Call Conference]

It is, therefore, my opinion that if in the judgment of your Commission a conference such as is proposed will aid the Commission in carrying out the purposes of the Act, it is within the implied powers of the Commission to provide by rule for the calling and holding of such a conference. Expenses necessary for such a conference would come within the term "operation" as used in the appropriation bill and therefore may be paid from the appropriation made to the Commission.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Decree—Automobile Finance Companies—Effective Date of Provision Extended.—Upon consent of all parties a final decree was entered in proceedings under the Sherman Act, pending determination of similar actions against other defendants, prohibiting an automobile manufacturer from discriminating among automobile finance companies, and from requiring dealers to patronize particular finance organizations, but permitting the manufacturer to adopt plans of financing and to recommend and advertise such plans, and imposing restrictions upon certain collection methods. The decree was modified on the dates indicated above, and is further modified by an order which provides that if a final order requiring another manufacturer to divest itself of all interest in its finance company shall not have been entered on or before May 1, 1948, nothing in the decree shall preclude the defendant from acquiring and retaining ownership of, or interest in, any finance company or from dealing with such company and with the dealers in the manner provided in the decree.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1550.10.

E. J. Ford, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; Luther M. Swygert, Assistant United States Attorney, for complainant.

Nicholas Kelley, of Larkin, Rathbone & Perry, New York City, N. Y., S. J. Crumpacker, of Parker, Crabill, Crumpacker, May, Carlisle & Beamer, South Bend, Ind., for defendant Chrysler Corporation.

W. Russel Mules, associated with Duane R. Dills, Esq., Boston, Mass., Israel B. Oseas, New York City, N. Y., for defendant Commercial Credit Company.

On modification of January 28, 1948:

For plaintiff: Alexander M. Campbell, United States Attorney, Fort Wayne, Indiana; Holmes Baldridge, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

For defendant: William D. Donnelly, Washington, D. C.

Final Decree

SLICK, D. J.: 1. The United States of America filed its petition herein on November 7, 1938; each of the respondents appeared and filed its answer to such petition, and asserted the truth of its answer and its innocence of any violation of law; the petitioner and the said respondents desire to avoid the expenses of a trial of the issues therein and the loss of time occasioned thereby; no testimony having been taken, each of the respondents consented to the entry of this decree without any findings of fact, upon condition that neither such consent nor this decree shall be considered an admission or adjudication that it has violated any statute; and the United States of America by its counsel having consented to the entry of this decree and to each and every provision thereof, and having moved the court for this injunction.

Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:

2. That the court has jurisdiction of all persons and parties hereto; and for the purposes of this decree and proceedings for the enforcement thereof, and for no other purpose, that the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter hereof and the petition states a cause of action against the respondents under the Act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies".

4. The respondents, their officers, directors, agents and employees, be and they are hereby enjoined from doing the acts hereby prohibited and to do the acts hereby directed.

[Definitions of Terms of Decree]

5. The following terms, as used in this decree shall have the following meanings:

(a) "Person" shall mean a person, firm, corporation or association.

(b) "Dealer" shall mean a person who holds a franchise from, or approved by, the Manufacturer that provides for the purchase at wholesale of new automobiles made by the Manufacturer, and who resells the automobiles at retail.

(c) "Wholesale financing" shall mean the advancing by a finance company, as hereinafter defined, of money or credit to or for the account of a dealer to cover, in whole or in part, the cost of new automobiles ordered by the dealer at wholesale.

(d) "Retail financing" shall mean the purchase or other acquisition of retail time sales paper from dealers by finance companies, as hereinafter defined.

(e) "Finance charge" shall mean the difference between the cash delivered price of an automobile and the price of that automobile when sold on an installment payment plan, including or not including (as the plan may provide) insurance for the retail purchaser.

(f) "Finance company" shall mean a person engaged chiefly in wholesale financing or retail financing, or both.

(g) "Retail time sales paper" shall mean any conditional sale contract, chattel mortgage, lease, note or other instrument given to evidence or secure the obligation to pay the whole or any part of the price of automobiles sold by a dealer at retail.

(h) "A finance company" or "any finance company" shall include Respondent Finance Company.

(i) "Registered finance company" shall mean a finance company which shall be registered as provided in sub-paragraph (j) of paragraph 6 of this decree including Respondent Finance Company if it be a registered finance company.

(j) "Ford Motor Company" means Ford Motor Company, a corporation of the State of Delaware and its subsidiaries and successors. "General Motors Corporation" means General Motors Corporation, a corporation of the State of Delaware and its subsidiaries and successors, and "General Motors Acceptance Corporation" means General Motors Acceptance Corporation, a corporation of the State of New York and General Motors Acceptance Corporation of Indiana, Incorporated, a corporation of the State of Indiana, and their subsidiaries and successors.

6. The Manufacturer:

(a) Shall permit any finance company or other person to pay for any automobile shipped or otherwise delivered by the Manufacturer to any dealer, upon written specific or continuing authority of the dealer;

[Nondiscriminatory Assignments]

(b) So long as the Manufacturer shall continue to give or assign to Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company, any document of title or lien in respect of such automobiles, it shall not refuse, upon written request of any other finance company, to make available or assign to it similar documents of title or lien in respect of automobiles similarly shipped or delivered to the dealer and paid for by the finance company upon substantially similar terms and conditions;

[Nondiscriminatory Use of Space]

(c) So long as the Manufacturer shall continue to furnish Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company space for maintaining an office in any place of business of the Manufacturer, it shall not refuse, upon substantially equivalent terms and conditions and upon written request of any other finance company that extends wholesale financing facilities to dealers operating under franchise of the Manufacturer, to furnish it space for maintaining an office in such place of business; provided that it shall not be a violation of this decree for the Manufacturer to furnish the same only to registered finance companies as defined in sub-paragraph (j) of this paragraph 6;

[Nondiscriminatory Informational Service]

(d) So long as the Manufacturer shall knowingly continue to furnish to Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company the identity of or other information concerning dealers or prospective dealers, it shall not knowingly refuse to furnish corresponding information, upon substantially similar terms and conditions and upon specific or continuing request as to identity and specific but non-continuing request as to other information, to any other finance company whose territory includes the location of such dealer's or prospective dealer's place of business; provided that it shall not be a violation of this decree for the Manufacturer to furnish the same only to registered finance companies as defined in sub-paragraph (j) of this paragraph 6, or only to a finance company designated in writing to the Manufacturer by the dealer or prospective dealer;

[Discriminatory Financing]

(e) Except as provided by sub-paragraphs (j) and (k) of this paragraph 6,

(i) the Manufacturer shall not establish any practice, procedure or plan for the retail or wholesale financing of automobiles for the purpose of enabling Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company or companies to enjoy a competitive advantage in obtaining the patronage of dealers through any service, facility or privilege extended by the manufacturer pursuant to such practice, procedure or plan if such service, facility or privilege or a service facility or privilege corresponding thereto, is not made available upon its written request to any other finance company upon substantially similar terms and conditions; and

(ii) so long as the Manufacturer shall continue to afford any service, facility or privilege not otherwise specifically referred to in this decree to Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company or companies, it shall not refuse to afford similar or corresponding services, facilities or privileges upon substantially similar terms and conditions and upon written request to any other finance company for the purpose of giving Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company or companies a competitive advantage in obtaining the patronage of dealers: provided that it shall not be a violation of this decree for the Manufacturer to afford such service, facility or privilege only to registered finance companies as defined in sub-paragraph (j) of this paragraph 6, or only to a finance company designated in writing to the Manufacturer by the dealer or prospective dealer;

the written request shall specify in each instance the particular service, facility or privilege desired;

(f) The Manufacturer shall not give or make available or deny or threaten to deny to any dealer any service or facility, or discriminate among its dealers in any other manner, for the purpose of influencing a dealer to patronize Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company, or registered finance companies;

[Exclusive Financing Contracts]

(g) The Manufacturer shall not enter into or further continue any contract or agreement with any dealer (1) which provides that the dealer shall patronize only Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company selected by the Manufacturer or registered finance companies; or (2) which requires the dealer to observe any plan for or rate of financing the purchase and sale of automobiles designated by the Manufacturer;

(h) The Manufacturer shall not cancel or terminate any contract, franchise or agreement with any dealer, or threaten to do so, because of failure of such dealer to patronize Respondent Finance Company, or any other finance company, or because of the failure of the dealer to patronize registered finance companies;

(i) The Manufacturer shall not, except in each instance upon written request of the dealer or prospective dealer, arrange or agree with Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company that an agent of the Manufacturer and an agent of the finance company shall together be present with any dealer or prospective dealer for the purpose of influencing the dealer to patronize Respondent Finance Company or such other finance company; provided, however, that it shall not be a violation of this decree for the Manufacturer to assist any dealer or prospective dealer, because of said dealer's or prospective dealer's financial situation or requirements, by joint conference with him and a representative of a particular finance company, to obtain special facilities or services (such term not including only the financing of the shipment or delivery of automobiles to such dealer or prospective dealer and/or only the purchase or acquisition of retail time sales paper from him in the regular course of business) from the particular finance company, and in part consideration of such special facilities or services, for such dealer or prospective dealer to arrange to do business with such finance company on an exclusive basis for a reasonable period of time as may be agreed between them:

["Registered" Finance Companies]

(j) As used in this decree the word "registered" as applied to a finance company means a finance company that shall have done the following things and shall have filed a statement that meets the following requirements:

[Statement of Registered Finance Company]

1. The statement shall be signed and acknowledged by the finance company and sworn to by an officer thereof, and shall have been filed in this proceeding and a copy thereof certified by the clerk shall have been served on the Manufacturer.

2. The finance company shall not in any manner have withdrawn the statement or rendered it ineffective.

3. The court shall not have made an order to the effect that the finance company shall cease to be a registered finance company; or, if so, the finance company shall have obtained an order reinstating it as a registered finance company, or otherwise shall have become again a registered finance company.

4. The statement shall be in the following form:

"To Chrysler Corporation (hereinafter called the 'Manufacturer'):

"(A) This statement is made pursuant to sub-paragraph (j) of paragraph 6 of a decree of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, in a cause entitled 'United States of America v. Chrysler Corporation et al.,' dated November 15, 1938.

"(B) The undersigned finance company, in acquiring retail time sales paper, arising from sales of automobiles, from dealers of the Manufacturer, wherever located, will conform to the following rules:

(1) If the finance company acquires retail time sales paper from a dealer of the Manufacturer on a finance plan which includes insurance to be arranged for by the finance company, the finance company shall (unless the insurance company to which the risk is submitted declines to write the risk) arrange for such insurance as the dealer represents to the finance company is to be arranged for by it and shall mail or cause to be mailed to the buyer a policy or certificate of insurance so arranged for within twenty-five days after the finance company acquires such retail time sales paper. Such policy or certificate shall recite the character of the coverage and the amount of the insurance premium;

(2) The finance company will not require or accept assignments of wages or salaries, or garnish wages or salaries to collect deficiency judgments in respect of automobiles sold for less than $1,000 and for private and non-commercial use unless, prior to repossession, it has requested the buyer to return the automobile to it and he has not done so;

(3) The finance company will not take any deficiency judgment where the retail purchaser of an automobile, sold for private and noncommercial use, has paid at least 50% of his note or other obligation, and will not collect from any retail purchaser of an automobile, through deficiency or other judgments, any amount in excess of its actual losses and expenses upon the failure of such purchaser to pay his note or other obligation, and will pay to or credit to the account of such purchaser any surplus over the amount owing by him on his note or other obligation which the finance company or its nominee or its affiliated or subsidiary company may realize on the purchaser's note or other obligation and the automobile or any other security therefor;

(4) The finance company will not assign or transfer any retail times sales paper owned or held by it to any other person, except a dealer from whom the finance company acquired the paper on a full recourse basis rather than upon a non-recourse basis or upon the dealer's agreement to repurchase the automobile if repossessed, without limiting the rights, and creating an obligation in its assignee and his successors in interest, to proceed against the retail buyer only in the manner and to the extent that the finance company is authorized to proceed hereunder;

(5) The finance company will not make a higher charge, for granting an extension or rewriting a transaction than the approximate pro-rata equivalent of the original finance charge, or charge more than 5 per cent of the delinquent instalments for reinstating a delinquent account or charge more than its out-of-pocket expense plus a reasonable amount for the time of its employees as collection or repossession expenses;

(6) The finance company will not require the dealer to take a chattel mortgage or other lien on property other than the automobile purchased, as additional security for the payment for such automobile sold for private and noncommercial use; and will not accept an assignment from the dealer of such a chattel mortgage or other lien;

(7) The finance company will not represent to any person that it is, in any way, connected or affiliated with the Manufacturer, or that it has been approved, recommended or endorsed by the Manufacturer, or in any way ascribe to the Manufacturer or its dealers responsibility for, or authorization of, its acts; but this shall not prevent the finance company from stating if that be the case that it is a registered finance company, and at any time when a plan adopted by the Manufacturer is in effect this shall not prevent the finance company from stating if that be the case that it is a registered finance company and is offering financing service in accordance with the plan;

(8) The finance company will not intionally do any thing injurious to the good will of the Manufacturer or to the reputation of its products, or to the good will of its dealers except as may result from the assertion of any legal or contractual rights;

(9) The finance company will not without the consent of the Manufacturer disclose to any competitor of the Manufacturer information which it shall have received from the Manufacturer;

(10) The finance company will disclose to the purchaser whatever information is required to be disclosed by, and will otherwise comply with any further order of the court entered pursuant to paragraph 8 of the decree hereinbefore mentioned;

(11) The finance company will not violate any other reasonable rule hereinafter from time to time established by the Manufacturer, approved by the Department of Justice of the United States and incorporated herein by the further order of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, after notice by registered mail to all registered finance companies and notice in such form as the court may determine to be reasonable to other finance companies and interested parties and an opportunity for hearing to the persons so notified.

"(C) The area within which the finance company conducts its business is: [insert either 'the United States' or the names of specific states, counties or cities], and notwithstanding the designation of an area, the finance company nevertheless will comply with clauses (B) and (D) in all areas in which it may now or hereafter do business with dealers of the Manufacturer.

"(D) Until the effective date of any withdrawal of this statement by the finance company in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of sub-paragraph (k), or in the manner provided by paragraph 5 or by paragraph 6, of sub-paragraph (j), of paragraph 6 of said decree, all retail times sales paper, created after the effective date of any plan or plans or modification thereof and covering new automobiles made by the Manufacturer, acquired by the finance company from the Manufacturer's dealers (whether located in the area described in Clause (C) hereof or elsewhere), shall be acquired by it in accordance with the terms of any plan or plans of financing adopted by the Manufacturer as provided by said sub-paragraph (j) and then in effect; provided:

a. The finance charges included in such retail paper may be less than the finance charges specified by such plan or plans or modification thereof and the other terms of such paper may be more favorable to the retail purchaser than the terms so specified; and b. the finance company may acquire retail time sales paper covering new automobiles made by the Manufacturer in which the retail purchaser of the automobile is required to pay a finance charge in excess of the finance charge specified in the plan so adopted or modification thereof, but only if the finance company shall promptly credit such retail purchaser on the time purchase price of the automobile with the amount of the excess. The words 'finance charge' as used in this statement shall mean the difference between the cash delivered price of an automobile and the price of that automobile when sold on an instalment payment plan, including or not including (as the plan may provide) insurance for the retail purchaser.

"(E) This statement is filed on behalf of, and shall bind, the undersigned finance company and all finance companies owned or controlled by the undersigned finance company and all finance companies which own or control the undersigned finance company or are under common ownership or control with it.

[Appropriate changes to be made for finance companies which are not corporations.]

[Withdrawal of Statement]

5. Any registered finance company may file with the court a notice in writing of its withdrawal of its sworn statement above mentioned, and serve upon the Manufacturer a copy of said notice, certified by the Clerk of the Court, and ninety days after such service or at such later date as may be stated in the notice, the finance company shall cease to be a registered finance company and the Manufacturer shall notify its deaders that such finance company has ceased to be a registered finance company.

[New Rules; Notice]

6. The Manufacturer shall notify each finance company, which makes written specific or continuing request therefor, by registered mail of every additional rule which is incorporated in the sworn statement as provided in sub-division (11) of clause (B) of sub-paragraph (j) of this paragraph 6. The notice shall set forth the provisions of the rule and the date, not less than thirty days after the date of mailing the notice, upon which the rule shall go into effect. Any registered finance company so notified may before that date file with the court notice in writing setting forth that it withdraws its sworn statement because it does not intend to be bound by said rule, and serve upon the Manufacturer a copy of said notice certified by the Clerk of the Court, and thereupon the finance company at once and without lapse of any time shall cease to be a registered finance company and the Manufacturer shall notify its dealers that said finance company has ceased to be a registered finance company.

[Violation of Statement]

7. The Petitioner, the Manufacturer or any registered finance company shall be entitled to make application to the court, for an order herein finding and adjudging that a registered finance company has failed to comply with its sworn statement, and jurisdiction of this cause is reserved for the entry of orders upon such applications as the facts and justice may require (after such notice and hearing as the court may direct) suspending or revoking the registration of any registered company or dismissing the application. If the order shall provide that such finance company shall cease to be a registered finance company indefinitely, the finance company may, not less than six months thereafter, apply to the court for an order reinstating it as a registered finance company, and jurisdiction of this cause is reserved to grant or deny such application, or grant it upon such terms and conditions, if any, as the court may determine for the purpose of assuring further compliance with such finance company's sworn statement. Upon the entry of an order finding that a finance company has failed to comply with its sworn statement, as aforsaid, if the Manufacturer shall have made the application for such an order, or upon service upon the Manufacturer of a copy of said order certified by the Clerk of the Court if another party shall have made such application, the Manufacturer shall notify its dealers of the entry and the terms of such order and shall treat said company as a company that is not a registered finance company or as the order of the court may require.

8. Withdrawal of its sworn statement by a registerd finance company and any order suspending or revoking the registration of any registered company or dismissing the application shall be applicable to all finance companies embraced by the sworn statement under clause (E) thereof.

[Service of Papers]

9. Service of all papers hereinbefore required to be made upon the Manufacturer shall be made personally upon an officer of the Manufacturer, or by registered mail to the Manufacturer, at its principal office now located in Highland Park, Detroit, Mich.

10. Service of all parers upon a finance company pursuant to this decree shall be made personally or by registered mail addressed to it at its principal office as shown in its statement.

[Manufacturer's Advertising of Finance Companies]

(k) The Manufacturer shall not, except as hereinafter provided, recommend, endorse or advertise the Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company or companies to any dealer or to the public; provided, however, that nothing in this decree contained shall prevent the Manufacturer in good faith:

(1) From adopting from time to time a plan or plans of financing retail sales of new automobiles made by the Manufacturer or from time to time withdrawing or modifying the same;

(2) From recommending to its dealers the use of such plans;

(3) From advising its dealers that such plans are available through all registered finance companies which have indicated their readiness to do business under the plan in such dealers' area or from advising the names of such companies;

(4) From advertising to the public and recommending the use of such plans;

(5) From advertising to the public that such plans are available through all registered finance companies which have indicated their readiness to do business under the plan in the area to which such advertisement is directed or from advertising the names of such companies.

1. The Manufacturer shall notify each finance company, which makes written specific or continuing request therefor by registered mail, of every plan and modification thereof that the Manufacturer shall adopt. The notice shall set forth the provisions of the plan or modification and the date, not less than thirty days after the date of mailing the notice, upon which the plan or modification shall go into effect. Any registered finance company so notified may before that date file with the court notice in writing, setting forth that it withdraws its sworn statement because it does not intend to be bound by said plan or modification, as the case may be, and serve upon the Manufacturer a copy of said notice certified by the Clerk of the Court, and thereupon the finance company at once and without lapse of any time shall cease to be a registered finance company and the Manufacturer shall notify its dealers that said finance company has ceased to be a registered finance company.

2. Nothing in this decree shall prevent the Manufacturer from obtaining such assurances as it may desire from one or more finance companies before or after adoption of any plan or modification that it or they will make such plan or modification available for at least a specified period of time; provided, however, that the Manufacturer may not give such finance company or finance companies, as consideration for such assurances, any consideration prohibited by this decree.

3. The adoption or modification of any plan under this sub-paragraph (k) shall not preclude any aggrieved finance company or any other aggrieved person, who considers that such plan or modification constitutes an unreasonablbe restraint of trade or commerce in automobiles under the Sherman Anti-trust Law from applying to this court to vacate such plan, and the court reserves jurisdiction to make an order upon such application approving or vacating such plan, upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an order of vacation subsequently reversed or vacated.

(l) The Manufacturer shall not use any information obtained from any dealer, his agents, representatives, servants and employees, either directly by examination or inspection of his books or records, or through financial, operating or other statements or reports or otherwise, nor shall it require disclosure of any such information, for the purpose of influencing such dealer to patronize Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company or group of finance companies. Nothing herein contained shall apply to the disclosure or use of any information at the dealer's written request or for the purpose of assisting the dealer, at his specific written request, to obtain wholesale or retail financing or special facilities or services from Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company designated by the dealer in such written request.

[Duties of Financing Companies]

7. The Respondent Finance Company:

(a) Shall not represent in any manner to any dealer that the Manufacturer requires him to patronize Respondent Finance Company, or that his failure to do so will result in the cancellation or termination by the Manufacturer of his contract, franchise of agreement, or in the loss of any advantage, service or facility furnished by the Manufacturer, or that Respondent Finance Company can obtain from the Manufacturer any facility, service or privilege which is not available to any other finance company, except (if Respondent Finance Company is a registered finance company) such services, facilities or privileges as result from the registration of a registered finance company, under paragraph 6 of this decree;

[Payment of Dealer Reserves]

(b) Until further order of this court pursuant to paragraph 8 hereof, shall pay to every dealer who ceases to do business with it the amount of all reserves standing to the credit of such dealer, less any off-setting indebtedness of such dealer, such payment to be made not later than thirty (30) days after liquidation of all of the retail paper acquired from such dealer, and shall comply with any provisions relating thereto contained in any further decree entered pursuant to paragraph 8 of this decree;

[Wholesale Financing Contracts]

(c) Shall not enter into any contract, agreement or understanding with any dealer, in connection with wholesale financing for which a separate charge is not made, which requires the dealer to deal with Respondent Finance Company in respect of retail financing of automobiles not financed at wholesale by Respondent Finance Company;

[Manufacturer-Finance Company Joint Solicitation]

(d) Shall not, except upon written request of the dealer or prospective dealer, arrange or agree with the Manufacturer that an agent of the Manufacturer and an agent of Respondent Finance Company shall together be present with any dealer or prospective dealer for the purpose of influencing the dealer or prospective dealer to patronize Respondent Finance Company; provided, however, that it shall not be a violation of this decree for Respondent Finance Company by joint conference with a dealer or prospective dealer and a representative of the Manufacturer to agree to furnish to such dealer or prospective dealer, because of his financial situation or requirements, special facilities or services (such term not including only the financing of the shipment or delivery of automobiles to such dealer or prospective dealer and/or only the purchase or acquisition of retail time sales paper from him in the regular course of business) and in part consideration of such special facilities or services to arrange for the dealer or prospective dealer to do business with Respondent Finance Company on an exclusive basis for such reasonable period of time as may be agreed between them.

[Effect of Any General Motors Decree]

8. In the event that a final decree not subject to further review is entered by a court of competent jurisdiction in any proceeding hereafter instituted by the United States against General Motors Corporation and General Motors Acceptance Corporation, granting relief to the Government against said corporations upon allegations substantially identical with the allegations in Paragraph 18 of Section III of the petition herein, then and in that event the court shall have jurisdiction to enter its supplemental decree herein granting such relief, if any, against the Respondent Finance Company or any of them, with respect to the allegations of said paragraph of the petition, as justice may then require. Such proceeding shall be upon application of the United States and upon proper notice and opportunity for hearing to the respondents and the presentation of evidence (including evidence with respect to the other acts and practices of the Respondent Finance Company and the Manufacturer alleged in the petition and evidence of the acts and practices of other finance companies and the volume of business done by them) relevant in determining the legality under the Sherman Anti-trust Law of the acts and practices of the Respondent Finance Company alleged in Paragraph 18 of Section III of the petition and established before the court, considered in combination with any other acts and practices of the Respondent Finance Company and the Manufacturer alleged in the petition and established before the court, and relevant in determining what further decree, if any, is necessary in addition to this decree in order to require Respondent Finance Company thereafter to conduct its business in accordance with the Sherman Anti-trust Law in respect of the acts and practices alleged in said paragraph, reserving to each of the Respondent Finance Company the right to present all defenses in law or fact as to any of the matters tendered by the Government in such proceeding which would be open if this decree had not been entered, provided, however, that such supplemental decree shall be subject to review as fully as though entered as the final decree in an original non-jury action and shall be vacated upon motion of any party if not so reviewable.

9. The respondents shall not in combination or conspiracy do any act which this decree forbids or omit any act which this decree requires.

[Proof of Alleged Violations of Paragraphs 6 and 7]

10. Upon complaint by the petitioner that any respondent has failed to comply with the provisions of the foregoing sub-paragraphs (e), (f), (i) and (l) of paragraph 6, or of sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph 7 of this decree, and the defense of such respondent that the act or acts complained of were not done for the forbidden purpose or purposes, the burden shall be upon such respondent to prove that the act complained of was done for a purpose not forbidden.

[Notice of Decree]

11. The Manufacturer shall mail a copy hereof to its dealers, regional and district managers and field representatives in the continental United States and Respondent Finance Company shall mail a copy hereof to its zone, regional and branch managers in the continental United States; and said Manufacturer and Respondent Finance Company respectively shall within thirty (30) days after the entry of this decree file with this court an affidavit or affidavits showing the manner in which they severally shall have complied with this provision hereof.

[Retail Time Sales Paper Commissions]

12. The Respondent Finance Company shall not pay to any automobile manufacturing company and the Manufacturer shall not obtain from any finance company any money or other thing of value as a bonus or commission on account of retail time sales paper acquired by the finance company from dealers of the Manufacturer. The Manufacturer shall not make any loan to or purchase the securities of Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company, and if it shall pay any money to Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company with the purpose or effect of inducing or enabling such finance company to offer to the dealers of the Manufacturer a lower finance charge than it would offer in the absence of such payment, it shall offer in writing to make, and if such offer is accepted it shall make, payment upon substantially similar bases, terms and conditions to every other finance company offering such lower finance charges; provided, however, that nothing in this paragraph contained shall be construed to prohibit the Manufacturer from acquiring notes, bonds, commercial paper, or other evidence of indebtedness of Respondent Finance Company or any other finance company in the open market.

[Nonentry of Any General Motors Decree]

It is an express condition of this decree that notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding paragraph of this paragraph 12 and of any other provisions of this decree, if an effective final order or decree not subject to further review shall not have been entered on or before January 1, 1943 * requiring General Motors Corporation permanently to divest itself of all ownership and control of General Motors Acceptance Corporation and of all interest therein, then and in that event, nothing in this decree shall preclude the Manufacturer from acquiring and retaining ownership of and/or control over or interest in any finance company, or from dealing with such finance company and with the dealers in the manner provided in this decree or in any order of modification or suspension thereof entered pursuant to paragraph 12a. The Court, upon application of the respondents or any of them, will enter an order for decree to that effect at the foot of this decree, and the right of any respondent herein to make the application and to obtain such order or decree is expressly conceded and granted.

12a. It is a further express condition of this decree that:

(1) If the proceeding now pending in this court against General Motors Corporation instituted by the filing of an indictment by the Grand Jury on May 27, 1938, No. 1039, or any further proceeding initiated by reindictment of General Motors Corporation for the same alleged acts, is finally terminated in any manner or with any result except by a judgment of conviction against General Motors Corporation and General Motors Acceptance Corporation therin, then and in that event, every provision of this decree except those contained in this sub-paragraph (1) of this paragraph 12a of this decree, shall forthwith become inoperative and be suspended, until such time as restraints and requirements in terms substantially identical with those imposed herein, shall be imposed upon General Motors Corporation and General Motors Acceptance Corporation and their subsidiaries either (a) by consent decree, or (b) by final decree of a court of competent jurisdiction not subject to further review, or (c) by decree of such court which although subject to further review continues effective. The court reserves jurisdiction upon application of any party to enter orders at the foot of this decree in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph.

(2) A general verdict of guilty returned against General Motors Corporation in said proceeding, followed by the entry of judgment thereon, shall be deemed to be a determination of the illegality of any agreement, act or practice of General Motors Corporation which is held by the trial court, in its instructions to the jury, to constitute a proper basis for the return of a general verdict of guilty. A special verdict of guilty returned against General Motors Corporation in said proceeding, followed by the entry of judgment thereon, shall be deemed to constitute a determination of the illegality of any agreement, act or practice of General Motors Corporation which is the subject of such special verdict of guilty. A plea of guilty or nolo contendere by General Motors Corporation, followed by the entry of judgment of conviction thereon, shall be deemed to be a determination of the illegality of any agreement, act or practice which is the subject matter of such plea. The determination, in the manner provided in this clause, of the illegality of any agreement, act or practice of General Motors Corporation shall (for the purposes of clause (3) of this paragraph) be considered as the equivalent of a decree restraining the performance by General Motors Corporation of such agreement, act or practice, unless or until such judgment is reversed, or unless such determination is based, in whole or in part, (a) upon the ownership by General Motors Corporation of General Motors

Acceptance Corporation, or (b) upon the performance by General Motors Corporation of such agreement, act or practice in combination with some other agreement, act or practice with which the respondents are not charged in the indictment heretofore filed against them by the Grand Jury on May 27, 1938, No. 1040;

(3) After the entry of a consent decree against General Motors Corporation, or after the entry of a litigated decree, not subject to further review, against General Motors Corporations by a court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, or after the entry of a judgment of conviction against General Motors Corporation in the proceeding hereinbefore referred to, or after January 1, 1940 (whichever date is earliest), the court upon application of any respondent from time to time will enter orders:

(i) suspending each of the restraints and requirements contained in sub-paragraphs (d) to (f) and (h) to (l), inclusive, of paragraph 6 of this decree to the extent that it is not then imposed and until it shall be imposed, in substantially identical terms, upon General Motors Corporation and its subsidiaries, and suspending each of the restraints and requirements contained in sub-paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) of Paragraph 7 of this decree to the extent that it is not imposed and until it shall be imposed in substantially identical terms, upon General Motors Acceptance Corporation and its subsidiaries, either (w) by consent decree, or (x) by final decree of a court of competent jurisdiction not subject to further review, or (y) by decree of such court which, although subject to further review, continues effective or (z) by the equivalent of such a decree as defined in clause (2) of this paragraph; provided, however, that if the provisions of a consent or litigated decree against General Motors Corporation and its subsidiaries corresponding to sub-paragraphs (j) and (k) of paragraph 6 of this decree are different from said sub-paragraphs of this decree, then upon application of the respondents any provision or provisions of said sub-paragraphs will be modified so as to conform to the corresponding provisions of such General Motors Corporation decree;

(ii) suspending each of the restraints and requirements contained in the remaining subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (g) of paragraph 6 to the extent that it is not then imposed, and until it shall be imposed, upon General Motors Corporation and its subsidiaries in any manner specified in the foregoing sub-clause (i) of this clause (3), if any respondent shall show to the satisfaction of the court that General Motors Corporation or its subsidiaries is performing any agreement, act or practice prohibited to the Manufacturer by said remaining sub-paragraphs, and suspending each of the restraints and requirements contained in sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 7 of this decree to the extent that it is not imposed, and until it shall be imposed, upon General Motors Acceptance Corporation and its subsidiaries in any said manner, if any respondent shall show to the satisfaction of the court that General Motors Acceptance Corporation is performing any agreement act or practice prohibited to Respondent Finance Company by said sub-paragraph (b) of Paragraph 7;

(iii) suspending the restraints of sub-paragraph (d) of paragraph 7 of this decree as to Respondent Finance Company in the event that the restraints of sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph 6 of this decree are suspended as to the Manufacturer;

(4) The right of the respondents or any of them to make any application for the suspension of any provision of this decree in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph 12a and to obtain such relief is hereby expressly granted.

In the event that at any time prior to the date when General Motors Corporation has permanently divested itself of all ownership and control of and interest in General Motors Acceptance Corporation, General Motors Acceptance Corporation shall make available to dealers of General Motors Corporation in any area a finance charge, on all or any class of automobiles sold by dealers of General Motors Corporation, less than the finance charge then generally available to dealers of the Manufacturer within such area, nothing in this decree shall prevent the Manufacturer from making, and the Manufacturer may make, adjustments, allowances or payments to or with all of its dealers in such area who agree to reduce to an amount approved by the Manufacturer (but not less than that made available by General Motors Acceptance Corporation) the finance charges which such dealers of the Manufacturer in such area receive from any class of retail purchasers of automobiles, provided that such adjustments, allowance or payments shall not discriminate among such dealers in such area.

[Subsequent Anti-Trust Violations]

13. This decree shall not be pleaded in bar by the respondents in any action under the Anti-Trust Laws instituted by the petitioner against them or any of them in this court or in a court in any other judicial district as to matters arising after the entry of this decree; provided, however, that this paragraph shall not apply to matters which are covered by this decree or which form a part of the cause of action herein or which are a continuance or repetition of acts or practices in which the respondents now engage which form a part of the cause of action herein.

[Retention of Jurisdiction]

14. Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this decree to make application to the court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate in relation to the construction of or carrying out of this decree, for the modification thereof (including, without limitation, any modification upon application of the respondents or any of them required in order to conform this decree to any Act of Congress enacted after the date of entry of this decree), for the enforcement of compliance therewith, the punishment of violations thereof, and the carrying out of the provisions of sub-paragraphs (j) and (k) of paragraph 6 hereof, and the October, 1938 Term of this court is hereby extended indefinitely for such purposes.

[Unlawful Practices by Competitors]

15. It is hereby further provided that if it shall appear to the court upon application of any respondent that, (A) in any twelve (12) months' period after the date of entry of this decree, any present or future competitor of the Manufacturer other than General Motors Corporation or Ford Motor Company shall have sold in the United States, or any State thereof, a quantity of automobiles that shall equal or exceed 25% of the automobiles sold by the Manufacturer in the United States or said State in said period, and (B) that such competitor is doing or engaging in any of the acts, practices, procedures or things then prohibited hereunder or is failing to do or engage in any act, practice, procedure or thing required hereunder, and (C) that the doing or engaging in said acts, practices, precedures or things, or the omission of them, as the case may be, by such competitor has resulted or threatens to result in placing the Manufacturer at a competitive disadvantage in the sale of automobiles as against such competitor, and (D) that the petitioner herein has not obtained or is not proceeding with due diligence by civil or criminal proceedings to obtain an adjudication of the illegality of such acts, practices, procedures or things so performed or engaged in, or omitted to be performed or engaged in, as the case may be, under the Anti-Trust Laws, the court upon application of the respondents or any of them will enter its further order and decree providing that the provisions of this decree not so imposed upon or sought to be adjudicated against such competitor shall be inoperative and that they shall have no future force or effect in the United States or said State, as the case may be, and the right of the respondents to make such applications and to obtain such relief is hereby expressly granted.

It is hereby further provided that if it shall appear to the court upon application of any respondent that (A) in any twelve (12) months' period after the date of entry of this decree any present or future competitor of Respondent Finance Company other than General Motors Acceptance Corporation or Commercial Investment Trust Corporation or Universal Credit Company shall have financed the retail sale of a quantity of automobiles in the United States or any State thereof that shall equal or exceed 25% of the automobiles the sale of which was financed by Respondent Finance Company in the United States or said State in said period, and (B) that such competitor is doing or engaging in any of the acts, practices, procedures or things then prohibited hereunder or is failing to do or engage in any act, practice, procedure or thing required hereunder, and (C) that the doing or engaging in of said acts, practices, procedures or things, or the omission of them, as the case may be, by such competitor has resulted or threatened to result in placing the Respondent Finance Company at a disadvantage in financing the sale of automobiles as against such competitor, and (D) that the petitioner herein has not obtained or is not proceeding with due diligence by civil or criminal proceedings to obtain an adjucation of the illegality of such acts, practices, procedures or things so performed or engaged in, or omitted to be performed or engaged in, as the case may be, under the Anti-Trust Laws, the court upon application of the respondents or any of them will enter its further order and decree providing that the provisions of this decree not so imposed upon or sought to be adjudicated against such competitor shall be inoperative and that they shall have no future force or effect in the United States or said State, as the case may be, and the right of the respondents to make such applications and to obtain such relief is hereby expressly granted.

[Scope of Decree]

16. Nothing in this decree shall limit the control by the Manufacturer of a subsidiary or limit the control by Respondent Finance Company of any subsidiary or affiliated company.

[State Law Obligations]

17. Whenever obligations are imposed upon the respondents by the laws or regulations of any state with which the respondents by law must comply in order to do business in such state, the court upon application of the respondents or any of them will from time to time enter orders relieving the respondents from compliance with any requirements of this decree in conflict with such laws or regulations and the right of the respondents to make such applications and to obtain such relief is expressly granted.

[Future Vacation of Decree]

18. After four years after the date of the entry of this decree any respondent may apply to the court to vacate this decree or any supplemental decree entered pursuant to paragraph 8 hereof or to vacate or modify any provision thereof on the ground that the commission or omission of any of the agreements, acts or practices herein prohibited or required, under the economic or competitive conditions existing at the time of such application, does not constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce among the states in automobiles within the meaning of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law as amended to the date of such application, regardless of whether or not such economic or competitive conditions are new or unforeseen. Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of granting or denying such applications as justice may require and the October, 1938, Term of this court is hereby extended indefinitely for such purpose and the right of the respondents to make such applications and to obtain such relief is expressly granted. The provisions of this paragraph are in addition to, and not in limitation of, the provisions of any other paragraph of this decree.

[Foreign Business Excepted]

19. This decree shall have no effect with respect to respondents' acts and operations without the continental United States or to their acts and operations within the continental United States relating exclusively, to acts and operations without the continental United States.

[Effective Dates]

20. This decree shall go into effect one hundred and twenty days after the date of entry hereof, except as to the provisions of paragraphs 8, 11, and 12 hereof, which said paragraphs shall take effect as therein provided.

Final Decree—In Modification of Final Decree as Modified

SWYGERT, D. J.: This matter having been submitted to the Court by stipulation by counsel for the United States of America and by counsel for the Chrysler Corporation:

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the final decree herein as modified by this Court on December 21, 1940, February 16, 1942, December 26, 1942, December 30, 1943, December 20, 1944, December 31, 1945, June 29, 1946, August 1, 1946, September 12, 1946, January 7, 1947, February 14, 1947, May 17, 1947, August 27, 1947, and December 1, 1947, is hereby further modified so that the second paragraph of Section 12 thereof shall read as follows:

> It is an express condition of this decree that notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding paragraph of this paragraph 12 and of any other provisions of this decree, if an effective final order or decree not subject to further review shall not have been entered on or before May 1, 1948, requiring General Motors Corporation permanently to divest itself of all ownership and control of General Motors Acceptance Corporation and of all interest therein, then and in that event, nothing in this decree shall preclude the Manufacturer from acquiring and retaining ownership of and/or control over or interest in any finance company or from dealing with such finance company and with the dealers in the manner provided in this decree or in any order of modification or suspension thereof entered pursuant to paragraph 12a. The Court, upon application of the respondents or any of them, will enter an order or decree to that effect at the foot of this decree, and the right of any respondent herein to make the application and to obtain such order or decree is expressly conceded and granted.

AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED, AND DECREED that (1) any party herein may, upon motion, call this matter on for full hearing de novo with the same force and effect as though this order or decree (hereinafter called "order") had never been entered, (2) by the filing of such motion the consent of the parties hereto shall be revoked and this order shall be and become automatically vacated fifteen days after the filing of such motion, and (3) the matter shall be heard as upon original application by the United States herein for such order; and Provided further, that, except to the extent necessary to give effect to the extension of said date as herein provided, (1) the making or entry of this order, as well as of the stipulation upon which it is entered, shall be without any prejudice whatever to the legal or equitable rights of the respondents, (2) the decree herein shall be interpreted as though this order and said stipulation had never been made, and (3) if any party or court shall interpret this order or the said stipulation as in any manner whatever limiting, modifying, or otherwise prejudicing said rights of respondents, then this order and the said stipulation shall be taken to be of no force or effect as if never agreed to or entered herein, and this order shall then automatically become vacated and the consent of the parties revoked ab initio.

AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that except as thus modified the modified decree as previously entered shall stand in full force and effect.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Civil Action No. 6776. Filed December 8, 1947.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Suit for Damages and Injunction—Motion for Summary Judgment.—An action brought by a professional billiard player, charging that a manufacturer of billiard equipment, as a part of an unlawful plan to monopolize the billiard equipment industry, failed to invite plaintiff to participate in a national billiard tournament sponsored by it, is upheld as against a motion for summary judgment. A combination may be liable for acts which, but for the fact that it is conducting an unlawful monopoly, it could perform with impunity. An illegal monopoly cannot discriminate against or refuse to deal with a person without sufficient cause. Plaintiff is entitled to introduce evidence to prove that defendant was not justified in refusing to invite him to participate in the tournament. It does not matter that the acts done in pursuance of the monopoly which injure plaintiff are not themselves a part of interstate commerce.

See the Clayton Act Annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2024.48, 2036.

For plaintiff: Francis T. Anderson, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

For defendant: Philip H. Strubing, Evans, Bayard & Frick, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

GANEY, J.: This is a motion for summary judgment under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. following section 723c, by the defendant in an action in which the plaintiff seeks threefold damages in the amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000.00) and injunctive relief pursuant to Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. Secs. 15 and 26.

The plaintiff, Ralph Greenleaf, is and has been for many years a professional carom and pocket billiard player and has participated in many exhibition matches and world's championship tournaments; he has been publicly recognized as the world's champion pocket billiard player a number of times and is considered to be one of the top ranking billiard players of our time. The defendant, The Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company, is engaged in the business of manufacturing, selling and servicing billiard tables and various supplies and equipment incident thereto among the several States.

The complaint alleges that for some time prior to December of 1946, the defendant, with the intent and effect of achieving a monopoly in the billiard equipment business, has eliminated by means forbidden by the Anti-Trust Laws[1] all substantial competitors; that in order to increase the interest in billiards and at the same time to maintain and further its monopoly, the defendant, from time to time, conducted billiard tournaments in which the outstanding billiard players in the country competed for prize moneys, and that the winner of these tournments has been publicly recognized as the world's champion; that in order to conceal from the public its position of complete dominance over the tournaments, the defendant conducted them through The Billiard Association of America, an Illinois non-profit corporation organized for the avowed purpose of stimulating interest in billiards, which it controls; that the players who are to compete in such tournaments are chosen or invited by the president of the Billiard Association of America and they usually consist of the five players who made the best record in the previous tournament and three other players whose ability, in his judgment, merited participation; that as a condition precedent to their taking part in the tournament, the players are required to sign an agreement which, among other things, provides that all tournament games shall be played on equipment sold by the defendant and that "Permission is given The Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company to use the names of players for blanket testimonial purposes for a period of one year"; that from December 3 to 11, 1946, the defendant, through the Billiard Association of America, held one of its publicly advertised world's championship pocket billiard tournaments; that immediately prior to and during the tournament, the plaintiff, being publically regarded as such, was able and willing to compete in the tournament, but his request to participate therein has been refused by the Association; that a large part of a professional billiard player's earnings are derived from his performances in exhibition matches staged in various parts of the country, and that the players most in demand are those who took part and established a good record in the last world's championship tournament; that as a result of the Association's refusal, the plaintiff's reputation as a professional billiard player has been injured and his earning power appreciably diminished for the reason that in the public's mind all of the better billiard players in the country are presumed to take part in the tournament and the failure of a former world's champion to enter the tournament is regarded by the public as an indication of his loss of ability and skill.

The reason given by the defendant for its refusal to invite the plaintiff to compete in the tournament is that his participation therein, as shown by his behavior in past events, will be detrimental to the game. This is denied by the plaintiff who contends that the real reason for his being barred is because during the spring and summer of 1946, he went on a tour and played in exhibition matches arranged by a wholesale dealer of billiard equipment not manufactured by the defendant.

For the plaintiff to succeed in this action, he must establish (1) that the defendant has violated the Anti-Trust Laws, and (2) that he has sustained damage to his business or property proximately resulting from the acts of the defendant which constitute a violation of the Laws. Glenn Coal Co. v. Dickinson Fuel Co., 4 Cir., 72 F. (2d) 885. In support of its motion for summary judgment, the defendant insists that the manner in which it conducted the tournaments, including the conditions it imposed on the players and the exclusion of the plaintiff from participation in one of them for any reason it saw fit, was not a violation of the Anti-Trust Laws. Therefore it argues that the damage, if any, sustained by the plaintiff was not the proximate result of an act forbidden by the Laws. The plaintiff concedes that the acts of the defendant in conducting the tournaments, standing alone, do not constitute a violation of the Laws. However, he takes the position that, viewing the defendant's action as a whole, since it has unlawfully monopolized the billiard equipment business, its reaching out and taking control of professional billiard tournaments and its barring him therefrom without just cause was in furtherance of its unlawful monopoly. As an explanation of how his being barred assisted the defendant in furthering or maintaining its monopoly, the plaintiff asserts that it set an example and provided a warning for the other players who competed in the tournament in that if they played in public on billiard equipment not manufactured by the defendant they too would not be invited to take part in the tournaments to be held in the future; in this way the defendant insured to itself from year to year the blanket use of the names of the outstanding billiard players in the country for endorsement purposes so that it could proclaim in advertisements that they used the defendant's equipment exclusively.

Of course damages are not awarded to a plaintiff for loss to his business or property as the result of any act done by an illegal monopoly; the act must have some reasonable connection with the furtherance or maintenance of the monopoly. See United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 2 Cir. 232 Fed. 574, 576-7; Alexander Melburn Co. v. Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation, 4 Cir., 15 F. (2d) 678, cert. den. 273 U. S. 750. Once it becomes apparent, as in the case before us, that the particular act or acts complained of as causing the injury are connected with or part of an unlawful plan to monopolize, the court will not segregate them to determine if they have gone beyond the bounds of legality; it will view the defendant's acts as a whole, for the parts take on the coloring of the general plan or scheme. Swift & Company v. United States, 196 U. S. 375; Shawnee Compress Co. v. Anderson, 209 U. S. 423; Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, 169; Marienelli v. United States, D. C. N. Y., 227 Fed. 165, 170; 36 Am. Jur. Sec. 148. A combination may be liable for acts [which], but for the fact that it is conducting an illegal monopoly, it could perform with impunity. Thus an illegal monopoly cannot discriminate against or refuse to deal with a person without sufficient cause. Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, 263 U. S. 291; Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Material Co., 273 U. S. 359, 375; 36 Am. Jur. Sec. 24. The fact that the plaintiff is not engaged in interstate commerce will not aid the defendant. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390; nor does it matter whether the acts done in pursuance of the monopoly which injure the plaintiff are themselves a part of intrastate commerce. Swift & Company v. United States, supra; Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373.

Finally the defendant argues that, even assuming its billiard equipment business is an unlawful monopoly, the plaintiff, as shown by his answers to interrogatories, will not be able to prove by direct evidence that it was not justified in refusing to write him to compete in the tournament. This may well be, but the plaintiff should not be prevented from proffering evidence to establish a fact which the jury may infer from the circumstances. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Material Co., supra, p. 375. For if the facts are as they are alleged in the complaint, which for the purpose of this motion we must assume them to be (Zell v. American Seating Co., 2 Cir., 138 F. (2d) 641; Ramsouer v. Midland Valley R. Co., 8 Cir., 135 F. (2d) 101, 105-6), the defendant is unjustified in barring him from the tournament. Therefore we think that the sound advice given in Doehler Metal Furniture Co. v. United States, 2 Cir., 149 F. (2d) 130, 135-136, regarding the great care to be used before granting motions for summary judgment where there is the slightest doubt as to the facts, should be followed.

Motion denied.

[¶ 62,223] United States v. Scovill Manufacturing Company.

In the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut. Civil Action No. 1853. February 17, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Antitrust Violations Enjoined—Patent Licensing Required.—A consent judgment entered in a civil action charging a manufacturer of button fastening machinery with attempting to monopolize the button fastening business by means of illegal leasing agreements and by refusing to lease its machinery enjoins defendant from: leasing or selling its machinery on the condition that the lessee or purchaser shall not use the fasteners of a competitor; conditioning the availability of fastening machinery upon the purchase of fasteners from defendant; removing machinery from the premises of any lessee because such lessee purchases fasteners from competitors of defendant; conditioning any license or immunity to practice any invention related to fastening machinery claimed in any United States patent upon the purchase of fasteners or any similar product from defendant or from any other designated source; instituting or threatening to institute, or maintaining, any proceeding for infringement or for damages or royalties alleged to have accrued prior to the date of this judgment under any existing patent; and participating in any agreements or arrangements having the purpose or effect of continuing, reviving or renewing any of the antitrust violations alleged in the complaint, paragraphs 6 to 8. Defendant is required to grant to any applicant a non-exclusive, non-assignable and unrestricted license, at a uniform, reasonable royalty under any and all existing patents listed herein.

See the Sherman Act Annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.401, 1590, and the Clayton Act Annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.11; and see comment on complaint, '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. 54,103.

For plaintiff: John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; Manuel M. Gorman, Sigmund Timberg, Richard B. O'Donnell; Tom C. Clark, Attorney General; Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General; Robert A. Nitschke, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; Adrian W. Maher, U. S. Attorney (Hartford, Conn.); Grant W. Kelleher, Lawrence W. Somerville, Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

For defendant: Frederick H. Wiggin, Wiggin and Dana, New Haven, Connecticut, Francis P. Reeves, Waterbury, Conn.

Final Judgment

HINCKS, J.: The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint in this action on July 30, 1946; defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, having appeared and filed its answer to said complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; and the plaintiff and said defendant by their respective attorneys having consented to the entry of this final judgment herein;

NOW, THEREFORE, before the taking of any testimony, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party with respect to any such issue, and upon the consent of the parties hereto, the Court being advised and having considered the matter, it is hereby

ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties to this judgment; the complaint states a cause of action against defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, under the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," said Act being commonly known as the "Sherman Anti-trust Act," and under the Act of Congress of October 15, 1914, as amended, entitled "An Act to Supplement Existing Laws Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies, and for Other Purposes," amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, said Act being commonly known as the "Clayton Act."

II

[Terms Defined]

When used in this final judgment, the following terms have the meanings assigned respectively to them below:

(a) "Fasteners means tack-attached or staple-attached buttons, rivets, burrs, and snap fasteners for the fastening of clothing.

(b) "Fastening machinery" means machinery and accessories for attaching fasteners to clothing.

(c) "Existing patents" means all presently issued United States letters patent owned or controlled by defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, or under which it has power to issue licenses or sublicenses, relating to fastening machinery, consisting of the following numbered United States patents:

1,836,887	2,248,087
1,860,148	2,301,547
1,879,895	2,310,007
1,913,648	2,310,008
1,975,413	2,329,047
2,067,225	2,345,476
2,071,506	2,345,640
2,071,507	2,354,717
2,134,404	2,361,688
2,136,536	2,373,436
2,160,146	2,406,516

and renewals, reissues, divisions and extensions of any such patent.

III

[Applicability of Provisions]

The provisions of this judgment applicable to defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, shall apply to each of its subsidiaries, successors, and assigns, and to each of its officers, directors, agents, nominees, employees, and to any other person acting under, through or for such defendant.

IV

[Practices Enjoined]

Defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, be and hereby is enjoined and restrained from:

A. Leasing or making any sale or contract, or adhering to any contract for the sale or lease of fastening machinery, whether patented or unpatented, for use or resale within the United States, or any territory thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or from fixing a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not purchase, use or deal in the fasteners of a competitor or competitors of defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company.

B. Conditioning the availability of fastening machinery or parts or repairs thereof upon the securement of fasteners from the defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, or any other designated source.

C. Removing fastening machinery from the premises of any lessee because such lessee purchases, uses or deals in fasteners manufactured or sold by any person other than defendant.

D. Engaging in, or participating in, contracts, agreements, understandings or arrangements having the purpose or effect of continuing, reviving, or renewing any of the violations of the anti-trust laws alleged in paragraph 6 to 8 inclusive, in the complaint herein.

E. Conditioning any license or immunity, expressed or implied, to practice any invention related to fastening machinery claimed in any United States patent by the tying of any license or immunity for such invention to the purchase or securement of fasteners or any similar product or article from the defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, or any other designated source.

F. Instituting or threatening to institute or maintaining any suit, counter-claim or proceeding, judicial or administrative, for infringement or to collect charges, damages, compensation or royalties alleged to have accrued prior to the date of this judgment under any existing patent.

[Licensing Required]

Defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, be and hereby is directed to grant to any applicant making a written request therefor a non-exclusive, non-assignable and unrestricted license, save for and at a uniform reasonable royalty, under any or all existing patents as listed in Section II (c). Any applicant for such license who fails to agree with defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, upon a reasonable royalty may apply to this court upon thirty (30) days' notice to defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, and to the Attorney General at Washington, D. C., to determine the reasonable royalty for such license.

[Webb-Pomerene Act]

Nothing in this judgment shall prevent defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company from availing itself of the benefits of (a) the Act of Congress of April 10, 1918, commonly called the Webb-Pomerene Act, (b) the Act of Congress of 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings Proviso to Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," or (c) save as elsewhere in this judgment provided of the patent laws.

[Inspection to Secure Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and upon reasonable notice to the defendant, Scovill Manufacturing Company, made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege (1) access during the office hours of said defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment, and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means provided in this paragraph shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department except in the course of legal proceedings, to which the United States is a party, for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification, or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment or violations thereof.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. No. 138—October Term, 1947. Docket No. 20838. Decided March 1, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Civil Suit for Damages—Appeal from Order Striking Cause from Jury Calendar—Legal Issues Triable by Jury.—Plaintiff sued for treble damages and other relief for acts of defendant playwrights in preventing production by him of a play in which he had invested. On appeal from a denial of a temporary injunction pending trial, the court reversed for the issue of a temporary injunction. On appeal from an order denying jury trial notwithstanding plaintiff's claim therefor, it is held that, inasmuch as the allegations of the complaint stress financial damage, and since no mention is made of equitable rights or remedies, the action is basically one for legal damages, triable by jury on timely demand of a party. An order striking the cause from the jury calendar is reversed. Motions to dismiss plaintiff's appeal are denied.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.253, 1640.634; see also prior opinions reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,278, 57,347.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Action by Carl E. Ring against Harold Spina, Edward Heyman, Walter Hannan, Edmund Pauker, and The Dramatists' Guild of the Authors' League of America, Inc., for treble damages under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, as amended, 15 U. S. C. A. § 15, and for other relief in connection with agreements among the parties for the production of a dramatic musical composition called "Stovepipe Hat." From an order striking the cause from the jury calendar, plaintiff appeals. Defendants file motions to dismiss the appeal. Motions denied and order reversed.

Alfred S. Julien, New York City, for plaintiff-appellant.

Philip Wittenberg, New York City (Wittenberg, Carrington & Farnsworth, New York City, on the brief), for defendants-appellees Spina, Heyman, Hannan, and Pauker.

Greenbaum, Wolff & Ernst, New York City (Jonas J. Shapiro and Milton Ross, New York City, of counsel), for defendant-appellee The Authors' League of America, Inc., sued herein as The Dramatists' Guild of the Authors' League of America, Inc.

Before AUGUSTUS N. HAND, CLARK and WOODBURY, Circuit Judges.

CLARK, C. J.: This action was before us previously on appeal from a denial of a temporary injunction pending trial. Plaintiff, suing under the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 et seq., claimed treble damages and other relief for injuries due to the acts of the defendants in preventing production by him of a dramatic musical composition called "Stovepipe Hat," in which he had invested heavily. On the previous appeal we held that there was sufficient prima facie showing of joint acts in restraint of trade to require the holding of matters in statu quo pending trial and without the immediate reference to arbitration which defendants were seeking. Accordingly we reversed for the issue of a temporary injunction. Ring v. Spina, 2 Cir., 148 F. 2d 647. The present appeal is from an order denying jury trial notwithstanding plaintiff's claim therefor; for as the case took its leisurely course through the district court, slowly advancing toward the head of the jury calendar, the court granted defendants' motion to strike the case from that calendar and plaintiff again appealed.

The action was originally instituted on June 14, 1944, at which time plaintiff also filed his jury demand. Answers were filed in July, 1944. Then—curiously, in view of the limitation of such motions to the period before answer, F. R. 12(e)—there were various motions for bills of particulars, one bill, indeed, being served pursuant to an order by consent on August 30, 1945, and a later motion being denied on November 2, 1945. On January 15, 1947, defendants made their motion for an order "striking this cause from the jury calendar of this Court" or, in the alternative, for orders separating the legal and equitable issues, the latter to be tried by the court without a jury, or directing trial by the court of the issue of violations of the Antitrust Act, with the issue of damage alone, if violation was found, to be thereafter referred to a jury. On January 20, 1947, the court made its order that the motion be granted "to the extent of striking this cause from the jury calendar of this Court," with a further provision giving plaintiff leave, "if he be so advised," to amend his complaint within ten days "so as to state a cause of action at law for damages for violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States." Plaintiff, however, took his appeal without adopting the court's suggestion. The individual defendants and the corporate defendant have separately made motions to dismiss the appeal, as not from a final order within the appellate jurisdiction of this court. We must consider these motions, therefore, before we pass to consideration of the appeal on the merits.

[Order Not Final]

Clearly, as the order discloses, the district court did not intend it to be final and it cannot be so considered. Appealability therefore rests entirely upon the ground that it is to be considered in substance the grant of an injunction against an action at law and hence reviewable under 28 U. S. C. A. § 227, as interpreted by Enelow v. New York Life Ins. Co., 293 U. S. 379, and Ettelson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 317 U. S. 188. The Enelow case was decided before the union of law and equity achieved by the federal rules of civil procedure in 1938. It held appealable as such an injunction an order striking from the law side of the court, and thus from trial by jury, an action to recover on an insurance policy wherein the company had filed an affidavit of defense alleging fraud and praying cancellation of the policy. The Ettelson case presented essentially the same situation after adoption of the rules. The order it held appealable was that the counterclaim there filed should be heard and disposed of by the court sitting in equity prior to trial of the issue raised by the complaint and answer in the action at law. The Supreme Court refused to accept the contention that the union achieved by the federal rules had made the Enelow ruling obsolete, saying that the relief afforded by § 227 was not restricted by the terminology used, but looked to the substantial effect of the order made. Procedural experts have criticized this result as an unnecessary resurrection of procedural fictions, cf. 3 Moore's Federal Practice, 1947 Cum. Supp., § 39.01, pp. 29-35; but for our purposes we must of course accept it as gloss upon the statute, intended to promote prompt settlement in a case of the important question of form of trial.[1]

[1] The criticism has pointed out that although basic the jury-trial issue may either become moot as the trial proceeds or become so clearly required as to be settled unhesitatingly by the court by later order. Beaunit Mills v. Eday Fabric Sales Corp., 2 Cir., 124 F. 2d 563, 565; 55 Harv. L. Rev. 861; 20 Tex. L. Rev. 619. Thus here the district court's suggestion of an amendment indicates no intent to deprive the plaintiff of a jury finally or arbitrarily. Apparently the court was looking for a separate statement of claims, which is largely a matter of trial discretion—even though there is no basis in modern procedure for finding a dichotomy of "causes of action" between law and equity. Cf. Original Ballet Russe v. Ballet Theatre, 2 Cir., 133 F. 2d

[Order Held Appealable]

Defendants assert that, using preamalgamation analogies as we must under the Supreme Court's interpretation, we do not have here the case of a chancellor enjoining an action at law, but rather that of a chancellor making an order in an equity case already pending before him, as described in Beaunit Mills v. Eday Fabric Sales Corp., 2 Cir., 124 F. 2d 563, 564. It may well be that, if we were to hold the action predominantly equitable in character, our decision should be a dismissal of the appeal, rather than affirmance of the order. However important such a distinction might be for the science of the law, the parties would presumably view it as somewhat academic, since it would be but another way of stating our decision upon the merits. Obviously the question of jury trial is here inextricably intertwined with that of appealability. Since, as later developed, we view the action as one of legal aspect, entitling the plaintiff to a jury trial on demand, our case is clearly within the Ettelson ruling and the order is appealable. The Dramatists' Guild urges further that, whatever the situation as to the individual author defendants, the claim against it is only of an equitable nature to prevent its enforcement of its Minimum Basic Agreement. This it has developed as a defense in its answer, but it is not the theory of the complaint. That clearly charges this defendant, as well as the others, with actionable wrongs under the Sherman Act, for which plaintiff can recover treble damages. It is of course the plaintiff's allegations which determine the case to be presented, and hence there is no ground for a differentiation among the defendants. Consequently both motions must be denied.

[Question of Jury Trial]

The question of jury trial, too, must be decided upon the allegations of the complaint. As pointed out in our eariler opinion, it is a lengthy and verbose document of some fifty-three paragraphs. It shows that the plaintiff, a lawyer, was induced to put $50,000 into the production of this musical play during its tryout stages at New Haven and Boston, preparatory to its being taken to Philadelphia and to New York City. Three of the four individual defendants are the authors of the play, and the fourth is the agent of the authors. To keep the show going, plaintiff was required to put up an additional $75,000 and to sign the Guild's Minimum Basic Agreement. This agreement limits contracts by both managers and authors to those made under its own extensive terms, including such requirements as that managers shall be in good standing with the Guild, that its scale of minimum royalties shall be observed, and that all disputes be submitted to arbitration in the manner therein provided. A dispute having arisen as to changes urged by plaintiff, the authors took the position that he had breached the Basic Agreement by making changes without the consent of the authors and hence that the production contract was terminated. The play being thus forced to close, the authors demanded arbitration of the dispute pursuant to the arbitration clause of the Basic Agreement. The complaint, in stating these asserted facts with detail, alleged in several places the great damage and injury plaintiff had suffered and his monetary loss. Finally in the fifty-third paragraph it alleged that he had been damaged in the amount of $140,000 as to each of the defendants except Hannon. (With Hannon, one of the authors, he had no dealings and therefore claimed only the right to produce the show.) These various allegations stressing financial damage, together with the absence of any stress or even mention of equitable rights or remedies, stamp the complaint proper as basically one for legal damages.

[Prayers for Relief]

If, in addition, we turn to the prayers for relief for indications of the pleader's intent —though, as we pointed out before, 148 F. 2d at 653, these would not limit recovery at the trial in view of F. R. 54(c)—we must reach the same result. For the first three emphatically stress the same contention: First is a claim of $140,000 against each defendant except Hannon; second is the demand for this amount trebled to make $420,000; and third is an additional claim for a $1,500 deposit with the Guild, to be trebled to $4,500. The remaining prayers, except for the final general prayer for other and further relief, are either for declarations —obviously but gildings of the lily if damages are already being awarded—that the Minimum Basic Agreement is illegal and the plaintiff has the right to produce the show or for injunctions on matters of detail or of a temporary nature, such as the issue of compulsory arbitration so prominent on the previous appeal. True, one prayer is for a permanent injunction against interference by the three authors with the production or reproduction of the show, although, as we pointed out, 148 F. 2d 647, 653, the costly dispute which has arisen with the authors is likely to keep the matter of production of this play, particularly by the plaintiff, a lawyer and not a producer, within the realm of the academic. But the basic nature of the claim for damages for violation of the Antitrust Act to this complaint is, we think, quite clear.[2]

[No Waiver of Jury]

Such a claim, it is well settled, is triable by jury on timely demand of a party. Fleitmann v. Weisbach Street Lighting Co. of America, 240 U. S. 27; Decorative Stone Co. v. Building Trades Council of Westchester County, 2 Cir., 23 F. 2d 426, certiorari denied 277 U. S. 594; cf. Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U. S. 251, 254. There seems only one avenue of possible escape from the conclusion that such trial must be accorded here. That would be through acceptance of the view advanced in some state courts, notably New York, Di Menna v. Cooper & Evans Co., 220 N. Y. 391, 115 N. E. 993, that the plaintiff, by uniting legal and equitable claims, has waived his right to a jury. But this is rationally unsound and practically undesirable, if not quite improper. Rationally there is no basis upon which to ground such a waiver short of resurrecting the ancient divisions now abolished to say that plaintiff has brought his "legal" claims into an "equitable" cause. This is contrary to that complete union and consolidation of all claims, legal and equitable, in a single civil action which the new rules not only permit, but encourage. Practically the thesis results in forcing the plaintiff to yield his jury-trial right if all his claims are to be presented properly in the single action.[3] Hence this conception of jury waiver has been repudiated under the federal rules. 3 Moore's Federal Practice 3010, 1947 Cum. Supp., 6, 22, citing cases such as Bruckman v. Hollzer, 9 Cir., 152 F. 2d 730; Ford v. C. E. Wilson & Co., D. C. Conn., 30 F. Supp. 163; Elkins v. Nobel, D. C. E. D. N. Y., 1 F. R. D. 357; and Columbia River Packers Ass'n v. Hinton, D. C. Ore., 34 F. Supp. 970, 978, reversed on other grounds 9 Cir., 117 F. 2d 310, reversed on other grounds 315 U. S. 143 (dealing with claims under the Sherman Act). See also Hargrove v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 10 Cir., 125 F. 2d 225, 228; Ryan Distributing Corp. v. Caley, D. C. E. D. Pa., 51 F. Supp. 377; Bynum v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., D. C. E. D. S. C., 10 Fed. Rules Serv. 38a.5, Case 1; Connell v. Bowes, 19 Cal. 2d 870, 123 P. 2d 456; Back v. People's Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 97 Conn. 336, 116 A. 603; Clark, Code Pleading, 2d Ed. 1947, 106-110, 120-122.

[Legal Issues Triable by Jury]

Plaintiff's timely demand therefore entitles him to trial by jury and, since he does not appear to have specified particular issues, to such trial "for all the issues so triable." F. R. 38(c). Nevertheless, the court, "upon motion or of its own initiative," may find that some of the issues are not so triable and order them tried to the court. F. R. 39(a)(2). This does not contemplate some formal finding by the court, as is claimed; its simple order, made at any time necessary or desirable, is itself obviously the only finding required. And if the court so determines, it will be a simple matter, under the flexible procedure contemplated by the rules, for the judge presiding at the jury trial to decide any equitable issues at the same time and without delay. See Ford v. C. E. Wilson & Co. and other cases and authorities cited supra. In view of the delay caused by this appeal, the court may appropriately advance the case on its calendar for speedy trial.

[Ruling]

Motions denied; order reversed.

[3] If he tries to avoid losing his right by bringing separate actions, he will probably be met with the contention that he is splitting his claims and that his first case to go to judgment is res judicata of the other. See cases collected Clark, Code Pleading, 2d Ed. 1947, 475, 476.

[¶ 62,225] United States v. Line Material Company, General Electric Company, James R. Kearney Corporation et al.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 8. October Term, 1947. March 8, 1948.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent Licenses—Combination of Patent Monopolies—Control of Sale Price.—Two or more patentees in the same patent field may not legally combine their valid patent monopolies to secure mutual benefits for themselves through contractual agreements, between themselves and other licensees, for control of the sale price of the patented devices. Such a combination restrains trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Even if a patentee has a right in the absence of a purpose to restrain or monopolize trade, to fix prices on a licensee's sale of the patented product in order to exploit properly his invention, when patentees join in an agreement to maintain prices on their several products, that agreement is unlawful per se under the Sherman Act. The unlawful element is the use of the power that cross-licensing gives to fix prices.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.201.

Concurring Opinion—Price-Fixing Provision in Patent License Unlawful.—The prohibition of the Sherman Act against price-fixing combinations applies to patents as well as to other property. The decision in the case of United States v. General Electric Company, which held that price-fixing combinations outlawed by the Sherman Act are lawful when the property involved is a patent, contravenes the Constitutional provision which limits the purpose of patent statutes to the promotion of the progress of science and useful arts, and makes the rewards to inventors secondary.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.201.

Dissenting Opinion—Price-Fixing Provision in Cross-Licensing Agreement Not Unlawful.—A patentee may grant a license upon any condition the performance of which is reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant of the patent is entitled to secure. Where two owners of complementary patents execute cross-license agreements fixing minimum selling prices at which their sub-licensees under the agreements may make and vend devices embodying the patented inventions, and where there is no evidence of intent to restrain trade, there is no violation of the antitrust laws.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1250.175; see also prior opinion, '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. ¶ 57,455.

Reversing and remanding the decision of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,455.

[Nature of Action]

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

The United States sought an injunction under §§ 1 and 4 of the Sherman Act[1] in the District Court against continuance of violations of that Act by an allegedly unlawful combination or conspiracy between appellees, through contracts, to restrain interstate trade in certain patented electrical devices. The restraint alleged arose from a cross-license arrangement between the patent owners, Line Material Company and Southern States Equipment Corporation, to fix the sale price of the devices, to which arrangement the other appellees, licensees to make and vend, adhered by supplemental contracts.[2]

[1] 26 Stat. 209, as amended by 36 Stat. 1167:

"Sec. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. . . ."

"Sec. 4. The several district courts of the United States are invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. . . ."

[2] The names of appellees and the abbreviations hereinafter used as well as the percentage of production of the dropout fuse devices manufactured under the patents are listed below:

The District Court, 64 F. Supp. 970, dismissed the complaint as to all defendants upon its conclusion that the rule of United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, was controlling. That case approved as lawful a patentee's license to make and vend which required the licensee in its sales of the patented devices to conform to the licensor's sale price schedule. Appeal was taken directly to this Court, 32 Stat. 823, and probable jurisdiction noted here on October 21, 1946. We have jurisdiction.[3]

I. The Facts

The challenged arrangements center around three product patents, which are useful in protecting an electric circuit from the dangers incident to a short circuit or other overload. Two of them are dropout fuse cutouts and the third is a housing suitable for use with any cutout. Dropout fuse cutouts may be used without any housing. The District Court found that 40.77 per cent of all cutouts manufactured and sold by these defendants were produced under these patents. This was substantially all the dropout fuse cutouts made in the United States. There are competitive devices that perform the same functions manufactured by appellees and others under different patents than those here involved.

The dominant patent, No. 2,150,102, in the field of dropout fuse cutouts with double jointed hinge construction was issued March 7, 1939, to the Southern States Equipment Corporation, assignee, on an application of George N. Lemmon.[4] This patent reads upon a patent No. 2,176,227, reissued December 21, 1943, Re. 22,412, issued October 17, 1939 to Line Material Company, assignee, on an application by Schultz and Steinmayer.[5] The housing patent No. 1,781,876, reissued March 31, 1931, as Re. 18,020, and again February 5, 1935, as Re. 19,449, was issued November 18, 1930 to Line, assignee, on an application by W. D. Kyle. The Kyle patent covers a wet-process porcelain box with great dielectric strength, which may be economically constructed and has been commercially successful. We give no weight to the presence of the Kyle patent in the licenses.

The applications for the Lemmon and Schultz patents were pending simultaneously. They were declared in interference and a contest resulted. The decision of the [3] The case was argued April 29, 1947, and at our request reargued November 12-13, 1947. United States v. United States Gypsum Co., decided today post, page 364, considers related phases of Sherman Act legislation.

[4] ". . . The Lemmon device consists essentially of an expulsion tube supported by a double jointed hinge at its lower end. As the tube moves into closed circuit position, the hinge is locked and a latch engages a terminal on top of the tube to hold the tube in place. The hinge is released by a relatively complicated and expensive solenoid mechanism when the current becomes excessive because of a short circuit or overload. Thereupon the circuit is broken in the tube and the tube drops downwardly, its upper end disengaging from the latch, which permits the tube to swing out and down. By reason of claims covering the double jointed hinge construction in cutouts, this patent dominates the manufacture of dropout fuse cutouts involved in this suit." Findings of Fact, No. 6.

[5] ". . . The Schultz patent covers a dropout fuse cutout which is an improvement on the device disclosed in the Lemmon patent, and is dominated by the Lemmon patent. In the Schultz structure an expulsion tube is supported by a double jointed hinge which is held rigid by a fuse link. On overload, the fuse melts, breaking the circuit in the tube and the hinge is released automatically, which permits the tube to drop down and then swing outwardly. This Schultz dropout fuse is much simpler, and can be manufactured at considerably less than the cost of a comparable solenoid operated cutout, and has met widespread commercial demand and use." Findings of Fact, No. 7.

Patent Office, awarding dominant claims to Southern and subservient claims to Line on the Lemmon and the Schultz applications made it impossible for any manufacturer to use both patents when later issued without some cross-licensing arrangement. Cf. Temco Electric Motor Co. v. Apco Mfg. Co., 275 U. S. 319, 328. Only when both patents could be lawfully used by a single maker could the public or the patentees obtain the full benefit of the efficiency and economy of the inventions. Negotiations were started by Line which eventuated in the challenged arrangements.

[Cross-License Agreement]

The first definitive document was a bilateral, royalty-free, cross-license agreement of May 23, 1938, between Southern and Line after the Patent Office award but before the patents issued. This, so far as here pertinent, was a license to Southern by Line to make and vend the prospective Schultz patented apparatus with the exclusive right to grant licenses or sublicenses to others. Line also granted Southern the right to make and vend but not to sublicense the Kyle patent. Southern licensed Line to make and vend but not to sublicense the prospective Lemmon patent for defined equipment which included the Schultz apparatus. Sublicense royalties and expenses were to be divided between Line and Southern. Although a memorandum of agreement of January 12, 1938, between the parties had no such requirement, Line agreed to sell equipment covered by the Southern patent at prices not less than those fixed by Southern. Southern made the same agreement for equipment covered solely by the Line patent. No requirement for price limitation upon sales by other manufacturers under license was included.

Six of the other manufacturers[6] here involved were advised by Line by letter, dated June 13, 1938, that Southern had authority to grant licenses under the Schultz prospective patent. On October 3, 1938, Kearney took from Southern a license to practice the Lemmon and Schultz patents. The license had a price, term and condition of sale clause, governed by Southern's prices, which bound Kearney to maintain the prices on its sales of devices covered by the patents. On October 7, 1938, the five other manufacturers mentioned above were offered by Southern the same contract as the standard licensor's agreement. The Kearney contract was discussed at Chicago in October, 1938, by all of the above manufacturers except Railway. Pacific also participated. It never was enforced. The first patent involved in this case did not issue until March, 1939. Those manufacturers who were making double jointed open and enclosed dropout cutouts wanted to and did explore cooperatively [F. F. 15] the validity of the patents. They failed to find a satisfactory basis for attack. They were faced with infringement suits. Other reasons developed for the refusal of the six manufacturers to accept the Kearney form contracts [F. F. 16 & 17] unnecessary to detail here. One reason was that the prospective sublicensees preferred Line to Southern as licensor because of the fact that Line, as owner and manufacturer, would license the Kyle patent. New arrangements were proposed for the licensees. After mutual discussion between the licensees and patentees, these new agreements were submitted. A finding to which no objection is made states:

> "On October 24, 1939, General Electric, Westinghouse, Kearney, Matthews, Schweitzer and Conrad, and Railway met with Line in Chicago and jointly discussed drafts of the proposed license agreements under the Lemmon, Schultz, and Kyle patents. Thereafter, identical sets of revised licenses were sent by Line to General Electric, Westinghouse, Matthews, Schweitzer and Conrad, and the attorneys for Railway and Kearney."

A form for a proposed licensing agreement that contained the essential elements of the price provision ultimately included in the licenses had been circulated among prospective licensees by Line by letters under date of October 6, 1939.

To meet the various objections of the future licensees, the agreement of May 23, 1938, between Southern and Line was revised as of January 12, 1940. Except for the substitution of Line for Southern as licensor of other manufacturers, it follows generally the form of the earlier agreement. There were royalty-free cross-licenses of the Schultz and Lemmon patents substantially as before. Line was given the exclusive right to grant sublicenses to others for Lemmon.[7] Southern retained the privilege, royalty free, of making and vending the Kyle patent, also. Southern bound itself to maintain prices, so long as Line required other licensees to do so.[8] Even if it be assumed that the proper interpretation of the Line-Southern agreement permitted Southern to manufacture under its own Lemmon patent without price control, the practical result is that Southern does have its price for its products fixed because the only commercially successful fabrication is under a combination of the Lemmon and Schultz patents. Findings of Fact 7 and 10.

The price maintenance feature was reflected in all the licenses to make and vend granted by Line, under the Line-Southern contract, to the other appellees. There were variations in the price provisions that are not significant for the issues of this case. A fair example appears below.[9] The execution of these sublicenses by the other appellees, except Johnson and Royal,[10] followed within a year. Licenses were executed by the two on June 15, 1943, and March 24, 1944, respectively. After August 1, 1940, since a number of the appellees had executed the license contracts, two consultations of [8] "15. The licenses hereby granted or agreed to be granted are on the express condition that the prices, terms and conditions of sale of the Southern Corporation for electric fuse equipment made and sold under the licenses herein granted shall, so long as such electric fuse equipment continues to be covered by Letters Patent of the Line Company under which a license is granted by this agreement, be not more favorable to the customer than those established from time to time and followed by the Line Company in making its sales.

"It is the purpose and intent of this agreement that there shall not be directly, or indirectly, any modification of the prices set by the Line Company as they exist from time to time, as for instance, by including in the transaction other material or parts, or labor, or services, at less than the regular price at which the party making the same is at the time selling such other material or parts or furnishing such labor or services or by making allowances for freight or terms of payment other than those employed by the Line Company.

"Prices, terms and/or conditions of sale may be changed by the Line Company from time to time through reasonable notice in writing to the Southern Corporation, but not less than ten (10) days' written notice shall be given before the change shall go into effect.

"It is agreed that if the Line Company shall grant a license to a third party under any of the patents of this agreement (but excepting from the provisions of this paragraph a license to be granted to General Electric Company of Schenectady, New York, under said Kyle reissue patent 19,449), without a provision for maintenance by said third party of prices, terms and conditions of sales as set forth in the first paragraph of this section, then Southern Corporation shall be relieved from its obligation under said section."

[9] In the Line-General Electric license agreement of March 15, 1940, the first under the revised Line-Southern contract, the price maintenance provision was as follows:

"9. The license hereby granted by the Licensor is subject to the express limitations that > as to dropout fuse cutouts manufactured and sold by Licensee which are comparable in respect to general type and purpose, ampere and voltage rating, and rupturing capacity, to dropout fuse cutouts manufactured and sold by Licensor,

Licensee's prices, terms and conditions of sale of dropout fuse cutouts > for use in the United States made under the license herein granted to Licensee under the aforesaid Letters Patent, Lemmon No. 2,150,102, and Schultz and Steinmayer No. 2,176,227, and as long as such dropout fuse cutouts continue to be covered by such Letters Patent, shall be no more favorable to a customer of the Licensee than those established from time to time and followed by the Licensor in its sales. The prices, terms and conditions of sale as at present established and in force are those set forth in Schedule A annexed hereto and forming a part hereof. This schedule of prices may be changed from time to time by the Licensor upon ten (10) days' notice in writing to the Licensee.

"10. The spirit and intent of this license agreement, contemplates that in no transaction shall there be any modification of Licensee's prices, either directly or indirectly, as for instance by inclusion in the transaction of other material or parts or services or labor at less than the regular prevailing prices at which the party making the sale is at the time accustomed to sell such other material or parts or furnish such services or labor, as will serve in effect to reduce Licensee's prices below those named in Schedule A as it exists from time to time."

This was repeated in the Line-General Electric revised agreement of November 17, 1941. A variable appears in the Westinghouse and other licenses. In its price provisions, the Lemmon patent is not mentioned but the Lemmon patent was included in its grant of license and the subsidiary Schultz patent could not be practiced without the right to use the dominant Lemmon.

the licensees and the patentees were held to classify the products of the various licensees in comparison with the licensor's devices.[11] The trial judge found that prices were not discussed. These were fixed by Line without discussion with or advice from any other appellee. There can be no doubt, however, that each licensee knew of the proposed price provisions in the licenses of other licensees from the circulation of proposed form of license on October 6, 1939, subsequent consultations among the licensees and an escrow agreement, fulfilled July 11, 1940. That agreement was entered into after General Electric took its license and required for fulfillment the acceptance of identical licenses by Matthews, Kearney and Railway. The licenses that were the subject of the escrow contained the price provisions of General Electric's license. This awareness by each signer of the price provisions in prior contracts is conceded by appellees' brief. A price schedule became effective January 18, 1941. Thereafter, all the appellees tried to maintain prices. Where there was accidental variation, Line wrote the licensee calling attention to the failure.[12]

The licenses were the result of arm's length bargaining in each instance. Price limitation was actively opposed in toto or restriction of its scope sought by several of the licensees, including General Electric, the largest producer of the patented appliances. A number tried energetically to find substitutes for the devices. All the licensees, however, were forced to accept the terms or cease manufacture. By accepting they secured release from claims for past infringement through a provision to that effect in the license. The patentees through the licenses sought system in their royalty collections and pecuniary reward for their patent monopoly. Undoubtedly one purpose of the arrangements was to make possible the use by each manufacturer of the Lemmon and Schultz patents. These patents in separate hands produced a deadlock. Lemmon by his basic patent "blocked" Schultz' improvement. Cross-licenses furnished appellees a solution.

[Lower Court Ruling]

On consideration of the agreements and the circumstances surrounding their negotiation and execution, the District Court found that the arrangements, as a whole, were made in good faith, to make possible the manufacture by all appellees of the patented devices, to gain a legitimate return to the patentees on the inventions; and that apart from the written agreements, there was no undertaking between the appellees or any of them to fix prices.[13] Being convinced, as we indicated at the first of this opinion, that [11] All appellees, except Royal, Pacific and Johnson, attended one or another of these conferences. We do not find it necessary to determine whether or not the selling prices also of the licensees were before the conference. The agreements adequately show an intention to fix prices.

[12] The licenses contained provisions for records of sale, inspection thereof and cancellation of the license for breach.

"32. The price limitation provisions contained in the various license agreements here in evidence were insisted upon by the patent owner and were intended and reasonably adapted to protect its own business and secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly. Each of the licenses granted to the licensee-defendants was taken and granted in good faith, the parties to the licenses believing a license under the patents to be necessary in order that the licensee could continue lawfully to manufacture and sell its dropout fuse cutouts. Apart from the written license agreements here in evidence, there was no agreement, express or implied, between the licensor and any licensee, or between any two or more licensees, with respect to the prices of licensed dropout fuse cutouts.

"33. All of the devices for which minimum prices were established by Line were comparable to, and competitive with, devices which Line manufactured and sold regularly or which it was ready to manufacture and sell to its customers on special order.

"34. The cross-license agreements between Line and Southern were limited to the commercially practicable device covered by the subservient Schultz patent, and did not create additional power for price control of the licensed cutouts over that which each had before entering into the agreements. The inflexible intention to insist upon price limitation existed independently in each of the patent owners prior to any discussions or arrangements between them. Such cross-license agreements were entered into in good faith, not for the purpose of fixing prices in the industry but to permit the manufacture and sale of the cheaper device covered by the subservient patent, to facilitate the negotiation of licenses, and to provide royalty income. There was no agreement, express or implied, between Line and Southern with respect to prices on cutouts other than the written cross-license agreements.

"35. The license agreements here in evidence did not restrain trade but promoted it by making available several sources where the patented devices could be obtained, thus increasing competition in such devices, particularly with respect to design, quality and service. Competition among the defendants for business in these devices continued to be vigorous after the making of the license agreements.

"36. There was no combination or conspiracy among the defendants, or any of them, to fix, maintain or control prices of droput fuse cutouts or parts thereof, or to restrain trade or commerce therein."

the General Electric case controlled and permitted such price arrangements as are disclosed in the contracts the District Court dismissed the complaint. The Government attacks the rationale of the General Electric case and urges that it be overruled, limited and explained or differentiated.

II. The General Electric Case

That case was decided in 1926 by a unanimous court, Chief Justice Taft writing. It involved a bill in equity to enjoin further violations of the Sherman Act. While violations of the Act by agreements fixing the resale price of patented articles (incandescent light bulbs) sold to dealers also were alleged in the bill, so far as here material the pertinent alleged violation was an agreement between General Electric and Westinghouse Company through which Westinghouse was licensed to manufacture lamps under a number of General Electric's patents, including a patent on the use of tungsten filament in the bulb, on condition that it should sell them at prices fixed by the licensor. On considering an objection to the fixing of prices on bulbs with a tungsten filament, the price agreement was upheld as a valid exercise of patent rights by the licensor.

Speaking of the arrangement, this Court said: "If the patentee . . . licenses the selling of the articles [by a licensee to make], may he limit the selling by limiting the method of sale and the price? We think he may do so, provided the conditions of sale are normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly." P. 490. This proviso must be read as directed at agreements between a patentee and a licensee to make and vend. The original context of the words just quoted makes clear that they carry no implication of approval of all a patentee's contracts which tend to increase earnings on patents. The opinion recognizes the fixed rule that a sale of the patented article puts control of the purchaser's resale price beyond the power of the patentee. P. 489. Compare United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241. Nor can anything be found in the General Electric case which will serve as a basis to argue otherwise than that the precise terms of the grant define the limits of a patentee's monopoly and the area in which the patentee is freed from competition of price, service, quality or otherwise. Compare Mercoid Corporation v. Mid-Continent Inv. Co., 320 U. S. 661, 665, 666; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 277-78, 280; Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U. S. 502, 510.

General Electric is a case that has provoked criticism and approval. It had only bare recognition in Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. United States, 309 U. S. 436, 456. That case emphasized the rule against the extension of the patent monopoly, p. 456, to resale prices or to avoid competition among buyers. Pages 457-58. We found it unnecessary to reconsider the rule in United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 277, although the arrangement there was for sale of patented articles at fixed prices by dealers whom the patentee claimed were del credere agents. As we concluded the patent privilege was exhausted by a transfer of the articles to certain agents who were part of the sales organization of competitors, discussion of the price-fixing limitation was not required. In Katzinger Co. v. Chicago Mfg. Co., 329 U. S. 394, 398, where a suit was brought to recover royalties on a license with price limitations, this Court refused to examine the General Electric rule because of the claimed illegality of the Katzinger patent. If the patent were invalid, the price-fixing agreement would be unlawful. We affirmed the action of the Circuit Court of Appeals in remanding the case to the District Court to determine the validity of the patent. The General Electric case was cited with approval in Carbice Corp. v. American Patents Development Corp., 283 U. S. 27, 31. Other courts have explained or distinguished the General Electric rule.[14] As a [14] For illustration and without implication as to this Court's position on the issues, we call attention to the following:

Barber-Colman Co. v. National Tool Co., 136 F. 2d 339. In a suit by the licensor against the licensee, injunctive belief to compel compliance with a price-fixing provision in the patent license was denied. The General Electric case was held not to permit the patentee to fix prices on unpatented hobs which were produced under a process patent by a patented machine.

Cummer-Graham Co. v. Straight Side Basket Corp., 142 F. 2d 646. Licensee was denied relief in an action against licensor for failing to require other licensees to comply with price-fixing provisions; licensor of a patent on an attachment to a basket-making machine may not fix prices on baskets produced by the machine.

United States v. Vehicular Parking, Ltd., 54 F. Supp. 828. Antitrust proceeding against patent holding company and manufacturing licensees in parking meter industry. The patent licenses fixed the prices at which parking meters could be sold and contained restrictive provisions on marketing practices. In ordering compulsory licensing at a reasonable royalty, the court dis-reason for asking this Court to reexamine the rule of the General Electric case, the Government states that price maintenance under patents through various types of agreements is involved in certain pending cases.[15] Furthermore, the point is made that there is such a "host of difficult and unsettled questions" arising from the General Electric holding that the simplest solution is to overrule the precedent on the power of a patentee to establish sale prices of a licensee to make and vend a patented article.[16]

Such a liquidation of the doctrine of a patentee's power to determine a licensee's sale price of a patented article would solve problems arising from its adoption. Since 1902, however, when E. Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, was decided, a patentee has been able to control his licensee's sale price within the limits of the patent monopoly.[17] Litigation that the rule has engendered proves that business arrangements have been repeatedly, even though hesitatingly, made in reliance upon the contractors' interpretation of its meaning. Appellees urge that Congress has taken no steps to modify the rule.[18] Such legislative attitude is to be weighed with the counterbalancing fact that the rule of the General Electric case grew out of a judicial determination. The writer accepts the rule of the General Electric case as interpreted by the third subdivision of this opinion. As a majority of the Court does not agree with that position, the case cannot be reaffirmed on that basis. Neither is there a majority to overrule General Electric. In these circumstances, we must proceed to determine the issues on the assumption tinguished the General Electric case principally on the ground that the patentee in this case did not itself manufacture the parking meters; other distinctions noted were the number and active concert of licensees, the weakness of the patents, the fixing of prices on unpatented articles, and the existence of marketing restrictions.

[15] For example, such price arrangements under the type of agreement indicated are in litigation as follows:

United States v. Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., D. N. J. Civil 45-83, stainless steel company owning patents on a particular type of stainless steel allegedly issued licenses fixing prices on all types of stainless steel.

United States v. American Optical Co., S. D. N. Y. Civil 10-391, optical patents owned by patent holding company which gave exclusive licenses; exclusive licensee sublicensed to other manufacturers who agreed to maintain prices and comply with marketing restrictions.

United States v. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., S. D. N. Y. Civil 10-394, patent holding company issued licenses to two licensees to manufacture bifocal lenses, the licenses fixing prices at which the bifocal lenses were to be sold and the selection of wholesalers and retailers for the lenses.

United States v. Catalin Corporation of America, D. N. J. Civil 7743, manufacturer of phenolic resins licensed other manufacturers under its process patents, the licensees agreeing to sell at prices established by the licensor.

United States v. General Cable Corp., S. D. N. Y. Civil 40-76, cross licenses among holders of patents on fluid filled cable, the licensees agreeing to adhere to uniform prices and to observe territorial marketing limitations.

United States v. General Electric Co., D. N. J. Civil 1364, cross-licensing agreements between manufacturers of electrical bulbs providing for price and quantitative restrictions.

United States v. General Electric Co., Fried. Krupp, S. D. N. Y. Cr. 110-412, cross-licensing of tungsten carbide patents with price and territorial restrictions.

United States v. General Instrument Corp., D. N. J. Cr. 3960-C, Civil 8586, owners of variable condenser patents assigned patents to holding company and took back licenses with price-fixing provisions; explicit price-fixing provisions subsequently removed but allegedly continued by tacit agreement.

United States v. Phillips Screw Co., N. D. Ill. Civil 47-C-147, holder of patents on cross recessed head screws granted exclusive license to leading screw manufacturer who sublicensed to other manufacturers; patent holder, exclusive licensee, and sublicensees agreed on price terms for all screws produced.

[16] The United States lists: Uncertainty as to the nature of the patent, process or product, which justifies price control; extent of patent domination over the device; may a patent pooling corporation control all licensees' sale prices; extent of price control in an industry. U. S. Brief 65 et seq.

[17] In earlier cases involving the National Harrow Company the lower courts held that an industry-wide combination to fix prices was illegal. National Harrow Co. v. Hench, 83 F. 36; National Harrow Co. v. Quick, 67 F. 130, affirmed on other grounds, 74 F. 236. Compare Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Milwaukee Rubber Works Co., 154 F. 358, and Indiana Manufacturing Co. v. J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co., 154 F. 365. upholding industry-wide price-fixing, with Blount Manufacturing Co. v. Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co., 166 F. 555, holding such price-fixing illegal.

See Final Report of Temporary National Economic Committee, Sen. Doc. No. 35, 77th Cong., 1st Sess. (1941), p. 36; Report of the National Patent Planning Commission, H. R. Doc. No. 239, 78th Cong., 1st Sess. (1943), p. 9.

that General Electric continues as a precedent. Furthermore, we do not think it wise to undertake to explain, further than the facts of this case require, our views as to the applicability of patent price limitation in the various situations listed by the Government. On that assumption where a conspiracy to restrain trade or an effort to monopolize is not involved, a patentee may license another to make and vend the patented device with a provision that the licensee's sale price shall be fixed by the patentee. The assumption is stated in this way so as to leave aside the many variables of the General Electric rule that may arise. For example, there may be an aggregation of patents to obtain dominance in a patent field, broad or narrow, or a patent may be used as a peg upon which to attach contracts with former or prospective competitors, touching business relations other than the making and vending of patented devices. Compare United States v. United States Gypsum Co., post, p. 364, decided today; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265.

It may be helpful to specify certain points that either are not contested or are not decided in this case. The agreements, if illegal, restrain interstate commerce contrary to the Sherman Act. No issue of monopoly is involved. [F. F. 31.] Cf. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 788. That is to say, the complaint charges restrain of trade under § 1 and does not charge "monopoly" under § 2 of the Sherman Act, so that we need not deal with the problems of consolidation, merger, purchase of competitors or size of business as tending toward attaining monopoly. See United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co., 247 U. S. 32, 44-55; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 427-31; United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 181-83; United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417, 451. We are not dealing with a charge of monopoly or restraint because of the aggregation of patents, by pooling or purchase, by an owner or owners, in a single industry or field. See United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co., 247 U. S. 32. Within the limits of the patentee's rights under his patent, monopoly of the process or product by him is authorized by the patent statutes. It is stipulated by the United States that the validity of the patents is not in issue. With these points laid aside, we proceed to the issues presented by this record.

III. The Determination of the Issue.

Under the above-mentioned assumption as to General Electric, the ultimate question for our decision on this appeal may be stated, succinctly and abstractly, to be as to whether in the light of the prohibition of § 1 of the Sherman Act, note 1, supra, two or more patentees in the same patent field may legally combine their valid patent monopolies to secure mutual benefits for themselves through contractual agreements, between themselves and other licensees, for control of the sale price of the patented devices.

The appellees urge that the findings of the District Court, quoted in note 13 supra, stand as barriers to a conclusion here that § 1 of the Sherman Act has been violated by the licenses. Since there was material evidence to support the District Court's finding of the evidentiary facts and the Court necessarily weighed the credibility of the witnesses and the probative value of their testimony to establish appellees' contentions, appellees insist that the inferences or conclusions as to violations of the Sherman Act, drawn by the District Court, must be accepted by us.[19] As to the evidentiary facts heretofore stated, there is no dispute. From them the District Court made findings of fact Nos. 32 to 36, inclusive, hereinbefore set out in note 13. Even though we accept, as we do, these findings on preliminary facts as correct, the last sentence in findings 32 and 34 crumbles their asserted bar to an examination by us as to whether the agreements are violative of the Sherman Act. Those sentences are to the effect that there was an agreement to fix prices between all parties in the language of the contracts as set out in notes

[19] Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 52:
Findings by the Court.—"(a) Effect. In all actions tried upon the facts without a jury, the court shall find the facts specially and state separately its conclusions of law thereon and direct the entry of the appropriate judgment; and in granting or refusing interlocutory injunctions the court shall similarly set forth the findings of fact and conclusions of law which constitute the grounds of its action. Requests for findings are not necessary for purposes of review. Findings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. The findings of a master, to the extent that the court adopts them, shall be considered as the findings of the court."

8 and 9 supra. If the patent rights do not empower the patentees to fix sale prices for others, the agreements do violate the Act. The previous summary in this opinion of the agreements which compose these arrangements demonstrates that the agreements were intended to and did fix prices on the patented devices. Compare Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 226. While Line's sublicenses to others than General Electric, note 9, gave to Line the power which it exercised to fix prices only for devices embodying its own Schultz patent, the sublicense agreements licensed the use of the dominant Lemmon patent. As the Schultz patent could not be practiced without the Lemmon, the result of the agreement between Southern and Line for Line's sublicensing of the Lemmon patent was to combine in Line's hands the authority to fix the prices of the commercially successful devices embodying both the Schultz and Lemmon patents. Thus, though the sublicenses in terms followed the pattern of General Electric in fixing prices only on Line's own patents, the additional right given to Line by the license agreement of January 12, 1940, between Southern and Line, to be the exclusive licensor of the dominant Lemmon patent, made its price-fixing of its own Schultz devices effective over devices embodying also the necessary Lemmon patent. See note 9. By the patentees' agreement the dominant Lemmon and the subservient Schultz patents were combined to fix prices. In the absence of patent or other statutory[20] authorization, a contract to fix or maintain prices in interstate commerce has long been recognized as illegal per se under the Sherman Act.[21] This is true whether the fixed price is reasonable or unreasonable. It is also true whether it is a price agreement between producers for sale or between producer and distributor for resale.

It is equally well settled that the possession of a valid patent or patents does not give the patentee any exemption from the provisions of the Sherman Act beyond the limits of the patent monopoly.[22] By aggregating patents in one control, the holder of the patents cannot escape the prohibitions of the Sherman Act. See Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20; United States v. United States Gypsum Co., post, p. 364, decided today. During its term, a valid patent excludes all except its owner from the use of the protected process or product. United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co., 247 U. S. 32, 58; Special Equipment Co. v. Coe, 324 U. S. 370, 378. This monopoly may be enjoyed exclusively by the patentee or he may assign the patent "or any interest therein" to others. Rev. Stat. § 4898, as amended 55 Stat. 634. As we have pointed out, a patentee may license others to make and vend his invention and collect a royalty therefor. Thus we have a statutory monopoly by the patent and by the Sherman Act a prohibition, not only of monopoly or attempt to monopolize, but of every agreement in restraint of trade. Public policy has condemned monopolies for centuries. The Case of Monopolies (Darcy v. Allein) 11 Co. Rep. 84-b. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 428-49. See Employment Act of 1946, § 2, 60 Stat. 23. Our Constitution allows patents. Art. I, § 8, cl. 8. The progress of our economy has often been said to owe much to the stimulus to invention given by the rewards allowed by patent legislation. The Sherman Act was enacted to prevent restraints of commerce but has been interpreted as recognizing that patent grants were an exception. Bement v. National Harrow Co., supra, 92, 21 Cong. ments to exclude competition is unusual.[23] Monopoly is a protean threat to fair prices. It is a tantalizing objective to any business compelled to meet the efforts of competitors to supply the market. Perhaps no single fact manifests the power and will to monopolize more than price control of the article monopolized. There can be no clearer evidence of restraint of trade. Whatever may be the evil social effect of cutthroat competition on producers and consumers through the lowering of labor standards and the quality of the produce and the obliteration of the marginal to the benefit of the surviving and low-cost producers, the advantages of competition in opening rewards to management, in encouraging initiative, in giving labor in each industry an opportunity to choose employment conditions and consumers a selection of product and price, have been considered to overbalance the disadvantages. The strength of size alone, the disappearance of small business are ever-present dangers in competition. Despite possible advantages to a stable economy from efficient cartels with firm or fixed prices for products, it is crystal clear from the legislative history and accepted judicial interpretations of the Sherman Act that competition on prices is the rule of congressional purpose and that, where exceptions are made, Congress should make them. The monopoly granted by the patent laws is a statutory exception to this freedom for competition and consistently has been construed as limited to the patent grant. Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. United States, 309 U. S. 436, 452, 455; United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241; Hartford-Empire Co. v. United States, 323 U. S. 386. It is not the monopoly of the patent that is invalid. It is the improper use of that monopoly.

The development of patents by separate corporations or by cooperating units of an industry through organized research group is a well known phenomenon. However far advanced over the lone inventor's experimentation this method of seeking improvement in the practices of the arts and sciences may be, there can be no objection, on the score of illegality, either to the mere size of such a group or the thoroughness of its research. It may be true, as Carlyle said, that "Genius is an infinite capacity for taking pains." Certainly the doctrine that control of prices, outside the limits of a patent monopoly, violates the Sherman Act is as well understood by Congress as by all other interested parties.

We are thus called upon to make an adjustment between the lawful restraint on trade of the patent monopoly and the illegal restraint prohibited broadly by the Sherman Act. That adjustment has already reached the point, as the precedents now stand, that a patentee may validly license a competitor to make and vend with a price limitation under the General Electric case and that the grant of patent rights is the limit of freedom from competition under the cases first cited at note 22.

With the postulates in mind that price limitations on patented devices beyond the limits of a patent monopoly violate the Sherman Act and that patent grants are to be construed strictly, the question of the legal effect of the price limitations in these agreements may be readily answered. Nothing in the patent statute specifically gives a right to fix the price at which a licensee may vend the patented article. 35 U. S. C. §§ 40, 47. While the General Electric case holds that a patentee may, under certain conditions, lawfully control the price the licensee of his several patents may charge for the patented device, no case of this Court has construed the patent and anti-monopoly statutes to permit separate owners of separate patents by cross-licenses or other arrangements to fix the prices to be charged by them and their licensees for their respective products. Where two or more patentees with competitive, non-infringing patents combine them and fix prices on all devices produced under any of the patents, competition is impeded to a greater degree than where a single patentee fixes prices for his licensees. The struggle for profit is less acute. Even when, as here, the devices are not commercially competitive because the subservient patent cannot be practiced without consent of the dominant, the statement holds good. The stimulus to seek competitive inventions is reduced by the mutually advantageous price-fixing arrangement. Compare, as to acts by a single entity and those done in combination with others. Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 396; United States v. Reading Co., 226 U. S.

[23] The Interstate Commerce Act authorizes carriers to pool revenues and authorizes mergers of carriers, provided that approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission is obtained. The antitrust laws are inapplicable to such agreements. 49 U. S. C. § 5 (1), (2) and (11).

324, 357; Eastern States Lumber Dealers' Assn. v. United States, 234 U. S. 600; Binderup v. Pathé Exchange, 263 U. S. 291. The merging of the benefits of price-fixing under the patents restrains trade in violation of the Sherman Act in the same way as would the fixing of prices between producers of nonpatentable goods.

If the objection is made that a price agreement between a patentee and a licensee equally restrains trade, the answer is not that there is no restraint in such an arrangement but, when the validity of the General Electric case is assumed, that reasonable restraint accords with the patent monopoly granted by the patent law. Where a patentee undertakes to exploit his patent by price-fixing through agreements with anyone, he must give consideration to the limitations of the Sherman Act on such action. The patent statutes give an exclusive right to the patentee to make, use and vend and to assign any interest in this monopoly to others. The General Electric case construes that as giving a right to a patentee to license another to make and vend at a fixed price. There is no suggestion in the patent statutes of authority to combine with other patent owners to fix prices on articles covered by the respective patents. As the Sherman Act prohibits agreements to fix prices, any arrangement between patentees runs afoul of that prohibition and is outside the patent monopoly.

We turn now to the situation here presented of an agreement where one of the patentees is authorized to fix prices under the patents. The argument of respondents is that if a patentee may contract with his licensee to fix prices, it is logical to permit any number of patentees to combine their patents and authorize one patentee to fix prices for any number of licensees. In this present agreement Southern and Line have entered into an arrangement by which Line is authorized to and has fixed prices for devices produced under the Lemmon and Schultz patents. It seems to us, however, that such argument fails to take into account the cumulative effect of such multiple agreements in establishing an intention to restrain. The obvious purpose and effect of the agreement was to enable Line to fix prices for the patented devices. Even where the agreements to fix prices are limited to a small number of patentees, we are of the opinion that it crosses the barrier erected by the Sherman Act against restraint of trade though the restraint is by patentees and their licensees.

As early as 1912, in Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20, this Court unanimously condemned price limitation under pooled [24] patent licenses.[25] As the arrangement was coupled with an agreement for limitation on jobbers' resale prices, the case may be said to be indecisive on patent license agreements for price control of a product without the jobber's resale provision. No such distinction appears in the opinion. This Court has not departed from that condemnation of price fixing. Even in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, where an arrangement by which the patentees pooled their oil cracking patents and divided among themselves royalties from licensees fixed by the pooling contracts was upheld, the theory was reiterated that a price limitation for the product was unlawful per se. Pp. 170, 173, 175. Of course, if a purpose or plan to monopolize or restrain trade is found, the arrangement is unlawful. P. 174. The Government's contention in that case that the limitation on royalties in itself violated the Sherman Act by fixing an element in the price was dismissed because the Court was of the view that controlled royalties were effective as price regulators only when the patentees dominated the industry. P. 174. This domination was thought by this Court not to have been proven.

When a plan for the patentee to fix the sale prices of patented synthetic hardboard

[24] The words "patent pool" are not words of art. The expression is used in this opinion to convey the idea of a linking of the right to use patents issued to more than one patentee.

[25] 226 U. S. at 48:

"The agreements clearly, therefore, transcended what was necessary to protect the use of the patent or the monopoly which the law conferred upon it. They passed to the purpose and accomplished a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman law. It had, therefore, a purpose and accomplished a result not shown in the Bement case. There was a contention in that case that the contract of the National Harrow Company with Bement & Sons was part of a contract and combination with many other companies and constituted a violation of the Sherman law, but the fact was not established and the case was treated as one between the particular parties, the one granting and the other receiving a right to use a patented article with conditions suitable to protect such use and secure its benefits. And there is nothing in Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U. S. 1, which contravenes the views herein expressed."

on sales made through formerly competing manufacturers and distributors, designated as del credere agents,[28] came before this Court on allegations that the plan was in violation of the Sherman Act, we invalidated the scheme. We said that the patentee could not use its competitor's sales organization as its own agents so as to control prices. The patent monopoly, under such circumstances, we said, was exhausted on disposition of the product to the distributor. We reasoned that such an arrangement was a restriction on our free economy, "a powerful inducement to abandon competition," and that it derogated "from the general law [against price limitation] beyond the necessary requirements of the patent statute." United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 281, 280.

We think that this general rule against price limitation clearly applies in the circumstances of this case. Even if a patentee has a right in the absence of a purpose to restrain or monopolize trade, to fix prices on a licensee's sale of the patented product in order to exploit properly his invention or inventions, when patentees join in an agreement as here to maintain prices on their several products, that agreement, however advantageous it may be to stimulate the broader use of patents, is unlawful per se under the Sherman Act. It is more than an exploitation of patents. There is the vice that patentees have combined to fix prices on patented products. It is not the cross-licensing to promote efficient production which is unlawful. There is nothing unlawful in the requirement that a licensee should pay a royalty to compensate the patentee for the invention and the use of the patent. The unlawful element is the use of the control that such cross-licensing gives to fix prices. The mere fact that a patentee uses his patent as whole or part consideration in a contract by which he and another or other patentees in the same patent field arrange for the practice of any patent involved in such a way that royalties or other earnings or benefits from the patent or patents are shared among the patentees, parties to the agreement, subjects that contract to the prohibitions of the Sherman Act whenever the selling price, for things produced under a patent involved, is fixed by the contract or a license authorized by the contract. Licensees under the contract who as here enter into license arrangements, with price-fixing provisions, with knowledge of the contract, are equally subject to the prohibitions.

The decree of the District Court is reversed and the case is remanded for the entry of an appropriate decree in accordance with this opinion.

[Concurring Opinion]

Mr. Justice Douglas, with whom Mr. Justice Black, Mr. Justice Murphy and Mr. Justice Rutledge, join, concurring.

While I have joined in the opinion of the Court, its discussion of the problem is for me not adequate for a full understanding of the basic issue presented. My view comes to this—it is a part of practical wisdom and good law not to permit United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, to govern this situation, though if its premise be accepted, logic might make its application to this case wholly defensible. But I would be rid of United States v. General Electric Co. My reasons for overruling it start with the Constitution itself.

The Constitution grants Congress the power "To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Art. I, § 8, Cl. 8. It is to be noted first that all that is secured to inventors is "the exclusive right" to their inventions; and second that the reward to inventors is wholly secondary, the aim and purpose of patent statutes being limited by the Constitution to the promotion of the progress of science and useful arts. United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 278 and cases cited.

Congress, faithful to that standard, has granted patentees only the "exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention or discovery." Rev. Stat. § 4884, 35 U. S. C. § 40. And as early as 1853 the Court, speaking through Chief Justice Taney, defined the narrow and limited monopoly granted under the statutes as follows: "The franchise which the patent grants, consists altogether in the right to exclude every one from making, using, or vending the thing patented, without the permission of the patentee."

[28] Cf. United States v. General Electric Co., supra.

Bloomer v. McQuewan, 14 How. 539, 549. But the ingenuity of man has conceived many ways to graft attractive private perquisites onto patents. The effort through the years has been to expand the narrow monopoly of the patent. The Court, however, has generally been faithful to the standard of the Constitution, has recognized that the public interest comes first and reward to inventors second, and has refused to let the self-interest of patentees come into the ascendency. As we stated in B. B. Chemical Co. v. Ellis, 314 U. S. 495, 498, "The patent monopoly is not enlarged by reason of the fact that it would be more convenient to the patentee to have it so, or because he cannot avail himself of its benefits within the limits of the grant." From Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U. S. 502, which overruled Henry v. A. B. Dick Co. 224 U. S. 1, to International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, decided only the other day, the Court has quite consistently refused to allow the patentee's "right to exclude" to be expanded into a right to license the patent on such conditions as the patentee might choose. For the power to attach conditions would enable the patentee to enlarge his monopoly by contract and evade the requirements of the general law applicable to all property. The philosophy of those decisions was summed up in Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U. S. 661, 666, where we said:

> "The necessities or convenience of the patentee do not justify any use of the monopoly of the patent to create another monopoly. The fact that the patentee has the power to refuse a license does not enable him to enlarge the monopoly of the patent by the expedient of attaching conditions to its use. . . . The patent is a privilege. But it is a privilege which is conditioned by a public purpose. It results from invention and is limited to the invention which it defines. When the patentee ties something else to his invention, he acts only by virtue of his right as the owner of property to make contracts concerning it and not otherwise. He then is subject to all the limitations upon that right which the general law imposes upon such contracts."

The Court, however, allowed an exception in this long line of cases. In United States v. General Electric Co., supra, decided in 1926, it followed Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, decided in 1902, and sustained a price-fixing provision of a license to make and vend the patented invention. By that decision price-fixing combinations which are outlawed by the Sherman Act (United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150) were held to be lawful when the property involved was a patent. By what authority was this done ?

The patent statutes do not sanction price-fixing combinations. They are indeed wholly silent about combinations. So far as relevant here, all they grant, as already noted, is the "exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention or discovery." Rev. Stat. § 4884, 35 U. S. C. § 40. There is no grant of power to combine with others to fix the price of patented products. Since the patent statutes are silent on the subject, it would seem that the validity of price-fixing combinations in this field would be governed by general law. And since the Sherman Act outlaws price-fixing combinations it would seem logical and in keeping with the public policy expressed in that legislation to apply its prohibitions to patents as well as to other property. The Court made an exception in the case of these price-fixing combinations in order to make the patent monopoly a more valuable one to the patentee. It was concerned with giving him as high a reward as possible. It reasoned that if the patentee could not control the price at which his licensees sold the patented article, they might undersell him; that a price-fixing combination would give him protection against that contingency and therefore was a reasonable device to secure him a pecuniary reward for his invention. Thus the General Electric case inverted Cl. 8 of Art. I, § 8 of the Constitution and made the inventor's reward the prime rather than an incidental object of the patent system.

In that manner the Court saddled the economy with a vicious monopoly. In the first place, this form of price-fixing underwrites the high-cost producer. By protecting him against competition from low-cost producers, it strengthens and enlarges his monopoly. It is said in reply that he, the patentee, has that monopoly anyway—that his exclusive right to make, use, and vend would give him the right to exclude others and manufacture the invention and market it at any price he chose. That is true. But what he gets by the price-fixing agreement with his competitors is much more than that. He then gets not a benefit inherent in the right of exclusion but a benefit which flows from suppression of competition by combination with his competitors. Then he gets the benefits of the production and marketing facilities of competitors without the risks of price competition. Cf. United States v. Masonite Corp., supra. In short, he and his associates get the benefits of a conspiracy or combination in restraint of competition. That is more than an "exclusive right" to an invention; it's an "exclusive right" to form a combination with competitors to fix the prices of the products of invention. The patentee creates by that method a powerful inducement for the abandonment of competition, for the cessation of litigation concerning the validity of patents, for the acceptance of patents no matter how dubious, for the abandonment of research in the development of competing patents. Those who can get stabilized markets, assured margins, and freedom from price cutting will find a price-fixing license an attractive alternative to the more arduous methods of maintaining their competitive positions. Competition tends to become impaired not by reason of the public's preference for the patented article but because of the preference of competitors for price fixing and for the increased profits which that method of doing business promises.

Price fixing in any form is perhaps the most powerful of all inducements for abandonment of competition. It offers security and stability; it eliminates much of the uncertainty of competitive practices; it promises high profits. It is therefore one of the most effective devices to regiment whole industries and exact a monopoly price from the public. The benefits of competition disappear. The prices charged by the regimented industry are determined not by representatives of the public, as in the case of electric, water, and gas rates, but by private parties who incline to charge all the traffic will bear. And the type of combination in this case has the power to inflict precisely the type of public injury which the Sherman Act condemns. This price-fixing scheme does far more than secure to inventors "the exclusive right" to their discoveries within the meaning of Cl. 8 of Art. I, § 8 of the Constitution. It gives them a leverage on the market which only a combination, not a patent by itself, can create. Yet it is "every" combination in restraint of trade which § 1 of the Sherman Act condemns, price-fixing combinations dealing with patents not excluded.

Congress has much to say as to the pattern of our economic organization. But I am not clear that Congress could expand "the exclusive right" specified in the Constitution into a right of inventors to utilize through a price-fixing combination the production and marketing facilities of competitors to protect their own high costs of production and eliminate or suppress competition. It is not apparent that any such restriction or condition promotes the progress of science and the useful arts. But however that may be, the Constitution places the rewards to inventors in a secondary role. It makes the public interest the primary concern in the patent system. To allow these price-fixing schemes is to reverse the order and place the rewards to inventors first and the public second. This is not the only way a patentee can receive a pecuniary reward for his invention. He can charge a royalty which has no relation to price fixing. Or he can manufacture and sell at such price as he may choose. Certainly if we read the patent statutes so as to harmonize them as closely as possible with the policy of antitrust laws, we will strike down a combination which is not necessary to effectuate the purpose of the patent statutes. If we did that in this case we would overrule the General Electric Co. case.

This Court, not Congress, was the author of the doctrine followed in that case. The rule it sanctions is another of the private perquisites which the Court has written into the patent laws. See Special Equipment Co. v. Coe, 324 U. S. 370, 383. Since we created it, we should take the initiative in eliminating it. It is hard for me to square it with the standards which the Constitution has set for our patent system. It plainly does violence to the competitive standards which Congress has written into the Sherman Act.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE BURTON, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER concur, dissenting.

This dissent is impelled by regard for the soundness, authority and applicability to this case of the unanimous decisions of this Court in Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, and United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476.

ant patent owners and cross-licensors, Line Material Company and Southern States Equipment Corporation (here called respectively Line and Southern), and also by the ten defendants who hold licenses under the two complementary patents, owned respectively by Line and Southern. These patents are for dropout fuse cutouts. Southern's patent is the dominant patent but the product made under it alone has not been commercially successful. Line's patent is for an improvement of that product which has made it commercially successful. Each of the twelve defendants has received and exercised authority under both patents to make and sell this improved product, but the Government charges them with having engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade to fix, maintain and control the prices at which they have sold, in interstate commerce, their respective products under these patents. It is not disputed that the sales were made in interstate commerce. The trial court's findings of fact demonstrate, however, that there have been no agreements between any of the defendants with respect to the prices of these products other than the price-limiting provisions contained in their respective licenses.[2] The findings of fact show also that, unless the Government sustains its contention that those provisions constitute, per se, an unlawful restraint of trade, its complaint should be dismissed.[3]

"9. The validity of the United States letters patent involved in the licenses of the defendants is not contested by the plaintiff in this action, and therefore is not here in issue.

"27. None of the license agreements aforesaid restrains trade in any article moving in interstate commerce, and none of them was entered into as a result of any conspiracy to restrain such trade.

"28. . . . The prices listed in Schedule A are Line's own selling prices, determined solely by Line without discussion with or advice from any other defendant.

"29. Under the cross-licenses with Southern and its licenses to others, Line established minimum prices only for structures within the ambit of the claims of its own patents. The classification schedules attached to the license agreements were only such as were reasonably necessary to protect the business of the licensor and implement the license agreement so as to prevent evasion by a licensee of lawful price limitation provisions. Line did not establish minimum selling prices for any devise not covered by a claim of its Schultz patent Re. 22,412 or its Kyle patent Re. 19,449.

"31. There is no charge of monopoly by the defendants. There was no fixing of resale prices on licensed dropout fuse cutouts by the defendants or any of them. . . .

"32. The price limitation provisions contained in the various license agreements here in evidence were insisted upon by the patent owner and were intended and reasonably adapted to protect its own business and secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly. Each of the licenses granted to the licensee-defendants was taken and granted in good faith, the parties to the licenses believing a license under the patents to be necessary in order that the licensee could continue lawfully to manufacture and sell its dropout fuse cutouts. . . .

"34. The cross-license agreements between Line and Southern were limited to the commercially practicable device covered by the subservient Schultz [Line's] patent, and did not create additional power for price control of the licensed cutouts over that which each had before entering into the agreements. . . . Such cross-license agreements were entered into in good faith, not for the purpose of fixing prices in the industry but to permit the manufacture and sale of the cheaper device covered by the subservient patent, to facilitate the negotiation of licenses, and to provide royalty income. . . .

"35. The license agreements here in evidence did not restrain trade but promoted it by making available several sources where the patented devices could be obtained, thus increasing competition in such devices, particularly with respect to design, quality and service. Competition among the defendants for business in these devices continued to be vigorous after the making of the license agreements."

That the patents did not represent an industry-wide control appears from the following finding:

"5. The defendants are all manufacturers of electrical devices of various kinds. The dropout fuse cutouts manufactured by the defendants under the patent licenses have been and are in open competition with many other devices which perform the same functions and are not manufactured under the patent licenses, such as open single hinge dropout fuse cutouts; open non-dropout fuse cutouts; non-dropout fuse cutouts enclosed in materials other than cast wet-process porcelain, such as Prestite; automatic circuit breaker cutouts; and others listed in Defendants' Exhibit L-23. The average aggregate annual sales of licensed dropout fuse cut-

The question thus presented is: do the price-limiting provisions in some or all of the licenses under Line's or Southern's patents constitute a restraint of trade in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act? We agree with the court below that they do not.[4] The price-limiting provisions in this case are comparable to those which, in the Bement and General Electric cases, supra, were held not to violate the Sherman Act. This Court sustained the agreement in the Bement case because the Sherman Act—

> "clearly does not refer to that kind of a restraint of interstate commerce which may arise from reasonable and legal conditions imposed upon the assignee or licensee of a patent by the owner thereof, restricting the terms upon which the article may be used and the price to be demanded therefor. Such a construction of the act we have no doubt was never contemplated by its framers." (At p. 92.)

The license in that case was issued under several patents and, as here, it limited the prices at which the licensee was authorized to sell articles produced by the licensee under that license. In the General Electric case, this Court, in speaking of the patent holder's right to limit the selling prices of his licensee's products, said:

> "We think he [the patent holder] may do so, provided the conditions of sale are normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly. One of the valuable elements of the exclusive right of a patentee is to acquire profit by the price at which the article is sold." (At p. 490.)

In the present case, there are two types of license agreements. The price-limiting provisions are the same in each. The first type is that of the cross-licensing agreement between Line and Southern. In it Line granted to Southern a nonexclusive, royalty-free license to make and sell the products here in question. Line also prescribed that Southern's prices, terms and conditions of sale should be "not more favorable to the customer than those established from time to time and followed by the Line Company in making its sales." The difference between this license agreement and Line's agreements with each of the other defendants is that Southern, in return for this license, instead of paying cash royalties to Line, issued to Line a limited cross-license under Southern's complementary patent on a dropout fuse cutout. Southern also granted to Line an exclusive right to issue sublicenses under that patent. Southern inserted no price limitation in its cross-license to Line and Line made no commitment to insert price limitations in any sublicense which it might issue under Southern's patent. As far as price limitations were concerned, they all were contained in the royalty-free, nonexclusive license from Line to Southern and were applicable only to products made and sold by the latter under Line's patent. Assuming that the limitations thus placed by Line on the price of Southern's products, made and sold by it under Line's complementary patent, were reasonable limitations, especially in relation to Line's own operations under the same patent, they represented a lawful protection of Line's patent interests. They evidenced a normal exercise by a manufacturing patentee "of the exclusive right of a patentee . . . to acquire profit by the price at which the article is sold."[5] In some ways, they were even more natural and reasonable provisions for insertion by Line than would have been a bare provision for royalties. Line evidently needed these price limitations to enable it to continue to make and sell the product which its own improvement had converted from a commercial failure into a commercial success. It will be demonstrated later that Line's receipt of a royalty-free, unconditional cross-license under Southern's complementary patent, as consideration for Line's license to Southern, did not, per se, convert this otherwise lawfully limited license into an invalid license violating the Sherman Act.

The other type of license that was used by Line was that of a direct license issued separately to each of the ten other licensee-defendants. These licenses closely outs manufactured by all the defendants from 1940 to 1944 was $1,918,247.78 and constituted only 40.77% of the average aggregate annual sales of all licensed and competitive cutouts manufactured and sold by all the defendants, and were distributed among the defendants as follows: General Electric, 29.2%; Line [,] 25.4% [;] Kearney, 18.9%; Southern, 7.9%; Westinghouse, 5.3%; Schweitzer and Conrad, 5.1%; Railway, 3.8%; Matthews, 2%; Porcelain, 1.5%; Royal, 0.5%; Pacific, 0.2%; and Johnson, 0.2%."

[4] "2. The cross-licenses and the license agreements entered into between the various defendants, as set forth in the preceding Findings of Fact, are lawful agreements." (Conclusions of law.)

resembled each other. Each was a nonexclusive license calling for the payment of a modest royalty to Line on each product made and sold by the licensee under Line's patent. Each included price limitations comparable to those in Line's license to Southern. These price-limiting licenses from Line are, as such, entirely comparable to those in the Bement and General Electric cases. Each license, however, also included a sublicense issued by Line under Southern's complementary patent. The royalties on the products made and sold under the two complementary patents were to be divided equally between Line and Southern. It will be demonstrated later that this sublicense under Southern's complementary patent and the agreement by Line to divide with Southern the royalties received upon products made and sold under the two patents did not, per se, convert these otherwise lawfully limited licenses into invalid licenses violating the Sherman Act.

Line also granted to certain licensee-defendants desiring it, a license under Line's so-called "Kyle patent" for enclosed fuse boxes. Some of these licenses carried price limitations on products made and sold by the licensee under the Kyle patent. These licenses are entirely comparable to those in the Bement and General Electric cases. They are well within the scope of those precedents and carry no suggested basis for a distinction claimed to convert them into invalid licenses violating the Sherman Act.

The Government now asks this Court to overrule the Bement and General Electric cases. The opinion by Mr. Justice Reed rejects that request but seeks to justify a reversal of the judgment below by distinguishing this case from those precedents. This dissent undertakes not only to emphasize the soundness of the Bement and General Electric decisions, but to demonstrate that the basic principles which sustain those decisions apply to this case with at least equal force. This initial discussion will omit the consideration of the cross-license from Southern to Line, the grant from Southern to Line of the exclusive right to issue sublicenses under the Southern patent and the agreement for the division of royalties between Southern and Line. The Bement and General Electric decisions are authority for upholding the remaining portions of such agreements in the light of the previously mentioned findings of fact which show that the agreements "arise from reasonable and legal conditions imposed upon the assignee or licensee of a patent by the owner thereof, restricting the terms upon which the article may be used and the price to be demanded therefor" [6] and that "the conditions of sale are normally and reasonaby adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly." [7] This dissent accordingly reexamines the foundation for those decisions and emphasizes the development, nature and effect of the patent rights which are decisive of the main issue both in those cases and in this.

Patent Rights

An understanding of the historical development and of the nature of patent rights in the United States is essential to a discussion of the relation between them and the restraints of trade prohibited by the Sherman Act. American patent rights find their origin in Great Britain. That nation appears to have been the first to issue "patents" to secure to inventors for limited times exclusive rights to their respective discoveries. These "patents" were called "literae patentes," i. e., "open letters," because they were not sealed up but were exposed to view with the Great Seal pendant at the bottom. They were addressed by the sovereign to all subjects of the realm. Such instruments were, and to a degree still are, the common form used for making grants of dignities, such as peerages, appointments to certain offices and grants of privilege of various kinds. Their form, therefore, was similar to that of the "patents" used to grant exclusive rights or "monopolies" to trade guilds, corporations and, in some cases, individuals, permitting them to exclude competitors from the conduct of certain lines of profitable business.[8]

The contrast between these two kinds of exclusive rights in their relation to the public was reflected later in acts of the British Parliament and in the Constitution and statutes of the United States. A patent to an inventor took nothing from the public which the public or the inventor's competitors already had. By hypothesis, it dealt with a new asset available to civilization only through its inventor. The royal patent served to encourage the inventor to disclose his invention. By granting to the inventor the right to exclude all others from making, using or selling the invention for a limited time, it was felt that the public was well served by the invention's disclosure, its early availability under the patent and its later general availability to everyone. This procedure was popular. On the other hand, royal patents securing exclusive rights to private parties to conduct profitable enterprises to the exclusion of existing or available competitors were issued to show royal favor or to secure funds at the expense of the public. Such patents became highly unpopular. The courts, at an early date, held them invalid.[9]

[8] An early patent for the establishment of a new industry was granted to a Flemish weaver in 1331. There are records of a merchant, in 1347, having a monopoly for exporting Cornish tea and of an individual, in 1376, having a monopoly to sell sweet wines in the City of London. The first patent for a new invention that has been found in the records dates from 1561 and covers the manufacture of saltpetre. Meinhardt, Inventions, Patents and Monopoly, pp. 30, 35 (London, 1946).

As early as 1602, Francis Bacon, in the House of Commons, supported the principle that a monopoly should be granted only for a "new manufacture." In 1623, there was enacted the Statute of Monopolies (21 Jac. I, c. 3, § 1; 1 Walker on Patents, pp. 18-21 (Deller's ed. 1937)) which declared void all monopolies and letters patent "of or for the sole Buying, Selling, Making, Working or Using of any Thing within this Realm, . . .". However, § VI of this Act made an express exception in favor of patents for inventions.[10] That Section has become the foundation of the patent law securing exclusive rights to inventors not only in Great Britain but throughout the world.

The result, historically and in principle, has not been a conflict between two legislative mandates. It has been rather a long standing approval, both by the British Parliament and the Congress of the United States, of the unique value of the exercise, for limited periods, of exclusive rights by inventors to their respective inventions, paralleled by an equally sustained and emphatic disapproval of certain other restraints of trade not representative of exclusive rights of inventors to their inventions.

The long and unfaltering development of our patent law often has been touched upon in our decisions. However, in the face of the direct attack now made upon some of its underlying principles, the infinite importance of our inventions justifies a brief review here of the development and nature of the patent rights attacked. The decision in this case must turn upon this Court's understanding of the relation between the licenses before it, the patent rights to which they relate and the Sherman Act. As interpreter of the Congressional Acts that have expressed the patent policy of this nation since its beginning, this Court is entrusted with the protection of that policy against intrusions upon it. The crucial importance of the development of inventions and discoveries is not limited to this nation. As the population of the world has increased, its geographical frontiers have shrunk. However, the frontiers of science have expanded until civilization now depends largely upon discoveries on those frontiers to meet the infinite needs of the future. The United States, thus far, has taken a leading part in making those discoveries and in putting them to use.

Cas. 1; a royal grant of exclusive right to manufacture playing cards within the realm was held void as violating the common law and several Acts of Parliament. [10] "VI. Provided also, and be it declared and enacted, That any Declaration before-mentioned shall not extend to any Letters Patents and Grants of Privilege for the Term of fourteen Years or under, hereafter to be made, of the sole Working or Making of any manner of new Manufactures within this Realm, to be the true and first Inventor and Inventors of such Manufactures, which others at the Time of Making such Letters Patents and Grants shall not use, so as also they be not contrary to the Law, nor mischievous to the State, by raising Prices of Commodities at home, or Hurt of Trade, or generally inconvenient: The said fourteen Years to be accounted from the Date of the first Letters Patents, or Grant of such Privilege hereafter to be made, but that the same shall be of such Force as they should be, if this Act had never been made, and of none other." 21 Jac. I, c. 3 (1623).

"The Statute of Monopolies created no new right either in the Crown or the people; it was simply declaratory of the common law and enacted into statute law, which bound the Sovereign, the doctrines that the courts had repeatedly affirmed, and reiterated those principles of the Magna Charta (9 Henry III, Ch. XXXVII, A. D. 1225) which declared that the liberties of his subjects shall not be infringed or broken by royal usurpation, and it limited the royal prerogative to certain definite terms and conditions under which it might be lawfully exercised. It is to be noted that there was a reservation of Letters Patent and grants of the privilege of the sole working or making of any new manufactures within the realm to the true and first inventor; conferring upon him an exclusive privilege for the term of fourteen years." 1 Walker on Patents, supra, at p. 22.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "The Congress shall have Power . . . To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries; . . ." (Italics supplied.) Art. I, § 8.

The statutes primarily implementing this provision state:

"Any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvements thereof, . . . not known or used by others in this country, before his invention or discovery thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, before his invention or discovery thereof, or more than one year prior to his application, and not in public use or on sale in this country for more than one year prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned, may, upon payment of the fees required by law, and other due proceeding had, obtain a patent therefor." R. S. § 4886, as amended, 46 Stat. 376, 53 Stat. 1212, 35 U. S. C. § 31.

"Every patent shall contain a short title or description of the invention or discovery, correctly indicating its nature and design, and a grant to the patentee, his heirs or assigns, for the term of seventeen years, of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention or discovery . . . throughout the United States and the Territories thereof, referring to the specification for the particulars thereof. . . ." (Italics supplied.) R. S. § 4884, as amended, 46 Stat. 376, 35 U. S. C. § 40.[11]

"Every application for patent or patent or any interest therein shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing, and the applicant or patentee or his assigns or legal representatives may in like manner grant and convey an exclusive right under his application for patent or patent to the whole or any specified part of the United States. . . ." (Italics supplied.) R. S. § 4898, as amended, 55 Stat. 634, 35 U. S. C. (Supp. V, 1946) § 47.

Conway P. Coe, Commissioner of Patents of the United States from 1933 to 1945, discussed the historical significance of the early establishment of the American patent system in his testimony before the Temporary National Economic Committee in 1939. He said:

"The American patent system was established at a time when mechanical inventions had already begun to affect not only the industrial conditions, but also the economic, social, and political status of Europe and the new Nation just erected on this continent. The significance of the inventions put to work in England and the States of the Confederation was realized by the American statesmen of that era. It is agreed that their recognition of the value of these new economic factors prompted them to write into the Constitution the provision of article I, section 8, empowering Congress 'to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.' This provision, by the way, is impressive not only because it is included in the Constitution as one of the major grants of power to Congress, but equally because it bestows on patentees a complete monopoly, and therefore raises a question as to the constitutionality of an attempt to compel the owner of a patent to share with others the title, use, and avail of his property. I do not presume to determine the point; but I must contemplate it as an issue to be met here or hereafter.

"The authors of our patent system, judging by the language of article I, section 8, held the exclusiveness of the rights vested in a patentee as a powerful aid to [11] The first Act to implement the constitutional provision was approved April 10, 1790. It provided:

"Section 1. . . ., That upon the petition of any person or persons to the Secretary of State, the Secretary for the department of war, and the Attorney General of the United States, setting forth, that he, she, or they, hath or have invented or discovered any useful art, manufacture, engine, machine, or device, or any improvement therein not before known or used, and praying that a patent may be granted therefor, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Secretary of State, the Secretary for the department of war, and the Attorney General, or any two of them, if they shall deem the invention or discovery sufficiently useful and important, to cause letters patent to be made out in the name of the United States, to bear teste by the President of the United States, reciting the allegations and suggestions of the said petition, and describing the said invention or discovery, clearly, truly and fully, and thereupon granting to such petitioner or petitioners, his, her or their heirs, administrators or assigns for any term not exceeding fourteen years, the sole and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using and vending to others to be used, the said invention or discovery; . . . ." (Italics supplied.) 1 Stat. 109-110.

progress in arts and sciences."[12] Hearings before the Temporary National Economic Committee, 76th Cong., 1st Sess. 839-840 (1939).

He analyzed the "patent rights" granted to the inventor and stated his reasons for concluding that the "monopoly" vested in a patentee is not in conflict with our antitrust laws as follows:

"It occurs to me that a great deal of misapprehension results from the failure to distinguish between the monopoly or privilege vested in a patentee and the sort of monopoly that British sovereigns once conferred. It is only when we appreciate this distinction that we can understand how Jefferson could consistently advocate the monopoly of patents for inventions

[12] The Commissioner referred to the special interest of President Jefferson in this subject:

"No American among his contemporaries or his successors has achieved a greater reputation as an opponent of monopoly than Thomas Jefferson. Yet he not merely sanctioned, he eloquently advocated the form of monopoly represented in patents. I cite his commentary on an early act of Congress, presumably that of 1790, in the administration of which he collaborated with Henry Knox, Secretary of War, and Edmund Randolph, Attorney General.

" 'An act of Congress authorizing the issue of patents for new discoveries has given a spring to invention beyond my conception. Being an instrument of granting the patents, I am acquainted with their discoveries.

" 'In the arts, and especially in the mechanical arts, many ingenious improvements are made in consequence of the patent-right giving exclusive use of them for 14 years.

" 'Certainly an inventor ought to be allowed a right to the benefit of his invention for some certain time. Nobody wishes more than I do that ingenuity should receive liberal encouragement.' " Hearings before the Temporary National Economic Committee, supra, at p. 840.

Some conception of the degree to which the present patent system has been resorted to is found in Commissioner Coe's testimony that, up to 1939, over 2,000,000 patents had been issued, apart from design patents and reissues. The figure is now approximately 2,500,000 of which all but about 100,000 have been issued since 1870. He showed also that only about 60% of the applications filed are finally granted. (Id. at p. 844, and Exhibits 179 and 180.) See also, Official Gazette, U. S. Pat. Off., Vol. 605, p. 714 (Dec. 30, 1947).

After the final report of the Temporary National Economic Committee, the President issued Executive Order No. 8977, December 12, 1941, 1 C. F. R. Cum. Supp. 1040, establishing the National Patent Planning Commission to conduct a comprehensive survey and study of the American patent system and, among other things, to—"consider whether the system now provides the maximum service in stimulating the inventive genius of our people in evolving inventions and in furthering their prompt utilization for the public good; . . . whether there are obstructions in our existing system of patent laws, and if so, how they can be eliminated; . . . and what methods and plans might be developed to promote inventions and discoveries which will increase commerce, provide employment, and fully utilize expanded defense industrial facilities during normal times."

The President appointed Charles F. Kettering, Chairman, Chester C. Davis, Francis P. Gaines, Edward F. McGrady and Owen D. Young as members of the Committee. The Report of the Committee, transmitted by the President to Congress June 18, 1943 (H. R. Doc. No. 239, 78th Cong., 1st Sess. 1), contained the following:

"The American patent system established by the Constitution giving Congress the 'power to promote the progress of science and useful arts,' is over 150 years old. The system has accomplished all that the framers of the Constitution intended. It is the only provision of the Government for the promotion of invention and discovery and is the basis upon which our entire industrial civilization rests.

"The American people and their Government should recognize the fundamental rightness and fairness of protecting the creations of its inventors by the patent grant. The basic principles of the present system should be preserved. The system has contributed to the growth and greatness of our Nation; it has—

(1) Encouraged and rewarded inventiveness and creativeness, producing new products and processes which have placed the United States far ahead of other countries in the field of scientific and technological endeavor;

(2) Stimulated American inventors to originate a major portion of the important industrial and basic inventions of the past 150 years;

(3) Facilitated the rapid development and general application of new discoveries in the United States to an extent exceeding that of any other country;

(4) Contributed to the achievement of the highest standard of living that any nation has ever enjoyed;

(5) Stimulated creation and development of products and processes necessary to arm the Nation and to wage successful war;

(6) Contributed to the improvement of the public health and the public safety; and

(7) Operated to protect the individual and small business concerns during the formative period of a new enterprise.

The strongest industrial nations have the most effective patent systems and after a careful study, the Commission has reached the conclusion that the American system is the best in the world." (Italics supplied.)

In its summary of findings and recommendations it added:

"The patent system is the foundation of American enterprise and has demonstrated its value over a period coextensive with the life of our Government. The principle of recognizing a property right in intellectual creation is sound and should be continued as contemplated in the Constitution." (Id. at p. 9.)

while condemning the traditional form of monopoly.

"Americans generally detest monopoly in the true sense of the term because it makes possible the ruthless exercise of power. Indeed, the American Revolution was precipitated by popular resentment of the monopoly on tea held by the East India Co. It would, therefore, have been exceedingly strange if, only a few years later, the delegates sent to the Constitutional Convention by Massachusetts and the other Colonies had been willing to sanction an equivalent form of monopoly under the new government they were creating. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a king or queen of England could reward a favorite by granting him a monopoly on salt or some other necessary of life. This beneficiary of royal favor was not, of course, the discoverer of salt. That came ready-made from the hands of the Creator eons before the advent of man. What the darling of his or her majesty received was the power to compel others to use salt solely of his supplying and only on terms of his dictation.

"But a patent is no such monopoly. It is a reward for the invention or discovery of something new, something before unknown, something added to the sum total of human knowledge, utility, well-being; something which the inventor or discoverer, despising the lure of money or fame, might have withheld from his fellow men. By the monopoly that goes with a patent, then, the Government recompenses and, for a limited time, protects the inventor or discoverer who gives to the world the use and benefit of his invention or discovery. This is a kind and a degree of mutuality that negatives monopoly in the old or the current concept. Monopoly in the latter sense of the term gave to an individual or a group complete dominion of something already existent. A patent awards monopoly to the producer of something original, something superadded to the common store. So it is that two things bearing the same name need not be of the same nature.

"It has been contended that there sometimes occurs a clash between the antitrust laws and the patent statutes. I might suggest that since the first antitrust legislation in 1890, the patent laws and the antitrust laws have coexisted without any irreconcilable conflicts between them. They have each of them at least one common objective, namely, the retention by the public of a right once acquired by it. As a matter of fact, patents accomplish more than the retention of the acquired rights. Their influence is creative; they operate to multiply and expand acquisitions by the public." (Id. at pp. 840-841.)

A comparable analysis of the nature of the grant to inventors of the exclusive right to their respective inventions or discoveries for a limited time has been made by this Court.

"Though often so characterized, a patent is not, accurately speaking, a monopoly, for it is not created by the executive authority at the expense and to the prejudice of all the community except the grantee of the patent. Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. 516, 533. The term monopoly connotes the giving of an exclusive privilege for buying, selling, working or using a thing which the public freely enjoyed prior to the grant. Thus a monopoly takes something from the people. An inventor deprives the public of nothing which it enjoyed before his discovery, but gives something of value to the community by adding to the sum of human knowledge. United States v. Bell Telephone Co., 167 U. S. 224, 239; Paper Bag Patent case, 210 U. S. 405, 424; Brooks v. Jenkins, 3 McLean 432, 437; Parker v. Haworth, 4 McLean 370, 372; Allen v. Hunter, 6 McLean 303, 305-306; Attorney General v. Rumford Chemical Works, 2 Bann. & Ard. 298, 302. He may keep his invention secret and reap its fruits indefinitely. In consideration of its disclosure and the consequent benefit to the community, the patent is granted. An exclusive enjoyment is guaranteed him for seventeen years, but upon the expiration of that period, the knowledge of the invention enures to the people, who are thus enabled without restriction to practice it and profit by its use. Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. 322, 327; United States v. Bell Telephone Co., supra, p. 239. To this end the law requires such disclosure to be made in the application for patent that others skilled in the art may understand the invention and how to put it to use." United States v. Dubilier Condenser Corp., 289 U. S. 178, 186-187.[13]

[13] In Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. 218, 241-242, 243, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"The law further declares that the patent 'shall be good and available to the grantee or grantees by force of this act, to all and every intent and purpose herein contained.' The amendatory act of 1793 contains the same language, and it cannot be doubted that the settled purpose of the United States has ever been, and continues to be, to confer on the authors of useful inventions an exclusive right in their inventions for the time mentioned in their patent. It is the reward stipulated for the advantages derived by the public for the exertions of the individual, and is intended as a stimulus to those exertions. The laws which are passed to give

This constitutional and legislative policy toward inventions is specific in contrast with the generality of the language in the Sherman Act of 1890. The constitutional and long standing statutory approval of the exclusive rights of an inventor to make, use and sell products of his invention for a limited time was an ample guaranty that the Sherman Act did not directly or impliedly repeal such approval. The prohibition of unreasonable restraints of trade and the approval of exclusive rights of inventors to their inventions for limited periods of time continued to exist together. This was nothing new. As long as the inventors kept within their statutory exclusive rights, they were not engaging in unreasonable restraints of trade violating the Sherman Act.

There was nothing to indicate an intent that the general language of the Sherman Act was to change the nation's traditional and specifically stated policy towards inventions. That policy had been widely regarded as having made a major contribution to the nation's exceptional economic progress. The Sherman Act unquestionably applied to any abuse of a patentee's exclusive rights which exceeded the limit of those rights and which amounted to an unreasonable restraint of interstate trade. However, there was nothing to indicate that the Sherman Act restricted the traditional patent rights. Bement v. National Harrow Co., supra, at p. 92.

Limited License Agreements

The primary issue in this case, therefore, is to determine whether or not Line by the issuance of its restricted licenses has thereby sought to exercise any right that is in excess of the exclusive right secured to Line by the patent laws of the United States. If it has done so, then such licenses, like other agreements, must be scrutinized to determine whether or not they create an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act.

The first consideration is the relation of the Sherman Act to provisions in a license agreement which place limitations—as in the Bement and General Electric cases—upon the prices which may be charged by the licensee for products made and sold by it under the protection of its license. The issue corresponds to that raised by the Westinghouse license in the General Electric case.[14] The Sherman Act's invalidation of agreements in restraint of trade applies only to those in unreasonable restraint of trade and the definition of such unreasonableness depends largely upon the common law meaning of restraint of trade.[15] This permits such invalidation where, for example, a license is a mere subterfuge for price fixing which otherwise would amount to unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act. See United States v. U. S. Gypsum Co., post, p. 364, decided concurrently with this case.[16] effect to this purpose ought, we think, to be construed in the spirit in which they have been made; and to execute the contract fairly on the part of the United States, where the full benefit has been actually received: if this can be done without transcending the intention of the statute, or countenancing acts which are fraudulent or may prove mischievous. The public yields nothing which it has not agreed to yield; it receives all which it has contracted to receive. The full benefit of the discovery, after its enjoyment by the discoverer for fourteen years, is preserved; and for his exclusive enjoyment of it during that time the public faith is pledged. . . .

"The great object and intention of the act is to secure to the public the advantages to be derived from the discoveries of individuals, and the means it employs are the compensation made to those individuals for the time and labour devoted to these discoveries, by the exclusive right to make, use and sell, the things discovered for a limited time."

[14] There is no issue here corresponding to the other issue examined and upheld in the General Electric case, namely, that involving the validity of the patentee's agency system of sales of its patented article. Another system for making sales of a patented article has been held invalid where the "agencies" were found not to be bona fide agencies. United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265. That case, in turn, did not reach the issue raised by the Westinghouse license in the General Electric case. The Court there said (p. 277): "we need not reach the problems presented by Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, and that part of the General Electric case which dealt with the license to Westinghouse Company."

[15] United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 179-180. See also, Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1.

[16] The instant case also is to be distinguished sharply from those in which the parties to a license have sought to fix prices for the resale by the licensee of patented products previously sold to the licensee by the patentee or others. United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241, 252; Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. United States, 309 U. S. 436, 452, 456-457; Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U. S. 502, 516; Straus v. Victor Talking Machine Co., 243 U. S. 490, 500-501; Bauer & Cie v. O'Donnell, 229 U. S. 1, 16-17. See also, Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, 169; United Shoe Mach. Co. v. United States, 258 U. S. 451, 463-464; Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20, 48-49; Adams v. Burke, 17 Wall. 453, 455-456.

The Sherman Act's prohibition of unreasonable restraints of trade, accordingly, would not invalidate an unconditional, nonexclusive license agreement which served only to release the licensee from the right of the patent holder to exclude him from making, using or selling a patented article. The original, exclusive right of the patent holder, being secured to him through the terms of his patent, was not in violation of the Sherman Act. Accordingly, his release or waiver of a part of that exclusive right by issuance of an unconditional, nonexclusive license, per se, decreased rather than increased the statutory restraint of trade to which he was entitled.

The next question is whether the insertion in such a license of some limitation upon the licensee's right to sell the articles made by the licensee under the patent, per se, converts this otherwise lawful agreement into an unreasonable restraint of trade violative of the Sherman Act. The answer is no. Just as an unlimited license is a partial, but lawful, relaxation of the lawful restraint of trade imposed by the patent, so a limited license is but a correspondingly less relaxation of that same restraint.

The fact that the limitation in the license is a limitation on the price which may be charged by the licensee in making sales of the article made by the licensee under the protection of the patent does not change the answer, provided the price prescribed is "normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly."[17] Here again, the restraint of trade imposed by the patent itself is lawful. Therefore, as long as the license agreement has only the effect of reducing the lawful restraint imposed by the patent, such agreement merely converts the original lawful restraint into a lesser restraint, equally lawful.

Such agreements should be carefully scrutinized to make sure that they do not introduce new restrictions which, as judicially construed, unreasonably restrain trade and thus violate the Sherman Act. In the instant case the findings eliminate such possibilities and thus reduce the issue here to one comparable with the issue in the Bement and General Electric cases.

This brings us to a further discussion of the nature of the license in the present case and of the precise limitations contained in it. This requires, first of all, a consideration of the nature of the exclusive right to make, use and sell the patented product. The precise nature of such a "patent right" has been described as follows by Chief Justice Taft in a unanimous opinion of this Court:

> "It is the fact that the patentee has invented or discovered something useful and thus has the common law right to make, use and vend it himself which induces the Government to clothe him with power to exclude everyone else from making, using or vending it. In other words, the patent confers on such common law right the incident of exclusive enjoyment and it is the common law right with this incident which a patentee or an assignee must have [in order to bring a suit for infringement]. That is the implication of the descriptive words of the grant 'the exclusive right to make, use and vend the invention.' The Government is not granting the common law right to make, use and vend, but it is granting the incident of exclusive ownership of that common law right, which can not be enjoyed save with the common law right. A patent confers a monopoly. So this Court has decided in the Paper Bag case, supra [210 U. S. 405], and in many other cases. The idea of monopoly held by one in making, using and vending connotes the right in him to do that thing from which he excludes others." Crown Co. v. Nye Tool Works, 261 U. S. 24, 36-37.

This analysis is the key to the issue before us. It demonstrates that the common law right to make, use and sell the product of an unpatented invention exists without any right to exclude others from so making, using or selling such product. The additional "exclusive right," or so-called "patent right," which is added to the common law right of the inventor is added by authority of the Constitution and of the federal statutes, so as to promote the progress of science, the useful arts and, no doubt, the general welfare. The patent or any interest therein may be assigned. R. S. § 4898, as amended, 55 Stat. 634, 35 U. S. C. (Supp. V, 1946) § 47.[18] An assignee, exercising his right to exclude others during the life of the patent from making, using or selling

[18] In discussing this patent monopoly and the patent laws of the United States this Court long ago said:

"The monopoly thus granted is one entire thing, and cannot be divided into parts, except as authorized by those laws. The patentee or his assigns may, by instrument in writing, assign, articles under protection of the patent, does not practice a restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act any more than would his assignor if the assignment had not been made.

Any attempted assignment or transfer short of those indicated in the statute "is a mere license, giving the licensee no title in the patent, and no right to sue at law in his own name for an infringement." [19] The legal position of the holder of a simple, unconditional, nonexclusive license is important.[20] Before his receipt of his license, he had the common law right to make, use and sell the patented article as well as other articles, except to the important extent prevented by the patentee's exclusive rights. The license changed that position by withdrawing from the licensee, to the extent of the license, the restriction which the patent placed upon him. Accordingly, to the extent of his license, the restraint placed upon trade by the patent was diminished. In relation to the Sherman Act his license, instead of creating an added ground for asserting a violation of the Sherman Act, thus, per se, relaxed an existing restraint of trade. The previous restraint imposed by the patent was not a violation of the Sherman Act and, therefore, the mere lessening of that restraint was not a violation of that Act. The important point is the need to see to it that the lessening of the restraint resulting from the issuance of either an absolute license or a limited license is, in fact, no more than a mere withdrawal of the lawful restraint imposed by the patent and is not either directly or indirectly an imposition of a new restraint not within the ambit of the patent right. An unconditional, nonexclusive and royalty-free license presents, per se, no need for special scrutiny under the Sherman Act. A royalty-yielding license presents the issue suggested by the language in the General Electric case. In order not to violate the Sherman Act, the royalty must be "normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly." [21] However, as well explained in that case, a royalty may not, by itself, satisfy the needs of the patent holder. Limitations on the price of sales by the licensee of products made by the licensee under the patent may be the best, or even the only, condition that is thus "normally and reasonably adapted" to the situation.

The following statements illustrate the directness with which this Court repeatedly has decided in favor of the validity of limited licenses when that question has been before it:

> ". . . the general rule is absolute freedom in the use or sale of rights under the patent laws of the United States. The very object of these laws is monopoly, and the rule is, with few exceptions, that any conditions which are not in their very nature illegal with regard to this kind of property, imposed by the patentee and agreed to by the licensee for the right to manufacture or use or sell the article, will be upheld by the courts. The fact that the conditions in the contracts keep up the monopoly or fix prices does not render them illegal." Bement v. National Harrow Co., supra, at p. 91.
> "As was said in United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, 489, the patentee may grant a license 'upon any condition the performance of which is reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant of the patent is entitled to secure.' The restriction here imposed [upon the licensee to manufacture and to sell the patented article for certain uses only] is of that character. The practice of granting the licenses for a restricted use is an old one, see Rubber Company v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 788, 799, 800; Gamewell Fire-Alarm Telegraph Co. v. Brooklyn, 14 F. 255. So far as appears, its legality has never been questioned." General Talking Pictures Corp. v. Western Electric Co., 305 U. S. 124, 127.

Rev. Stat. § 4898. . . . Any assignment or transfer, short of one of these, is a mere license, giving the licensee no title in the patent, and no right to sue at law in his own name for an infringement. Rev. [21] General Electric case, supra, at p. 490.

The normality, reasonableness and practical necessity for inserting a price-limiting condition in certain licenses, without trespassing upon the prohibited area of unlawful restraints of trade, is effectively summarized in the General Electric case, at p. 490:

"If the patentee goes further, and licenses the selling of the articles, may he limit the selling by limiting the method of sale and the price? We think he may do so, provided the conditions of sale are normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly. One of the valuable elements of the exclusive right of a patentee is to acquire profit by the price at which the article is sold. The higher the price, the greater the profit, unless it is prohibitory. When the patentee licenses another to make and vend, and retains the right to continue to make and vend on his own account, the price at which his licensee will sell will necessarily affect the price at which he can sell his own patented goods. It would seem entirely reasonable that he should say to the licensee, 'Yes, you may make and sell articles under my patent, but not so as to destroy the profit that I wish to obtain by making them and selling them myself.' He does not thereby sell outright to the licensee the articles the latter may make and sell, or vest absolute ownership in them. He restricts the property and interest the licensee has in the goods he makes and proposes to sell." [22]

During the hearings of the Temporary National Economic Committee, testimony was received from the Commissioner of Patents and manufacturers familiar with the commercial development of patented products bearing on the reasonableness and propriety of price limitations in patent licenses comparable to those in the present case. It was to the effect that commercially successful mechanical inventions, such as those in the electrical, communications and automotive industries, usually represent not only the intrinsic merit of the inventions themselves but a substantial investment in research, experimentation and promotion. If, after the disclosure of the invention, others are to be licensed to make the patented article, the costs of production by such licensees will reflect none of the investments above-mentioned. If the patentee is to be reimbursed for his expenditures, he will need, therefore, to secure the benefit of a royalty sufficient to accomplish this or of a restriction on the price at which licensees may sell their products under the patent. This price would have to be one that would enable the patentee to manufacture and sell the article in such quantities and at such prices as would produce a return to him commensurate with his investment in it. He might prescribe both a royalty and a restriction. As long as the royalties and the prices were "normally and reasonably adapted to secure pecuniary re-

"This question was considered by this Court in the case of Bement v. National Harrow Company, 186 U. S. 70. A combination of manufacturers owning a patent to make float spring tool harrows, licensed others to make and sell the products under the patent, on condition that they would not during the continuance of the license sell the products at a less price, or on more favorable terms of payment and delivery to purchasers, than were set forth in a schedule made part of the license. That was held to be a valid use of the patent rights of the owners of the patent. It was objected that this made for a monopoly. The Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Peckham, said (p. 91):

" 'The very object of these laws is monopoly, and the rule is, with few exceptions, that any conditions which are not in their very nature illegal with regard to this kind of property, imposed by the patentee and agreed to by the licensee for the right to manufacture or use or sell the article, will be upheld by the courts. The fact that the conditions in the contracts keep up the monopoly or fix prices does not render them illegal.'

"Speaking of the contract, he said (p. 93):

" 'The provision in regard to the price at which the licensee would sell the article manufactured under the license was also an appropriate and reasonable condition. It tended to keep up the price of the implements manufactured and sold, but that was only recognizing the nature of the property dealt in, and providing for its value so far as possible. This the parties were legally entitled to do. The owner of a patented article can, of course, charge such price as he may choose, and the owner of a patent may assign it or sell the right to manufacture and sell the article patented upon the condition that the assignee shall charge a certain amount for such article.' "

Judge Westenhaver, whose judgment in the District Court was affirmed by this Court in the General Electric case, said:

"If both licensor and licensee are making and selling, it is quite conceivable that the owner of the patent could not safely grant licenses at all on any other terms; otherwise, he would risk having his business destroyed, and hence, as a matter of ordinary business prudence, would feel obliged to keep his patent monopoly wholly within his own hands. And it was so held in Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, 22 S. Ct. 747, 46 L. Ed. 1058." United States v. General Electric Co., 15 F. 2d 715, 718.

ward for the patentee's monopoly"[23] they would perform much the same function.[24]

In cases where patents are owned by comparatively small industrial producers but licenses are to be issued by them to comparatively large industrial producers in the same field, the necessity for early reimbursement of the patent owners for their development costs is clear and the danger that a large licensee will undersell his smaller licensor is obvious. This is the situation in the present case. The General Electric Company and the Westinghouse Electric Corporation are among the licensees of the much smaller patent holders, Line and Southern. Similarly, where outside capital is needed to finance the development of an invention, it is normal and reasonable for the investors to require not only a valid patent but also to insist that any licenses issued during the initial operating period shall contain such price limitations as will allow the patent holder to amortize his original investment within a reasonable time. In this case, finding of fact No. 32 shows that "The price limitation provisions contained in the various license agreements here in evidence were insisted upon by the patent owner and were intended and reasonably adapted to protect its own business and secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly."[25]

The following statement by Conway P. Coe, Commissioner of Patents, before the Temporary National Economic Committee in 1939, reinforces the above conclusions:

"Speculative capital must be encouraged to fall in behind a new enterprise and this is true whether the enterprise is wholly new or represents merely an expansion of an established organization. Some testimony has been offered to this committee by representatives of large corporations that they would continue to invent, and invent, and invent, and research, research, and research whether or not they were rewarded by the patent grant, but, if you will investigate, I believe you will find that whenever these large corporations, themselves firmly established, undertake a new development, that development is likely to be founded upon patent protection. Whatever opinions have been expressed to this committee or may hereafter be expressed as to whether or not the inventor will continue to invent without the patent system, I think I can present to you indisputable evidence that speculative capital will not back new inventions without the patent protection. And in the final analysis this is the crux and the most important thing in the whole patent question."[26] Hearings before the Temporary National Economic Committee, supra, at pp. 857-858.

The foregoing supports the conclusions reached in the Bement and General Electric cases, supra. The basis for such support is sufficiently broad to lead to the same result in the present case.

Sublicenses and Cross-Licenses

Under the foregoing principles and authorities, a simple price-limiting patent license, in which the price limitations meet the test stated in the General Electric case, is a lawful agreement. Such a license would involve, as a possible restraint of trade, only the exclusive right to make, use and sell the patented product. That restraint would exist by virtue of the statute and constitutional provision long antedating the Sherman Act. If the limitations in a license reach beyond the scope of the statutory patent rights, then they must be tested by the terms of the Sherman Act. Assuming [26] In 1939, the Commissioner of Patents testified that of the patents issued, exclusive of design patents and reissues, large corporations (having respectively over $50,000,000 of assets) received but 17.2%, small corporations (having respectively less than $50,000,000 of assets) 34.5%, foreign corporations 5.4% and individuals 42.9%. Subsequent assignments did not materially affect these proportions. Hearings before the Temporary National Economic Committee, supra, at p. 846.

Clarence C. Carlton, president of the Automotive Parts and Equipment Manufacturers Association, testified that in the automotive parts industry:

"Patents are valued so much more by the small manufacturer than they are by the large manufacturer. . . . if anything happened to this patent system the fellow who would be hurt more than anyone else would be the smaller manufacturer." (Id. at pp. 1057, 1058.)

that in the instant case the price limitations do not reach beyond the restraint of the patent, the next question is: does the additional sublicense issued by Line under the Southern patent make a difference? The answer is no.

The sublicense, per se, further diminishes the statutory restraint of trade imposed by the patent law. It adds a release from the restraint of Southern's patent. Line's authority to issue the sublicense was an express grant by Southern to Line of an exclusive right to issue it. Per se, this sublicense certainly amounts to no more than another license under another patent. In the instant case it is under a complementary patent without which Line's license would be without commercial value. For that very reason it is a reasonable and necessary part of the transaction. In both the Bement and General Electric cases, the license in question was issued not merely under one, but under many patents held by the licensor. In those cases, apparently, it was not thought necessary to question the relation of those patents to one another or the authority of the licensor to issue the license under each of them. In any event, there hardly could have existed in those cases any closer relationship between the patents involved or a more essential and normal reason, of a patent nature, for combining rights under them than existed here between Line's and Southern's complementary patents. Except for the cross-licensing feature, to be next considered, the situation in relation to the Sherman Act is the same here as though Line had received an assignment of Southern's patent and issued licenses under it as well as under Line's patent.

In the present case, there are ten licensee-defendants instead of one as in each of the Bement and General Electric cases. In view of the positive finding that there was no agreement or understanding among the licensees amounting to an unreasonable restraint of trade, this mere multiplication of one license by ten produces a repetition of the same issue rather than a different issue. It is apparent also from the record in the General Electric case that, in that case, in addition to the Westinghouse license, there were licenses to 13 other manufacturers, which had been issued by the licensor, although the licensees under them were not made parties to the suit. 15 F. 2d 715, 716.

It is suggested also that the Bement and General Electric rule does not apply because there is a cross-licensing agreement between Line and Southern. The suggestion apparently is that such an agreement, per se, reaches beyond the scope of the exclusive rights of the parties under the patents and converts the price limitations in the respective licenses into unreasonable restraints of trade violating the Sherman Act.

The cross-license from Southern carries no price-limiting feature. At most it is a royalty-free cross-license issued to Line in consideration of Line's license to Southern. It is accompanied by a grant from Southern to Line of an exclusive license to grant sublicenses under Southern's patent. Provision is made also for the equal division between Southern and Line of such royalties as shall be received by Line upon products made and sold by the respective licensees under the Southern and Line patents.

These sublicenses and the royalties derived from them do not, however, increase the restraints on trade beyond those restraints which are inherent in the respective patents. In fact, each original license decreased those restraints under Line's patent and each sublicense did the same under Southern's patent. Because of the complementary relationship between the patents, these sublicenses have served substantially to remove the restraints which the respective patents, when held separately, put in the way of production. The two patents together completely covered the product. If the price limitations were valid under Line's licenses, the issuance by Line of the sublicenses under Southern's patent has no more effect on the question involved in this case than if Southern, instead of granting to Line an exclusive right to issue sublicenses under Southern's patent, had assigned that patent to Line and Line had then issued original licenses under it on the same terms as Line issued the sublicenses.

The next consideration is the effect of the cross-license by Southern to Line, coupled with the grant of the exclusive right to issue the above-mentioned sublicenses under Southern's patent and the division of certain royalties received by Line. Where, as here, there is no agreement, course of dealing or other circumstance than the existence of the cross-licenses between complementary patent holders, the cross-licensing agreements do not, per se, reach beyond the scope of the patent rights.

Patent pools, especially those including unrelated or distantly related patents and involving the issuance of many forms of royalty-free, royalty-bearing or price-limiting licenses and cross-licenses, might present a different picture from that in this case. Such arrangements might be but a screen for, or incident to, an unlawful agreement in restraint of trade violating the Sherman Act. Here we have no such facts. The findings eliminate all bases for the claim of invalidity except the terms of the license agreements, per se. We are not here confronted with the effect of cross-licenses between unrelated patents. Here we have only that natural situation, common under our patent laws, where two or more complementary patents are separately owned. One is for an improvement that is commercially essential to the other. In such a case one solution is to combine the ownership of the two by purchase and complete assignment. That, per se, would not involve an unlawful restraint of trade.

The solution in the instant case was even more natural than a consolidation of the patents by purchase. It conduced even more to the maintenance of competition. Each patentee granted to the other a nonexclusive, royalty-free license. This cross-licensing amounted to a waiver by each patent holder of his right to exclude the other from making, using or selling the patented product. This resulted in a diminution of the restraint created by the patent statute. This, per se, was, therefore, well within the scope of the patent and not a violation of the Sherman Act. Both patentees became producers.

Unless the terms of the cross-licenses reach beyond those that are normally and reasonably adapted to the patent relationships of the parties, the cross-licenses are no more outside of the protection of the patent law than would be direct licenses. A reasonable price-limiting provision in at least one of two cross-licenses is just as normal and reasonable a patent provision as it would be in a direct license. In the present case the validity of the price limitation in Line's license to Southern is entitled to the same judicial support and for the same reasons as if no cross-license had been issued in exchange.

In the present case, the need for the price-limiting provisions, both in the license to Southern and in the licenses to the other ten defendants, rests upon the need of the patent holder to protect its opportunity to continue the manufacture of its own patented product. The substance of the situation is that the patent holder needs to protect itself precisely as much and in the same way as in the case of a direct license standing alone. The Sherman Act traditionally tests its violation not by the form but by the substance of the transaction.

In distinction from patent pools and from cross-licenses between holders of competing or even noncompeting but unrelated patents, we have here a case of a cross-license and a division of royalties between holders of patents which are complementary and vitally dependent upon each other. We have here complementary patents each of which alone is commercially of little value, but both of which, together, spell commercial success for the product. Cross-licenses between their holders, on terms within the needs of their patent monopolies, are essential to the realization of the benefits contemplated by the patent statutes. Far from being unlawful agreements violative of the Sherman Act, such agreements provide in fact the only reasonable means for releasing to the public the benefits intended for the public by the patent laws. A cross-license between mutually deadlocked complementary patents is, per se, a desirable procedure. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, 170, et seq. Its validity must depend upon the terms and substance of the surrounding circumstances.

The record in the General Electric case discloses that the license agreement between the General Electric Company and Westinghouse which was there upheld was itself a cross-licensing agreement.[27] In fact, the opinion of the lower court in the instant [27] "As a part consideration for the granting of the foregoing licenses, the Licensee (Westinghouse) hereby grants and agrees to grant to the Licensor (General Electric) a non-exclusive license under the United States patents which it now owns or controls and under those which may issue on pending applications now owned or controlled by it, and under any United States patents which the Licensee may own or control, during the term of this agreement, for improvements in incandescent lamps specified in paragraphs a, b, c and d of Article 2, to make, use and sell throughout the United States and the territories thereof incandescent lamps of the kinds specified in said paragraphs of Article 2 hereof, such license being personal, non-assignable, indivisible and non-transferable except to successors to substantially the entire good will and business of the Licensor, and to continue for the period during which the licenses from the Licensor to the Licensee remain in force." Par. (8) of Agreement between General Electric Company and Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company, March 1, 1912, Exhibit A, at p. 117 of the record in the Supreme Court of the United States, No. 113, O. T. 1926.

case commented on that cross-license as follows:

"A cross-license agreement existed between General Electric and Westinghouse which contained agreements even more restrictive than the price protection provisions of the cross-licenses involved in the case at bar." United States v. Line Material Co., 64 F. Supp. 970, 975.

The opinion in the General Electric case makes no distinction between cross-licenses and direct licenses. That case, therefore, is itself a precedent for upholding a cross-licensing agreement under facts characterized below as being "even more restrictive" than those here presented.

The acquisition by a single party of patents on noncompeting machines has been held not to be, per se, a violation of the Sherman Act. In United States v. Winslow, 227 U. S. 202, 217, Mr. Justice Holmes, in a unanimous opinion of the Court, said:

"The machines are patented, making them is a monopoly in any case, the exclusion of competitors from the use of them is of the very essence of the right conferred by the patents, Paper Bag Patent case, 210 U. S. 405, 429, and it may be assumed that the success of the several groups was due to their patents having been the best. As, . . . they did not compete with one another, it is hard to see why the collective business should be any worse than its component parts. . . . we can see no greater objection to one corporation manufacturing seventy per cent. of three noncompeting groups of patented machines collectively used for making a single product than to three corporations making the same proportion of one group each. The disintegration aimed at by the statute does not extend to reducing all manufacture to isolated units of the lowest degree."

See also, United States v. United Shoe Mach. Co., 247 U. S. 32, 45, 51, et seq.; United Shoe Mach. Co. v. United States, 258 U. S. 451, 463-464.

In Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, 170-171, 175, Mr. Justice Brandeis spoke as follows for a unanimous Court (except for Mr. Justice Stone who took no part in the case):

"The Government concedes that it is not illegal for the primary defendants to cross-license each other and the respective licensees; and that adequate consideration can legally be demanded for such grants. But it contends that the insertion of certain additional provisions in these agreements renders them illegal. It urges, first, that the mere inclusion of the provisions for the division of royalties, constitutes an unlawful combination under the Sherman Act because it evidences an intent to obtain a monopoly. This contention is unsound. Such provisions for the division of royalties are not in themselves conclusive evidence of illegality. Where there are legitimately conflicting claims or threatened interferences, a settlement by agreement, rather than litigation, is not precluded by the Act. . . . An interchange of patent rights and a division of royalties according to the value attributed by the parties to their respective patent claims is frequently necessary if technical advancement is not to be blocked by threatened litigation.[28] . .

"But an agreement for cross-licensing and division of royalties violates the Act only when used to effect a monopoly, or to fix prices, or to impose otherwise an unreasonable restraint upon interstate commerce."

In the above context, and for the reasons previously presented, it is evident that the agreements effecting a price fixation which thus may violate the Sherman Act are only those which "impose . . . an unreasonable restraint upon interstate commerce," within the meaning of the Sherman Act read in the light of the patent laws.[29] The agreements which remain within the ambits of the patents to which they relate still are lawful agreements by virtue of the patent laws, just as they have been throughout the life of our patent system.

Judicial and Legislative History Since the General Electric Case

Neither the Bement nor the General Electric cases, supra, has been overruled and [28] In that Standard Oil case the footnote at this point stated (p. 171):

"This is often the case where patents covering improvements of a basic process, owned by one manufacturer, are granted to another. A patent may be rendered quite useless, or 'blocked,' by another unexpired patent which covers a vitally related feature of the manufacturing process. Unless some agreement can be reached, the parties are hampered and exposed to litigation. And, frequently, the cost of litigation to a patentee is greater than the value of a patent for a minor improvement."

the reasoning upon which they are based has not been directly or indirectly rejected by this Court. On the other hand, this Court repeatedly has recognized the existence of the principles announced in them. See, for example, Carbice Corp. v. American Patents Development Corp., 283 U. S .27, 31; General Talking Pictures Corp. v. Western Electric Corp., 305 U. S. 124, 127:

> "Appellants argue that the distributors were free to license the films for exhibition subject to the restrictions, just as a patentee in a license to manufacture and sell the patented article may fix the price at which the licensee may sell it." (Citing the Bement and General Electric cases.) Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 228.

And see United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241, 252; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 277.

The rule of stare decisis applies to the interpretation given to the patent statutes and to the Sherman Act by the Bement and General Electric cases. There is no occasion here for such a relaxation of that rule as was suggested by Mr. Justice Brandeis in cases interpreting broad constitutional phrases. See his dissent in Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U. S. 393, 410. To the extent that the present holdings are based upon opinions of this Court, that element is inherent in the rule of stare decisis.

The exceptional recent activity in seeking, by statutory amendment, a change in the patent laws as interpreted in the Bement and General Electric cases indicates a widespread understanding that, if such interpretation is to be changed, the remedy calls for congressional action. The resistance to such a change which has been shown by Congress is impressive.[30] It indicates no dissatisfaction with the interpretation of existing law as expressed in the Bement and General Electric cases.

There appears, therefore, to be neither adequate reason nor authority for overruling the Bement and General Electric cases or for distinguishing this case from them.

[30] Many bills relating to these issues have been introduced in Congress and referred to appropriate committees. Not one has been reported back to either House of Congress.

As early as 1912, H. R. 22345, 62d Cong., 2d Sess., proposed that a patentee be not permitted to fix the price of articles to be sold by others under his patent.

During the hearings held by the Temporary National Economic Committee, the Department of Justice recommended many fundamental as well as minor changes in the patent law. These included the prohibition of price-limiting patent licenses comparable to those here at issue. Preliminary Report, Temporary National Economic Committee, Sen. Doc. No. 95, 76th Cong., 1st Sess. 16-17 (1939). The Department of Commerce took an opposite position. It submitted recommendations for retaining but improving the patent system substantially in accordance with its traditional underlying policies. The Final Report of the Temporary National Economic Committee incorporated the substance of the proposals of the Department of Justice. It included a recommendation that patentees be not permitted to limit the price at which a licensee might sell a product made under the license. Final Report, Temporary National Economic Committee, Sen. Doc. No. 35, 77th Cong., 1st Sess. 36-37 (1941).

In 1941, the President appointed the National Patent Planning Commission to submit recommendations on questions dealt with in the report. (See note 12, supra.) In 1943, among the examples of the proposed reforms which it concluded "would not be a beneficial innovation in our patent system," it listed "outlawing certain limitations in patent licenses, . . . " This evidently referred to the above-mentioned proposals of the Temporary National Economic Committee to outlaw price restrictions and other limitations in patent licenses. Report of the National Patent Planning Commission, House Doc. 239, 78th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1943).

Bills to the same general effect as the proposals of the Temporary National Economic Committee have been introduced and referred to Committees of Congress but have advanced no further. Among them have been the following: S. 2491 (§ 4), S. 2730 (§ 3), H. R. 7713 (§ 3), 77th Cong., 2d Sess. (1942); H. R. 109 (§ 3), H. R. 1371 (§ 29), H. R. 3874 (§ 29), 78th Cong., 1st Sess. (1943); H. R. 97 (§ 29), H. R. 3462 (§ 29), 79th Cong., 1st Sess. (1945); S. 2482, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. (1946); S. 72, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947). Section 3 of S. 2730, supra, proposed that—

"Every sale, assignment, or conveyance of a patent and every grant of a license thereunder, in connection with any condition, agreement, or understanding which restricts the price at which the purchaser, assignee, grantee, or license [licensee] may sell any article producible under the patent and customarily marketed in interstate commerce, is hereby declared to be illegal."

On Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent Licensing Agreements—Price Fixing—Elimination of Competition.—Industry-wide license agreements entered into with knowledge on the part of licensor and licensees of the adherence of others, with the control over prices and methods of distribution through agreements and bulletins are sufficient to establish a prima facie case of conspiracy, in violation of the Sherman Act. The trial court erred in granting defendants' motion to dismiss.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.351, 1610.301.

Findings of Fact—Judicial Review.—The trial court erred in finding that the evidence failed to establish that the defendants associated themselves in a plan to blanket the gypsum industry under patent licenses and to stabilize prices. The Supreme Court may reverse findings of fact by a trial court where such findings are clearly erroneous.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.601.

Reversing and remanding the decision of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,473.

[Nature of Action]

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

The United States instituted this suit on August 15, 1940, in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia against United States Gypsum Company, five other corporate defendants, and seven individual defendants, as a civil proceeding under the Sherman Act. The complaint charged that the appellees had violated both §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by conspiring to fix prices on patented gypsum board and unpatented gypsum products, to standardize gypsum board and its method of production for the purpose of eliminating competition, and to regulate the distribution of gypsum board by eliminating jobbers and fixing resale prices of manufacturing distributors.

The Attorney General filed an expediting certificate on December 16, 1941, and on September 17, 1942, a three-judge court was constituted to hear the case. By amendment to the complaint the government charged that the article claims of five patents owned by United States Gypsum were invalid and void. The appellees moved to strike the amendment to the complaint or in the alternative for partial judgment dismissing the amendment. On November 15, 1943, the court granted appellees' motion for partial judgment on the ground that the government had no standing to attack the validity of the patents in an antitrust proceeding. The case thereupon went to trial and upon conclusion of the government's case on April 20, 1944, the appellees moved to dismiss the complaint under Rule 41 (b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure upon the ground that on the facts and the law the Government had shown no right to relief. On June 15, 1946, the court filed an opinion holding that the motion should be granted, and on August 5, 1946, the court filed findings of fact and conclusions of law and entered judgment dismissing the complaint. The government appealed directly to this Court, 32 Stat. 823, and probable jurisdiction was noted on December 16, 1946. The decisions below are reported as United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 53 F. Supp. 889 and 67 F. Supp. 397. United States v. Line Material Co., decided today, ante, p. 287, will be of value to the reader in considering this opinion.

I.

[Facts]

The appellees are engaged in the production of gypsum and the manufacture of gypsum products, including gypsum plasterboard, gypsum lath, gypsum wallboard, and gypsum plaster. At the time of the alleged conspiracy, appellees sold nearly all of the first three products which were marketed in states east of the Rocky Mountains and a substantial portion of the plaster sold in the same area. Gypsum products are widely used in the construction industry. In 1939, the sales value of gypsum products was approximately $42,000,000, of which $23,000,000 was accounted for by gypsum board (plasterboard, lath, and wallboard), $17,000,000 by gypsum plaster and the remainder by gypsum block and tile and other products. Over 90 per cent of all plaster used in building construction in the United States is made with gypsum.

Gypsum is found in numerous deposits throughout the country. Gypsum board is made by taking the crushed and calcined mineral, adding water, and spreading the gypsum slurry between two paper liners. When the gypsum hardens, the mineral adheres to the paper and the resulting product is used in construction. Plasterboard and lath have a rough surface and are used as a wall and ceiling base for plaster; wallboard has a finished surface and does not require the addition of plaster.

Since its organization in 1901, United States Gypsum has been the dominant concern in the gypsum industry. In 1939 it sold 55 per cent of all gypsum board in the eastern area. By development and purchase it has acquired the most significant patents covering the manufacture of gypsum board, and beginning in 1926, United States Gypsum offered licenses under its patents to other concerns in the industry, all licenses containing a provision that United States Gypsum should fix the minimum price at which the licensee sold gypsum products embodying the patents. Since 1929, United States Gypsum has fixed prices at which the other defendants have sold gypsum board.

The other corporate appellees are National Gypsum Co., Certain-teed Products Corp., Celotex Corp., Ebsary Gypsum Co., and Newark Plaster Co. Appellee Gloyd is the owner of an unincorporated business trading under the name of Texas Cement Plaster Co. National produced 23 per cent of all gypsum board sold in the eastern area in 1939, Certain-teed 11 per cent, and the other four companies correspondingly smaller amounts. Seven companies which were active when the licensing plan was evolved in 1929 and before have been acquired by other companies, and defendant Celotex entered the industry in 1939 when the licensing plan was fully in effect by acquiring the assets and licenses of American Gypsum Company. The seven individual defendants are presidents of the corporate defendants. The tabulation in the margin lists the corporate and individual defendants, and shows the corporate changes which have taken place.[1]

Prior to 1912, gypsum board was manufactured with an open edge, leaving the gypsum core exposed on all four sides. In 1912, United States Gypsum received as assignee a patent issued to one Utzman, No. 1,034,746, covering both process and product claims on board with closed side edges, the lower paper liner being folded over the exposed gypsum core. board was superior in quality to open-edge board, as it was cheaper to produce, did not break so easily in shipment, and was less subject to crumbling at the edges when nailed in place. United States Gypsum also acquired a number of other patents relating to the process of making closed-edge board. In 1917, United States Gypsum sued a competitor claiming infringement of the Utzman patent and in 1921 the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a judgment holding that the Utzman patent was valid and infringed.[2] United States Gypsum settled with an infringer, Beaver Products Co., in 1926, by granting Beaver a license to practice the closed-edge board patent with a provision that United States Gypsum should fix the price at which Beaver sold patented board. Shortly before the settlement with Beaver, United States Gypsum instituted suits against American Gypsum Co., Universal Gypsum and Lime Co., and gave notice of infringement to Niagara Gypsum Co. Universal did not contest the suit but accepted a license with price-fixing provisions, and two other small companies followed suit in 1927. American and Niagara would not settle, and in 1928 judgment was entered against American holding that American's partially closed-edge board infringed one of United States Gypsum's patents. United States Gypsum also instituted suits for infringement against National Gypsum Co. in 1926 and 1928 which were settled by the execution of a license and payment of damages as part of the industry-wide settlement with all other defendants in 1929. In that year, two sets of license agreements were signed in which United States Gypsum licensed all but two companies manufacturing gypsum board in substantially identical terms and from that date United States Gypsum has maintained rigid control over the price and terms of sale of virtually all gypsum board. Since 1937 the control has been complete.

Up to this point there is no dispute as to the facts. The government charged that the defendants acted in concert in entering into the licensing agreements, that United States Gypsum granted licenses and the other defendants accepted licenses with the knowledge that all other concerns in the industry would accept similar licenses, and that as a result of such concert of action, competition was eliminated by fixing the price of patented board, eliminating the production of unpatented board, and regulating the distribution of patented board. To support its allegations, the government introduced in evidence the license agreements, more than 600 documentary exhibits consisting of letters and memoranda written by officers of the corporate defendants, and examined 28 witnesses, most of whom were officers of the corporate defendants. Since the appellees' motion to dismiss when the government had finished its case was sustained, the appellees introduced no evidence. They did cross-examine the government's witnesses. The documentary exhibits present a full picture of the circumstances surrounding the negotiation of the patent license agreements, and are chiefly relied on by the government to prove its case.

Although the industry-wide network of patent licenses was not achieved until 1929, the government claims that the documentary exhibits show that the process of formulation of the plan began in 1925. On December 12, 1925, Augustus S. Blagden, president of Beaver, sent a memorandum to Sewell Avery, president of United States Gypsum. Beaver had been adjudged an infringer of the Utzman patent, and Blagden and Avery had negotiated terms for settling the suit. Blagden testified that Avery had offered to settle with Beaver by granting Beaver a license with a price-fixing limitation and provision that Beaver should pay damages for past infringement and acknowledge the validity of United States Gypsum's patents. In the memorandum Blagden analyzed in detail the consequences that would flow from five possible decisions of the Circuit Court of Appeals if the decree adjudging Beaver an infringer were appealed. Blagden noted that whether the court upheld or denied United States Gypsum's claim, United States Gypsum "would lose, perhaps irrevocably, its present opportunity to organize the industry and stabilize prices." The memorandum further pointed out that if the suit were settled on the terms offered by Avery, the result would be more favorable to United States Gypsum than any possible decision by the Court of Appeals. Beaver would accept a license and "would agree to use its best endeavors" to induce other manufacturers to accept similar licenses; if Beaver were successful in persuading other manufacturers to execute licenses, United States

[2] Bestwall Mfg. Co. v. United States Gypsum Co., 270 F. 542.

Gypsum could "maintain a lawful price control and avoid the necessity of a reduction by plaintiff (United States Gypsum) of current prices to meet competition." Under such circumstances, United States Gypsum "would be able to take a dominating position in the industry with an opportunity to control or at least to participate in the control of prices through legitimate means of patent licenses."

Although there is no proof that Avery approved Blagden's memorandum, Blagden did accept a license on the terms offered by Avery in July, 1926, and Blagden testified that he talked to a number of representatives from other companies and urged them to accept licenses from United States Gypsum. Frank J. Griswold, general manager of American Gypsum Company, also was active in promoting a scheme of industry-wide licensing. On May 12, 1926, Griswold wrote a letter to the president of American, stating that he had talked to Blagden, and added that "This matter will be discussed by all independent wallboard manufacturers at a meeting in Chicago next Wednesday afternoon." Griswold concluded the letter with the statement: "According to the plans we have we figure that there is a possibility of us holding the price steady on wallboard for the next fourteen or fifteen years which means much to the industry."

Blagden and Griswold did not succeed in persuading other manufacturers to accept licenses in 1926. Universal accepted a license in September, 1926, but there is no evidence that Blagden and Griswold played any part in negotiating the settlement. Griswold suggested to Avery that United States Gypsum offer a shorter term license, but Avery was unwilling to make such a concession. During 1927 Griswold and Blagden continued their negotiations. Griswold and Samuel M. Gloyd, owner of the Texas Cement Plaster Co., corresponded with each other in regard to the licensing proposal. When Griswold informed Gloyd that Atlantic Gypsum Co. had signed a long-term license with United States Gypsum, Gloyd replied that he would apply for a license right away. Previously Gloyd had been trying to secure a shorter term license. Gloyd and Atlantic both signed licenses similar to the original license granted to Beaver.

In January 1928 Certain-teed Products Corp. purchased the assets of Beaver. Certain-teed had previously been making open-edge board and selling it at lower prices than the closed-edge board manufactured by United States Gypsum and its licensees. Certain-teed refused to accept the license agreement of Beaver and United States Gypsum filed suit to compel Certain-teed to accept the license. Certain-teed posted a million dollar bond and commenced to make open-edge board at all Beaver plants. George M. Brown, president of Certain-teed, and Avery had several conferences at which they attempted to compose their differences, but without result. The government introduced in evidence a memorandum written by Brown, dated March 1, 1928, in which Brown expressed confidence that he could make open-edge board and sell it in competition with United States Gypsum, and that he was afraid to sign up a license with price-fixing provisions because his competitors would grant secret rebates. Brown concluded that Certain-teed should answer the suit of United States Gypsum to enforce the Beaver license by claiming that the suit was filed not in the interest of royalties but for the sole purpose of trade domination and monopoly and price control. Brown concluded with the statement that United States Gypsum's > "determination to gather in a monopoly, if possible, leads them to risk everything for such domination because of the big rewards possible, if they can succeed."

Certain-teed did file an answer to the suit couched in those terms. Griswold testified that in a conversation with Brown in the following month Brown stated that he might possibly consider taking out a license if "all of the other manufacturers, or certain ones of them" took out a license. Griswold also wrote the president of American that he had had a conference with Brown at which Brown had said that > "they were willing at that time to enter into a license agreement without any particular changes in it providing all of the manufacturers, including Ebsary, would enter into it and make it one hundred per cent."

No settlement was reached between United States Gypsum and Certain-teed in 1928, and no other license agreements were signed. A meeting of representatives of the principal non-licensee manufacturers took place in October, and in November the board of directors of National adopted a resolution authorizing the officials of the company to enter into a license agreement. Besides Certain-teed and National, American, Ebsary, Niagara, and Kelley Plasterboard Company manufactured gypsum board but did not hold licenses from United States Gypsum.

The patent licenses in force at the beginning of 1929 provided that United States Gypsum could fix prices only during the term of the principal Utzman patent, which was scheduled to expire on August 6, 1929, although the remaining features of the agreements were to remain in force until the expiration of the last patent included under the license, which was in 1937. In negotiations in 1929, various defendants expressed concern over the possibility of an effective plan of price fixing in view of the imminent expiration of the Utzman patent. In a letter dated January 9, J. F. Haggerty, president of National, wrote Eugene Holland, president of Universal, asking his views as to possibility of continuing price control after the expiration of the Utzman patent. Holland in reply wrote as follows:

> "You will remember that Mr. Avery made it very clear to us that if this plan could not be worked out on the Utzman patent that there were other patents available and we were all agreed that the fact that the Utzman patent expires next August is not a practical reason for continuing the conflict."

Holland also stated:

> "I am quite sure that Mr. Avery would not be interested in negotiating settlements unless everyone involved was included."

In point of fact, Holland's interpretation of Avery's views was incorrect; several months later licenses were granted to four unlicensed manufacturers but not to American or Kelley. Other exhibits suggest that the prospective licensees were interested in accepting licenses at the same time. In his letter of January 9, Haggerty wrote as follows:

> "The question now in my mind is whether or not the other four board makers, who are outside the license agreement, feel that it would be advantageous to go in without the American Gypsum Company. It would seem to me that the chief value in a meeting would be to discuss that point."

On May 14, 1929, the board of directors of National held a meeting

> "for the purpose of discussing the license agreement submitted to all the manufacturers of gypsum products in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains by the United States Gypsum Co."

The minutes of the meeting further quoted the chairman as saying that > "he had been definitely informed that all other manufacturers of gypsum products east of the Rocky Mountains, except the American Gypsum Company, had agreed to sign the license contract in substantially the form as submitted to this Board."

The board of directors authorized the execution of the proposed license contract.

Two days later National signed the license agreement. On the following day National sent a telegram to Avery as follows:

> "Our contract signed and in mail Reeb [of Niagara] ready Stop We are working with Ebsary with hope of everybody being set by Saturday to justify your calling meeting all board makers Monday if you like."

On May 18 Avery dispatched identical telegrams to United States Gypsum's licensees, and to Certain-teed and Ebsary, as follows:

> "Mr. Kling [of American] has sent in a contract with material changes and declares he will not attend meeting unless these changes are accepted by us Stop We cannot accept them and regret that the Tuesday meeting will be futile unless other companies wish to proceed as outlined without American license."

On May 20 Avery wrote Gloyd of Texas Cement Plaster, a licensee since 1927, stating that although American was unwilling to accept a license, officers of Certain-teed, Niagara, Ebsary, and National had expressed themselves favorably "to this adjustment" and "it is not improbable that the matter may be closed at the meeting tomorrow or soon thereafter."

On the following day, a meeting of representatives of all but one of the licensed manufacturers, and all unlicensed manufacturers except American and Kelley, took place in Chicago. The three unlicensed manufacturers who were present—Certain-teed, Ebsary and Niagara—signed license agreements.

At the same meeting, Avery explained to the licensees that United States Gypsum had acquired applications for a patent covering so-called "bubble board" and suggested that the licensees take out licenses under these applications. The applications covered a process for making gypsum board by introducing a soap foam in the gypsum slurry which would result in a lighter and cheaper board. Avery subsequently mailed proposed license agreements under the "bubble board" applications to the licensees. George M. Brown of Certain-teed on June 4th acknowledged receipt of the license proposal in a noncommittal reply, but composed a memorandum for his own files in which he commented that the savings resulting from taking a license would be doubtful, and then added:

> "They would have a price control of our business, which might be to our advantage and might be to our disadvantage in future. They should be just as anxious to have us use this as we should be to get it if there are to be the benefits that they anticipate in stabilizing the whole industry by making a uniform product and get away from the fierce warfares between different products like we have recently had. The saving is too slight to cause us very great worry even if never permitted to use it and the door will certainly be open later for its use if it has the merit that they believe it has. Under a contract sufficiently liberal, we should proceed at once."

On June 6th the licensees met again in Chicago to discuss the question of accepting a license under the "bubble board" patents. Shortly thereafter Certain-teed agreed to take out a license. National also agreed to accept a license; the minutes of the meeting of the board of directors on July 23 read in part as follows:

> "The President stated that the United States Gypsum Company has been working on a plan to stabilize the Gypsum Industry and has offered to license the entire Industry under the new method of manufacturing gypsum wallboard known as the 'Bubble System.' The license agreements submitted to each of the wallboard manufacturers contain price fixing clauses and under the agreements submitted the prices of wallboard would be fixed for the whole industry for the term of approximately seventeen years."

The board passed a resolution authorizing the executive committee to negotiate a license agreement,

> "provided that the United States Gypsum Company, by virtue of the agreement with this Corporation and with other manufacturers of gypsum wallboard, shall control the price of wallboard sold in the United States and its possessions."

Two days later another conference of licensees was held in Chicago. C. O. Brown, vice-president of Certain-teed, prepared a memorandum for George M. Brown, president of Certain-teed, describing what happened at that meeting. According to the memorandum, National and Universal were unwilling to accept "bubble board" licenses until they had settled their litigation over National's infringement of Universal's starch patent. That patent included process and product claims on wallboard made with starch. Brown noted that United States Gypsum was working on a proposal to combine the starch and "bubble board" processes; although such a combination would have technological advantages, Brown commented on the fact that the starch patent had already been issued "so a combination of the two systems would give a patent to work under in the manufacture and sale of Gypsum Wallboard immediately, whereas under only the Bubble process there would be an interim between August 6th and the date of issuance of the Bubble Patent where there would be no Patent control. There is, of course, considerable benefit to having Patent control continue without a break." Brown further noted that Avery was trying to work out a proposition with Holland to buy the starch patent or to license the industry under both processes.

Another meeting of licensees was held in Chicago on August 6, the day on which the Utzman patent expired. In a memorandum summarizing what happened at the meeting, C. O. Brown said that it had been agreed that Universal would assign the starch patent to United States Gypsum, and the latter company would issue a single license contract covering all patents and patent applications. Brown further reported that "All of the Independent Gypsum Companies are willing to sign on this basis" and that "The Attorneys feel that such a contract would be exceptionally strong and price control could be maintained for the life of the Contract without difficulty." On August 27 the board of directors of National held a meeting at which the president was authorized to sign a license with United States Gypsum covering the "bubble board" and starch patents "provided that all the present licensees of the United States Gypsum Company enter into a similar license and provided further that in the judgment of the President such action will result in legal stabilization of the markets."

Soon thereafter, National, Certain-teed, Ebsary, Niagara and Atlantic executed licenses with United States Gypsum, to become effective on the date when Universal's receiver transferred the starch patents to United States Gypsum. On November 5 the starch patents were assigned to United States Gypsum, and on the same date Universal also accepted a license. On November 25 American settled its litigation with United States Gypsum and accepted a license. All manufacturers of gypsum board were now licensed by United States Gypsum, except Kelley Plasterboard Co., and that concern accepted a license in April of the following year. Texas Cement Plaster, a licensee under the Utzman patent, did not accept a license under the starch and "bubble board" patents until 1937 when the original license expired. Texas was thus free to sell board at any price from 1929 to 1937.

The contracts which became effective in November 1929 were in substantially identical terms. The license with Universal contained preferential royalty terms which were granted as consideration for the transfer of the starch patents; every other license (except that of Texas) provided that if the licensor should subsequently grant more favorable terms to any licensee (except Universal), the same more favorable terms would be granted to the first licensee. Each licensee agreed to pay as royalty a stipulated percentage on the selling price of "all plasterboard and gypsum wallboard of every kind" whether or not made by patented processes or embodying product claims. The contract covered fifty patents and seven patent applications, including the starch patent and the "bubble board" applications; the contract was to run until the most junior patent expired. As two "bubble board" patents were issued in 1937, the licenses ran until 1954. The licensees agreed not to sell patented wallboard to manufacturing distributors unless United States Gypsum gave its consent as to each prospective purchaser. As in the previous contracts, United States Gypsum reserved the right to fix the minimum price at which each licensee sold wallboard embodying the licensor's patents, the licensor agreeing that such minimum price would be not greater than the price at which the licensor itself offered to sell. The more important provisions of the license to this litigation are set forth in an appendix to this opinion, post, p. 402. Nothing has been omitted that appears to be significant on the issues considered.

In 1934 and 1935 United States Gypsum offered supplemental licenses to practice a patent covering metallized board, which was accepted by almost all licensees, and in 1936 United States Gypsum offered licenses under its perforated lath patent which were also accepted by most licensees. These supplemental licenses contained provisions allowing United States Gypsum to fix the minimum price on board made according to the patents which were licensed.

The government charged that the execution of the license agreements in May and November 1929 marked a turning point in the gypsum industry. The government introduced evidence tending to show that the price of first quality wallboard was raised, that United States Gypsum standardized the type of board sold by requiring its licensees to sell No. 2 wallboard and seconds at the same price as standard wallboard, and standardized the methods of sale so that no licensee could offer more favorable terms to a customer than any other licensee.

Although the license contracts gave the licensor the right only to fix the minimum price at which the licensee should sell, United States Gypsum issued a series of bulletins which defined in minute detail both the prices and terms of sale for patented gypsum board. They are printed on nearly a thousand pages of the record. The bulletins adopted a basing point system of pricing, according to which each licensee was required to quote a price determined by taking the mill price at the nearest basing point and adding the all rail freight from the basing point to the destination. The freight was to be computed on specified uniform billing weights, in order to prevent variations in freight arising from the differences in weight of board made by different manufacturers, and each licensee was directed to charge exactly the same switching, cartage, and extra delivery charges. Specified board sizes and minimum quantities were prescribed, licensees were forbidden to employ commission salesmen without the written consent of the licensor, regulations were prescribed as to the size, quantity and markings of gypsum board used for packing shipments, granting of long-term credit was prohibited, sales on consignment were enjoined and licensees were forbidden to deliver board directly to a building site.

It is not practicable to quote one of the hundreds of comprehensive bulletins on prices and terms. The industry accepted directions for distribution of product as corollary to price control, so that prices would not be infringed by variations of seller contracts. The detail of directives is well illustrated by the directive for computation of freight to be added to the mill price and the provision against subtle price reduction. The excerpts below are from the Board License Bulletin of June 10, 1939.[3]

In order to insure compliance with the price bulletins, United States Gypsum established a wholly owned subsidiary in 1932 named Board Survey, Inc. Licensees were invited to send in complaints as to violations of pricing bulletins to Board Survey and that organization forwarded the complaints to the alleged delinquent licensees. Board Survey was authorized to make a thorough check-up of all reported violations and to take such action as it might deem necessary or proper to protect United States Gypsum's rights under the license agreements and patents. Although the record discloses no instance in which Board Survey took or even threatened to take legal action against any licensee, there are many instances in which Board Survey sent letters to licensees requesting an explanation as to alleged violations. Meetings of licensees were held at which doubtful provisions of the price bulletins were explained. The trial court found that "in the main" licensees complied with the bulletin conditions.

The government further charged that the defendants had discontinued the production of unpatented open-edge board, eliminated jobbers by requiring jobbers to purchase board at the same price as board sold to dealers, induced manufacturing distributors to observe bulletin prices upon resale of board purchased from licensees, and stabilized the price of gypsum plaster and other unpatented products.

It is undisputed that after 1929 the defendants ceased to manufacture open-edge board; the government claims that production of the unpatented board was discontinued in order to protect the patented board from competition. Prior to 1929 open-edge board had sold at lower prices than closed-edge board, and the government's exhibits show that the officers of the corporate defendants realized that there could be no effective stabilization of prices on closed-edge board as long as open-edge board was sold without price control. The license agreements provided that royalties should be paid on the sales of all board sold, patented or unpatented, a provision which would tend to discourage the production of higher cost unpatented board. Although the government produced no evidence of any agreement between the defendants to eliminate production of open-edge board, corporate officers of the licensees testified that they anticipated that one result of industry-wide licensing would be the elimination of open-edge board.

The May 1929 licenses required licensees to obtain the consent of the licensor before selling board to manufacturing distributors or to jobbers and a price bulletin issued under those licenses allowed licensees to grant a 10 per cent discount to both classes. The November 1929 licenses, however, eliminated the consent requirement with respect to jobbers, although it was retained with respect to manufacturing distributors.

The jobbers' discount was continued in bulletins issued under the later licenses until August 8, 1930, when United States Gypsum ordered that the discount be eliminated. Although jobbers could still buy board if they so desired, jobbers could remain in business only by selling to dealers at an advance over the bulletin prices. The court below found that some jobbers were able to remain in business by selling board in odd lots to dealers who did not wish to buy the minimum lot required in the price bulletins. The government points to the definition of "jobber" in the license agreements as "those who do not manufacture but buy and sell plasterboard or gypsum wallboard in straight cars or in mixed cars with other building material and who do not sell at retail," and points to uncontradicted testimony that jobbers as so defined were eliminated.

[3] "In computing the delivered minimum price hereunder, rail freight, wherever mentioned in this bulletin shall mean rail freight in accordance with rail rates published in regular freight tariffs, using the weights shown above, and shall include all stopover, switching, cartage and other extra delivery charges applicable to the shipment. . . .

"Rebates, allowances, etc.:

"Any sale of patented products, though ostensibly made at or above the minimum price established by licensor, will nevertheless be considered a violation of the provisions of the license if licensee directly or indirectly reduces the actual price charged by licensee below such minimum price by granting the customer rebates, unearned or unwarranted refunds, credits or discounts, by reducing the price of other products, by hiring customers' trucks, by granting allowances for advertising or other purposes, by splitting of salesmen's compensation or commissions with customers, by overshipment of patented products, by including board under the guise of dunnage, or by making any other payment or allowance in the form of money or otherwise which has for its purpose and effect reducing the price charged by licensee below such minimum price."

We do not stop to set forth the evidence upon which the government relied to support its charge that the defendants fixed prices at which manufacturing distributors sold gypsum board which they had purchased from United States Gypsum or its licensees, as that issue is not necessary for a decision of the case. To support the charge of stabilizing the price of unpatented plaster, the government cited letters written by officers of the corporate defendants showing that they anticipated that price stabilization in patented board would be accompanied with stabilization of all gypsum products. The trial court found that the price of plaster and miscellaneous gypsum products in fact did increase after 1929. The government charged that plaster prices were stabilized by requiring licensees who sold plaster together with patented board to sell plaster at prevailing prices. Board and plaster were usually sold together and the defendants claim that cutting of prices on plaster, in sales of the two together, operated in effect as a rebate on the price of board, and hence was legally subject to control. The government introduced in evidence a large number of complaints to Board Survey by licensees as to their competitors' failure to maintain prevailing prices on plaster. A bulletin provision forbidding rebates and allowances stated that a sale of board at posted prices would be in violation of the license if the licensee reduced the price of other products, and Board Survey in summarizing violations of bulletin terms revealed through audit of the licensees' books listed "Price concessions on other material in connection with board sales."

II.

Appellees admit that in the absence of whatever protection is afforded by valid patents the licensing arrangements described would be in violation of the Sherman Act. Accordingly, the government sought to amend its complaint to allege that the "bubble board" patents were not valid. The trial court held that the government was estopped to attack the validity of the patents in the present proceeding, on the ground that such attack would constitute a review of action by the Commissioner of Patents which was not authorized by statute.[4] The trial court thought that the issue was controlled by United States v. Bell Telephone Co., 167 U. S. 224, in which the United States was held without standing to bring a suit in equity to cancel a patent on the ground of invalidity.

While this issue need not be decided to dispose of this case, it seems inadvisable to leave the decision as a precedent. Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U. S. 238, 240. We cannot agree with the conclusion of the trial court. The United States does not claim that the patents are invalid because they have been employed in violation of the Sherman Act and that a decree should issue canceling the patents; rather the government charges that the defendants have violated the Sherman Act because they granted licenses under patents which in fact were invalid. If the government were to succeed in showing that the patents were in fact invalid, such a finding would not in itself result in a judgment for cancellation of the patents.[5]

In an antitrust suit instituted by a licensee against his licensor we have repeatedly held that the licensee may attack the validity of the patent under which he was licensed, because of the public interest in free competition, even though the licensee has agreed in his license not to do so. Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co., 317 U. S. 173; Katzinger Co. v. Chicago Mfg. Co., 329 U. S. 394; MacGregor v. Westinghouse Co., 329 U. S. 402. In a suit to vindicate the public interest by enjoining violations of the Sherman Act, the United States should have the same opportunity to show that the asserted shield of patentability does not exist. Of course, this appeal must be considered on a record that assumes the validity of all the patents involved.

III.

The trial court ruled that on motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 41 (b), the court should weigh the evidence and grant the motion if the government failed to establish its case by a preponderance of the evidence, and the court further ruled that the government had the burden of proving both the charge of conspiracy and the charge that the licensing agreements were not within the protection of the patent grant.[6] We do not stop to consider those rulings. They are not of importance in this case as we think the preponderance of evidence at the conclusion of the government's case indicated a violation of the Sherman Act.

[4] 53 F. Supp. 889.

[5] Compare Becher v. Contoure Laboratories, 279 U. S. 388.

We are unable to accept, however, the ruling of the court that declarations of each defendant were admissible only against the defendant making the declaration.[7] A consideration of that point really involves the heart of the case since the treatment of the declarations may vitally affect the outcome. Some may have doubts as to whether the agreements and bulletins alone are sufficient to establish a conspiracy but the admission of the separate declarations against all greatly strengthens the government's position. We think that the industry-wide license agreements, entered into with knowledge on the part of licensor and licensees of the adherence of others, with the control over prices and methods of distribution through the agreements and the bulletins, were sufficient to establish a prima facie case of conspiracy. Each licensee, as is shown by the uncontradicted references to the meetings and discussion that were preliminary to the execution of the licenses could not have failed to be aware of the intention of United States Gypsum and the other licensees to make the arrangements for licenses industry wide. The license agreements themselves, on their face, showed this purpose. The licensor was to fix minimum prices binding both on itself and its licensees; the royalty was to be measured by a percentage of the value of all gypsum products, patented or unpatented; the license could not be transferred without the licensor's consent; the licensee opened its books of accounts to the licensor; the licensee was protected against competition with more favorable licenses and there was a cancellation clause for failure to live up to the arrangements. See the Appendix. Furthermore, the bulletins gave directions to the industry as to its prices and methods of operation in unmistakable terms. The District Court did not accept the foregoing facts as definite evidence of a conspiracy. To us, these facts are proof of a conspiracy. Certainly they are overwhelming evidence of a plan of the licensors and licensees to fix prices and regulate operations in the gypsum board industry.

If the District Court had thought that a plan such as is evidenced by the license agreements and the bulletins was illegal under the Sherman Act, it might have had a different conclusion on the question of the admissibility of the declarations of some appellees against all. Its position stemmed logically from its understanding of United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476.[8] The opinions in United States v. Line Material Co., decided today, ante, p. 287, whatever may be the different views expressed, make clear that the District Court's interpretation of General Electric differs from that of this Court. With its interpretation of the rule of General Electric, the District Court was not required to balance the privileges of United States Gypsum and its licensees under the patent grants with the prohibitions of the Sherman Act against combinations and attempts to monopolize. Conspiracies to control prices and distribution, such as we have here, we believe to be beyond any patent privilege.

[8] To the District Court the General Electric case establishes "that a patent license agreement granting the right to make, use and vend a patented product, under terms and conditions, including prices, fixed by the licensor, is lawful. Such a license agreement ordinarily, and, when the prices are (as in the General Electric case) a part of the license contract, necessarily, involves negotiation and discussion between the licensor and the licensee and agreement upon the terms and conditions, a purpose to execute and carry out the agreement, combined action in signing the agreement and in performing the obligations thereof, with knowledge that it will result in a stabilized and presumably profitable price for the patented product as between the parties and in the industry (since the parties are, by virtue of the patent, the only ones having a right to make, use and sell the superior patented product) and with knowledge that it will result in a monopoly (i. e., a divided patent monopoly), in probable discontinuance of manufacture and sale by the licensee of inferior materials (the licensee's incentive to take a license is the right to make the superior product), and in control of distribution. What a lawful patent license agreement normally involves cannot be unlawful. Additionally, since a patent owner may lawfully divide his patent monopoly with a plurality of licensees, there will in the usual course be with each of such licensees the same negotiation and discussion, agreement upon terms, purpose to execute and carry out a license contract and to accomplish its normal results, and combined action in so doing, as in the case of a single licensee. And each licensee will be informed of and discuss with the licensor the terms and conditions of the proposed licenses; otherwise no more than a single license could be executed. A patent owner would not be able to license competing manufacturers upon different price terms; no one such would be willing to suffer competitive disadvantages; no one such would be willing to sign in the dark as to the terms to be extended to the others; ordinarily, moreover, there will be discussion at large, i. e., within the trade, of the advantages and disadvantages of the licenses proposed by the patent owner. Each of a plurality of licensees will, moreover, have the same purpose to take a license and to secure its resulting advantages. The licensor and each licensee of

Under its view of the General Electric case, the District Court concluded that only a lack of good faith by defendants in the execution of what that court considered legitimate exploitation of the patents could justify in this case a determination adverse to the defendants.[9] The trial court held that an association of defendants in a common plan to organize the gypsum industry and stabilize prices through a network of patent licenses was legally permissible, and that in any event the government failed to prove that the defendants had associated themselves in such a plan. The trial court further found that the license agreements were entered into in good faith, in reliance upon United States v. General Electric, supra, and Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, and were intended to bind the parties to the promises made; that the explicit terms in the licenses were within the scope of the patent grant, and that the government had failed to prove any agreement among the defendants to take actions which were outside the scope of the patent grant. Specifically, the trial court found that there was no agreement among the defendants to raise the price of board to arbitrary and noncompetitive levels, to standardize the production of board by pricing No. 2 board and seconds out of the market, to eliminate the production of open-edge board, to eliminate jobbers, to control the resale price of board sold to manufacturing distributors, or to stabilize the price of unpatented gypsum products. The court further held that as to all those charges except the last two the defendants would have been acting within the scope of the patent grant even if they had agreed to do the things charged. We conclude that regardless of motive, the Sherman Act bars patent exploitation of the kind that was here attempted. The license agreements and the bulletins establish the conspiracy of the licensor and each licensee to violate the Sherman Act. With the conspiracy thus fully established, the declarations and acts of the various members, even though made or done prior to the adherence of some to the conspiracy, become admissible against all as declarations or acts of co-conspirators in aid of the conspiracy.[10] We think that all of the declarations and acts such a plurality constitute a 'combination' to effectuate the purposes of their license. Since a plurality of licenses is lawful, all of this must be lawful. Further, if in practical effect the licensor and the plurality of licensees are a 'combination' to the same end, such a 'combination' is not stigmatized by the law—provided in purpose and effect it does not secure to the patent owner more than the normal reward of a patent monopoly, nor to any of the licensees with whom that monopoly is divided more than the advantages which naturally result to a licensee, as well as to a licensor, from patent licensing. All of this necessarily follows from the General Electric case." 67 F. Supp. at 439-40.

Referring to the evidence above, the District Court said, id., p. 457: "These items do not prove the conspiracy charged because they do not show that the licenses were not bona fide or that they were executed to accomplish restraints outside the proper limits of a patent monopoly."

"But in view of the importance of this case and the consequent probability that it will reach a higher tribunal, we think it desirable also to state our views as to the meaning of the evidence when the declarations are considered as binding not merely upon the declarant but also upon all of the alleged co-conspirators. We have considered the evidence in this light, and we think the Government still has not proved that the license agreements were executed not as bona fide license agreements reasonably designed to secure to USG the pecuniary rewards of its patent monopoly but only as sham agreements to give color of legality to the illegal purposes alleged in the complaint, and has not proved that the operations of the defendants were carried beyond the proper limits of the USG patent monopoly, and therefore has not proved the combination and conspiracy charged. The evidence discussed in topics V and VI no more proves lack of bona fides in the execution of the license agreements, or operations beyond the limits of the patent monopoly, when the declarations are regarded as binding upon all of the alleged co-conspirators, than it does when such declarations are considered as binding only upon the declarant. This is necessarily so—in the view we take of the significance of the declarations. Since, as demonstrated in topics V and VI they fail to convict the declarants themselves of lack of bona fides in the execution of the licenses, or of operations beyond the proper limits of the USG patent monopoly, they cannot convict others thereof."

which we have set forth in this opinion are in aid of the ultimate conspiracy. We do not attempt to fix a date when the conspiracy was first formed. At least, the declarations which we have quoted were made with the purpose of advancing a plan which ultimately eventuated in the licenses of 1929.

IV.

[Correctness of Findings]

We turn now to a different phase of the case—the correctness of the findings. The trial court made findings of fact which if accurate would bar a reversal of its order. In Finding 118 the trial court found that the evidence "fails to establish that the defendants associated themselves in a plan to blanket the industry under patent licenses and stabilize prices." The opinion indicates that in making this finding the trial court assumed arguendo that declarations of one defendant were admissible against all. 67 F. Supp. at 500. In examining the finding we follow Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, and United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, as to the quantum of proof required for the government to establish its claim that the defendants conspired to achieve certain ends. In those cases, as here, separate identical agreements were executed between one party and a number of other parties. This Court, in Interstate Circuit, concluded that proof of an express undertanding that each party would sign the agreements was not a "prerequiste to an unlawful conspiracy." We held that it was sufficient if all the defendants had engaged in a concert of action within the meaning of the Sherman Act to enter into the agreements. In Masonite the trial court found that the defendants had not acted in concert and that finding was reversed by this Court. One of the things those two cases establish is the principle that when a group of competitors enters into a series of separate but similar agreements with competitors or others, a strong inference arises that such agreements are the result of concerted action. That inference is strengthened when contemporaneous declarations indicate that supposedly separate actions are part of a common plan.

In so far as Finding 118 and the subsidiary findings were based by the District Court on its belief that the General Electric rule justified the arrangements or because of a misapplication of Masonite or Interstate Circuit, errors of law occurred. These we can, of course, correct. In so far as this finding and others to which we shall refer are inferences drawn from documents or undisputed facts, heretofore described or set out, Rule 52 (a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure is applicable. That rule prescribes that findings of fact in actions tried without a jury "shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses." It was intended, in all actions tried upon the facts without a jury, to make applicable the then prevailing equity practice.[11] Since judicial review of findings of trial courts does not have the statutory or constitutional limitations on judicial review of findings by administrative agencies [12] or by a jury,[13] this Court may reverse findings of fact by a trial court where "clearly erroneous." The practice in equity prior to the present Rules of Civil Procedure was that the findings of the trial court, when dependent upon oral testimony where the candor and credibility of the witnesses would best be judged, had great weight with the appellate court. The findings were never conclusive, however.[14] A finding is "clearly erroneous" when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.

The government relied very largely on documentary exhibits, and called as witnesses many of the authors of the documents. Both on direct and cross-examination counsel were permitted to phrase their questions in extremely leading form, so that the import of the witnesses' testimony was conflicting. On cross-examination most of the witnesses denied that they had acted in concert in securing patent licenses or that they had agreed to do the things which in fact were done. Where such testimony is in conflict with contemporaneous documents we can give it little weight, particularly when the crucial issues involve mixed questions of law and fact. Despite the opportunity of the trial court to appraise the credibility of the witnesses, we cannot under the circumstances of this case rule otherwise than that Finding 118 is clearly erroneous.

In Findings 54, 56, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 89 and 90, the trial court made findings adverse to the government's claim that the defendants conspired to eliminate the production of open-edge board.[15] The tenor of those findings is that there was no agreement among the licensees to discontinue the production of open-edge board, although the trial court conceded that it might be "inferred" that each licensee did not expect to continue the manufacture of open-edge board. The provision in the license contracts that royalties should be paid on the production of unpatented board is strongly indicative of an agreement not to manufacture unpatented board, and the testimony of the witnesses is ample to show that there was an understanding, if not a formal agreement, that only patented board would be sold. Such an arrangement in purpose and effect increased the area of the patent monopoly and is invalid.

In Findings 75-79, 99-102,[16] the trial court considered the problem of jobbers. Those findings state, in effect, that the license agreements were not executed with the intent of eliminating jobbers, that the discontinuance of the jobbers' discount was an exercise by United States Gypsum of its right to establish a price for a patented product, and that complaints by licensees that other licensees had sold to jobbers at a discount did not establish concerted action to eliminate jobbers. We are unable to agree to these holdings. Since the defendants entered into a common scheme to stabilize the industry, and since the elimination of jobbers was undertaken by United States Gypsum in furtherance of that purpose, a finding of specific intent as to each licensee is not necessary. Nor do we agree that the elimination of jobbers falls within the protection of the patent grant when the purpose, as here, is to prevent competition by uncontrolled resale prices. The inference we draw from the uncontradicted evidence is that the defendants acted in concert to eliminate an important class of jobbers.

In Findings 73, 94-97,[17] the trial court dealt with the government's charge that the defendants had stabilized the price of unpatented gypsum products. Those findings hold that there was no understanding or [15] We quote Findings 54 and 89 as typical:

"54. The fact that for the privilege of using the patents, royalties are fixed in the license agreements at an amount equivalent to a designated percentage of the selling price of the licensees of all gypsum board manufactured by them, whether or not patented, does not establish an agreement to make only the patented product and does not establish that the license agreements were executed in bad faith. The patents were numerous and covered not only the patented board but machines and processes in the manufacture of board, and the rights and privileges granted were of great value to the manufacturers of gypsum board. This royalty provision is in effect a provision for a percentage of gross sales, and as such is but a convenient means of measuring the amount to be paid for the privilege of using the patents. It might with equal propriety have been a lump sum. This provision in the license agreements was not an attempt to impose a royalty upon an unpatented product, nor was it intended to drive open-edge board off the market, nor did it have that effect."

"89. The defendants did not by any of their operations under the license agreements, nor did they by any agreement or understanding, accomplish any improper standardization of gypsum board or its method of production, as charged by the Government."

[16] We quote Findings 75 and 77 as typical:

"75. The license agreements were not executed with an intent to effectuate improper restriction upon the distribution of gypsum board, plaster or miscellaneous gypsum products, specifically, to 'eliminate' jobbers through the discontinuance of a sales discount."

"77. There was no agreement or understanding between any of the parties to the license agreements in the instant case whereby jobbers would be eliminated from the gypsum board distributive system. Nor was there any understanding or agreement that jobbers' discounts would be discontinued. The issuance of the bulletin of August 8, 1930 (Exhibit 430) making the price to jobbers the same as to dealers was the exercise of the right of USG to establish a price for the patented product."

[17] We quote Findings 73 and 95 as typical:

"73. There was at no time any understanding or agreement among any of the parties to the respective license agreements that the prices would be raised or fixed upon plaster or any unpatented gypsum product. Nor were the license agreements in the instant case executed with an intent to raise, maintain and stabilize the prices of unpatented materials such as plaster and miscellaneous gypsum products. The parties to the respective license agreements knew that the licensor's right to fix minimum prices was limited to the prices on patented agreement that prices would be raised or fixed upon plaster or any unpatented product, that the bulletin provision prohibiting the reduction of price on unpatented products was designed to protect the price of patented board, and was not used to stabilize the price of unpatented materials. We reject all these findings as clearly erroneous. The bulletin provision and the complaints by licensees addressed to Board Survey convince us that the defendants attempted to stabilize plaster prices, and the fact that plaster prices were stabilized only when plaster was sold in conjunction with board appears to us to be immaterial.

The trial court made many other findings to which the government objected and yet to determine here whether each is erroneous is unnecessary.[18] Perhaps looked at in isolation some of the government's charges are not proven with that fullness that would justify our reversal of the finding of the District Court on the point. It may be that in the light of this opinion the District Court will conclude that many such findings are no longer significant in reaching its decision. As to others a different result will be required. Enough has been said as to the findings and the evidence, we think, to enable the District Court to pass upon the facts that may come before it on further proceedings in accord with our present ruling.

V.

The foregoing discussion foreshadows our conclusion. What we have said above under III on the invalidity of the arrangements as tested by the Sherman Act in discussing the admissibility of the declarations and acts of separate defendants against all others is applicable here. These licenses and bulletins show plainly a conspiracy to violate the Sherman Act. Price fixing of this type offends. It is well settled that price fixing, without authorizing statutes, is illegal, per se. See note 21, United States v. Line Material Co., ante, p. 287. Patents grant no privilege to their owners of organizing the use of those patents to monopolize an industry through price control, through royalties for the patents drawn from patent-free industry products and through regulation of distribution. Here patents have been put to such uses as to collide with the Sherman Act's protection of the public from evil consequences. United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319, 327; Hartford-Empire Co. v. United States, 323 U. S. 386, 406; Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U. S. 163, 170-174; Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20. The defendants did undertake to control prices and distribution in gypsum board. They did utilize an agency, Board Survey, Inc., to make this control effective. Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Commission, 312 U. S. 457, 465. Such facts, together with the other indicia of intent to monopolize the gypsum board industry, hereinbefore detailed as to the agreements, bulletins and declarations, convince us that the defendants violated the Sherman Act.

The General Electric case affords no cloak for the course of conduct revealed in the voluminous record in this case. That case gives no support for a patentee, acting in concert with all members of an industry, to issue substantially identical licenses to all members of the industry under the terms of which the industry is completely regimented, the production of competitive unpatented products suppressed, a class of distributors squeezed out, and prices on unpatented products stabilized. We apply the "rule of reason" of Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, to efforts to monopolize through patents as well as in non-patent fields. Even in the absence of the specific abuses in this case, which fall within the traditional prohibitions of the Sherman Act, it would be sufficient to show that the defendants, con-board manufactured and sold by the respective licensees."

"95. The Bulletin provision that 'Any sale of patented products, though ostensibly made at or above the minimum price established by licensor, will nevertheless be considered a violation of the provisions of the license if licensee directly or indirectly reduces the actual price charged by licensee below such minimum price . . . by reducing the price of other products . . .' is but part of a larger provision concerning rebates and allowances made for the purpose and with the effect of reducing the licensee's price on patented board below the minimum price therefor—a price protective provision. It was not a device to raise, maintain or stabilize the price of plaster or miscellaneous gypsum products, and it was not applied by the defendants to that end. Nor did it have that effect. On the contrary the provision in question was a proper price protective measure reasonably designed to secure to USG the pecuniary reward of its patent monopoly. In operation, it was not used to raise, maintain or stabilize the price of unpatented materials."

[18] Objection was made to those findings which held that the defendants had not conspired to fix resale prices of board sold to manufacturing distributors.

stituting all former competitors in an entire industry, had acted in concert to restrain commerce in an entire industry under patent licenses in order to organize the industry and stabilize prices. That conclusion follows despite the assumed legality of each separate patent license, for it is familiar doctrine that lawful acts may become unlawful when taken in concert.[19] Such concerted action is an effective deterrent to competition; as we said in Masonite, page 281:

> "The power of Masonite to fix the price of the product which it manufactures, and which the entire group sells and with respect to which all have been and are now actual or potential competitors, is a powerful inducement to abandon competition. . . . Active and vigorous competition then tends to be impaired, not from any preference of the public for the patented product, but from the preference of the competitors for a mutual arrangement for price-fixing which promises more profit if the parties abandon rather than maintain competition. . . ."

The rewards which flow to the patentee and his licensees from the suppression of competition through the regulation of an industry are not reasonably and normally adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly.

By the record now presented, violation of the Sherman Act is clear. As the order of dismissal came at the end of the government's presentation on appellee's motion to dismiss under Rule 41 (b)[20] of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the order is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

LICENSE AGREEMENT

This agreement made this 18th day of October, A. D. 1929, by and between the United States Gypsum Company, an Illinois corporation, of Chicago, Illinois, hereinafter referred to as Licensor, and Ebsary Gypsum Co., Inc. a New York corporation, of Newark, New Jersey, hereinafter referred to as Licensee, Witnesseth, that

2. Licensor has agreed to and does hereby give and grant unto Licensee an indivisible and non-exclusive right, license and privilege of using the process or processes and making and using the machines and/or inventions set forth and claimed in any and all of said patents and/or applications for letters patent set forth in Exhibit A attached hereto in the manufacture of gypsum plasterboard and/or gypsum wallboard at the plants or factories now owned and/or operated by Licensee, or at any other plant or factory hereafter owned and/or operated or controlled by it or any subsidiary, associated or affiliated company, and of manufacturing at any such place or places, selling and using in the United States of America and the territories and possessions thereof gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured at any such place or places and embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in said patents and/or applications for letters patent described in said Exhibit A, for the full term of said letters patent or of any letters patent which may be granted for or upon any of said applications, including any extensions and/or reissues thereof.

It is expressly understood and agreed that the indivisible and non-exclusive right, license and privilege aforesaid is granted upon condition that the Licensor shall have and it hereby reserves the right to determine and fix at any time and to change from time to time during the existence of said patents and so long as said license shall continue, the minimum price or prices at which Licensee shall sell any plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by Licensee by use of any of the machines or appliances covered by any of said letters patent and which shall embody the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in any of said patents which are presently issued, or any of said plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by second parties and which shall embody the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in either patent number 1,500,452 or patent number

1,230,297, or commencing with the date when a patent shall have been granted or issued for or upon any of the said Roos or Bayer inventions and/or applications any of said plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by Licensee, the body or core of which is made according to the process set forth and claimed in any patent granted for or upon any of said Roos or Bayer inventions and/or applications, and in case Licensor shall exercise the right so reserved, it shall first serve written notice of its intention so to do upon Licensee, accompanied with a statement of the minimum price or prices at which Licensee shall sell said gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard, and thereafter shall give to Licensee written or telegraphic notice of any change in such price or prices, and Licensee expressly covenants and agrees that it will not, so long as this agreement shall continue in force and effect and after receipt of such notice given in accordance with the terms and conditions hereof, directly or indirectly, sell or offer for sale any gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by it by use of any of the machines or appliances covered by any of said patents and which during the existence thereof shall embody the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in any of said patents which are presently issued, or any gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by second parties and which during the existence thereof shall embody the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in either patent number 1,500,452 or patent number 1,230,297, or any gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard manufactured by Licensee after a patent shall have issued upon any of the said Roos or Bayer inventions and/or applications and during the existence thereof, the body or core of which is made according to the process set forth and claimed in any patent granted for or upon any of said inventions and/or applications, at a price or prices less than that stated by Licensor in said notice or in any such written or telegraphic notice of a change in such price or prices.

Said minimum price shall not be more than that price at which Licensor determines to sell plasterboard or gypsum wallboard embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in said patents to its own like trade in the same market.

3. Licensee agrees to pay to Licensor for said disclosures, information and assistance and the agreements of Licensor herein contained, and for the right, license and privilege of using the processes and making and using the machines and/or inventions in the manufacture of plasterboard and gypsum wallboard covered by said patents and applications for letters patent described in said Exhibit A, and for the privilege of manufacturing, using and/or selling plasterboard and gypsum wallboard embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in said patents and applications for letters patent, an amount (hereinafter for convenience referred to as a license fee or royalty) equivalent to three and one-half per cent (3½%) of the selling price of Licensee of all plasterboard and gypsum wallboard of every kind, whether or not made by the use of said machines and/or embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in said letters patent or applications for letters patent, manufactured and sold by Licensee between the date hereof and February 10, 1937, the date of the expiration of patent number 1,330,413 mentioned in said Exhibit A, and thereafter an amount equivalent to two per cent (2%) of the selling price of Licensee of all such plasterboard and gypsum wallboard manufactured and sold by it between February 10, 1937, and July 8, 1941, the date of the expiration of said patent number 1,500,452, and thereafter an amount equivalent to one per cent (1%) of the selling price of Licensee of all such plasterboard and gypsum wallboard manufactured and sold by it between July 8, 1941, and the date of the expiration of the last to expire of any patent granted or issued for or upon any of the said Roos or Bayer applications; * * *

5. It is expressly understood and agreed that the license herein granted shall be personal to the Licensee, and that the same or any right herein or thereunder shall not be sold or assigned or transferred without the written consent of Licensor, or transferred by operation of law; Provided, However, that the same may be assigned by Licensee to any company acquiring all the assets and business or all of the capital stock of Licensee, on condition that Licensee shall first obtain an agreement in writing from any such assignee agreeing to assume all of the obligations of Licensee under this agreement and to be bound by all of the terms and conditions hereof and shall deliver such agreement to Licensor. Licensee agrees not to sell all of its assets and business or all of its capital stock or to transfer and convey its plasterboard and/or wallboard business, or its assets used in connection therewith, without requiring the purchaser or purchasers thereof to assume, in writing, all of the obligations of Licensee hereunder, and to agree to be bound by all of the terms and conditions of this contract, and deliver such agreement to Licensor.

6. Licensee agrees to keep separate full and accurate books of accounts and records showing the exact quantity of all plasterboard and gypsum wallboard manufactured and sold by it, as well as a separate record of all plasterboard and/or gypsum wallboard sold by it in bundles, * * *

7. Licensor, or its duly authorized representative, shall have the right at all reasonable times during business hours to inspect the books of account and records of Licensee referred to in the next preceding paragraph hereof, including all records of every kind showing the quantity of said plasterboard and gypsum wallboard manufactured and sold by it and the quantity thereof put up and sold by it in bundles and the price or prices at which the same was sold, and to make copies thereof and memoranda therefrom; * * *

* * * * *

9. Having regard for the fact that there are or may be certain manufacturers of plaster or gypsum products, jobbers or other wholesale distributors of such products, who do not or may not manufacture gypsum wallboard or plasterboard but who desire or may desire to have gypsum wallboard or plasterboard manufactured for them, it is understood and agreed that Licensee may manufacture for jobbers (being those who do not manufacture but buy and sell plasterboard or gypsum wallboard in straight cars or in mixed cars with other building material and who do not sell at retail) gypsum wallboard or plasterboard embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in said letters patent or in any letters patent after the same shall have been issued, granted for or upon any of the said applications and may with the written consent of first party manufacture for any such other manufacturer or other wholesale distributor, gypsum wallboard or plasterboard embodying the said inventions and improvements; Provided, However, that the said license fee or royalty to be paid to Licensor as hereinbefore provided shall be based upon all gypsum wallboard and plasterboard manufactured for and sold and invoiced to such other manufacturer, jobber or wholesale distributor and upon the regular selling price of Licensee of such plasterboard or gypsum wallboard to its regular dealer trade at the time of such sale and invoice, and shall not be based upon the price at which plasterboard or gypsum wallboard is sold and invoiced by Licensee to such other manufacturer, jobber or wholesale distributor. Nothing hereinbefore contained in this agreement shall be construed to give Licensee the right to manufacture gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard embodying the inventions and improvements set forth and claimed in any of said letters patent or in any letters patent after the same shall have been granted for or upon any of said applications for said other manufacturers or wholesale distributors and to sell the same, without the written consent of Licensor.

* * * * *

12. In the event that either party shall at any time neglect, fail or refuse to keep or perform any of the conditions or agreements herein to be kept by it and performed, then the other party, at its election, may serve upon the party in default written notice of intention to terminate this license, which notice shall specify the alleged neglect, failure or refusal, and if within thirty (30) days from the date of delivery of said notice the party in default shall not cure the default specified in said notice, then the other party may cancel and terminate this agreement by notifying the party in default in writing of its election so to do, without the necessity of any court action; * * *

* * * * *

15. In case Licensor shall, subsequent to the effective date hereof, grant to any other person except Abel Davis and Eugene Holland, receivers of the Universal Gypsum & Lime Co. or their successors or to the said Universal Gypsum & Lime Co., any license under said patents or applications for letters patent set forth in said Exhibit A and paragraph 4 hereof for the manufacture, sale or use of gypsum plasterboard or gypsum wallboard or bundles thereof, embodying the claims or inventions set forth and claimed in said patents or said applications, or shall grant any right under any such license, upon terms more favorable than those granted hereunder to this Licensee, then it will grant to this Licensee a license on the same terms or extend to it the same right granted to any such other person. This paragraph shall not apply to any license granted on or prior to the effective date hereof, nor shall the same apply to the terms of settlement of any claim of Licensor or provisions with respect to the payment thereof, contained in any such license.

[Concurring Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring.

In Part II of the opinion the Court confessedly deals with an issue that "need not be decided to dispose of this case." Deliberate dicta, I had supposed, should be deliberately avoided. Especially should we avoid passing gratuitously on an important issue of public law where due consideration of it has been crowded out by complicated and elaborate issues that have to be decided. Accordingly, I join in the Court's opinion, except Part II.

The Court is agreed that the arrangements challenged by the Government as violative of the Sherman Law cannot find shelter under the patent law, howsoever valid the patents of the defendants may be. In short, we have found that the validity of the patents in the suit is irrelevant to the invalidity of the arrangements based upon them. While fully recognizing this, the Court needlessly considers the question whether the Government may, in view of United States v. American Bell Telephone Co., 167 U. S. 224, attack the validity of the patents in the present proceeding.

It does so because "it seems inadvisable to leave . . . as a precedent" the decision of the trial court that "the Government was estopped to attack the validity of the patents in the present proceeding." But, surely, it is easy enough to sterilize the trial court's decision by the explicit declaration that the issue need not be decided.

I shall not follow the Court's lead and indulge in dicta on the question whether, in a suit like this, the issue of patentability can be contested by the Government. But, as bearing upon the undesirability of announcing dicta on this issue, it is pertinent to point out that the cases on which the Court relies for its pronouncement hardly dispose of the problem. They are cases in which a licensee resisted claims for royalties on what purported to be valid patents. Royalties were refused because there were no patents on which they were owed. Such was the issue involved in Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co., 317 U. S. 173; Katzinger Co. v. Chicago Mfg. Co., 329 U. S. 394; MacGregor v. Westinghouse Co., 329 U. S. 402. Different considerations come into play when the Government seeks a declaration of invalidity. See United States v. American Bell Telephone Co., supra. I am not remotely intimating that the differences are decisive. I am merely suggesting that a due weighing of the differences, in the light of the Bell Telephone case, should await the duty of adjudication. It should not be the undesirable product of deliberate dicta.

The Court refers to Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U. S. 238, 240, as reason for passing on an issue that "need not be decided to dispose of this case," because "it seems inadvisable to leave the [trial court's] decision as a precedent." As to our problem, Hurn v. Oursler was exactly the opposite from this case. The issue on which this Court pronounced in Hurn v. Oursler was inescapably the issue that had to be decided to dispose of the case. The issue in Hurn v. Oursler was this: where a suit for infringement of a copyrighted play was brought in a federal court and with it was joined a non-federal cause of action based on unfair competition in regard to that play, has the federal court jurisdiction to pass on the merits of the claim of unfair competition after the court had rejected the federally-based suit of infringement ? The trial court held not, and dismissed the non-federal claim for want of jurisdiction after dismissing the federal claim on the merits. When the case came here this Court could not possibly sustain the trial court (which had been affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals) without necessarily affirming the trial court's ruling on the issue of jurisdiction. This Court reversed the trial court on that issue and held that the district court had jurisdiction. It found, however, that the cause of action should have been dismissed but on the merits. Accordingly, this Court modified the decree so that the dismissal was on the merits and not for want of jurisdiction. This Court could not have reached the merits without first determining whether there was juridiction to reach them. In short, in Hurn v. Oursler the precedent of the district court had to be set aside in order to decide the case. Here, the "precedent" of the district court is upon an issue which is essentially irrelevant, and therefore we should not follow the error of the district court in pronouncing upon an issue which "need not be decided to dispose of this case."

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Western Division. No. 2203. February 16, 1948.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Discriminatory Discounts—Status of Manager of Company to Maintain Suit Against Competing Company.—The manager of a district office of a calculating machine company is entitled to maintain an action against a competing company for treble damages for granting discriminatory discounts in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2024.19, and the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.770.

Commodities of Like Grade and Quality—Lessening of Competition.—Calculating machines, manufactured by different companies, which perform the same functions, are constructed on the same basic principles, and in the selling price of which there is a comparatively small difference, are of "like grade or quality" within the meaning of the Robinson-Patman Act. Even if the machines were not of like grade or quality, inasmuch as the two companies are competitors, if the defendant discriminated between purchasers of its commodities of like grade and quality, and thereby tended to create a monopoly or to lessen or destroy competition, there was a violation of the statute.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.335.

Secret Agreement to Grant Discounts—Destroying Competition.—The granting of discounts under a secret arrangement whereby purchasers were purported to be subsidiaries of a parent organization in order to come within the terms of a multiple purchase discount plan, for the purpose of destroying competition, and not for the purpose of meeting competition, is an unfair trade practice within the meaning of the Robinson-Patman Act.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.630.

Injury to Plaintiff—Burden of Proof—No Proof of Actual Loss.—Plaintiff fails to show with that degree of positiveness which the law requires, that any purchaser of a machine manufactured and sold by defendant purchased it because of the granting of a discount by defendant. Plaintiff must show by the fair preponderance of the evidence that he has suffered loss. It is not sufficient for him to show that defendant committed unfair trade practices. The fact of damage itself is not subject to speculation.

Memorandum Opinion

Plaintiff, a resident of Kansas City, Missouri, and former local district manager of Marchant Calculating Machine Company, brought this suit under Sec. 15, Title 15, U. S. C. A., against the defendant, a resident and citizen of New Jersey, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him as a result of the unfair trade practice of the defendant in the sale of Monroe Calculating Machines in the Kansas City territory, in violation of Sec. 13, Title 15, U. S. C. A.

Marchant and Monroe are old and well known manufacturers and distributors of calculating machines. Plaintiff, as manager of the local district of the Marchant, operated on a commission basis, receiving 35 per cent of the sale price of each sale made. Out of his commission plaintiff bore the expenses of the district office, with the exception of the repair department, for which he received an allowance from the home office.

Plaintiff employed numerous persons from time to time in his sales organization, some of whom worked on commission and some on straight salary. From the evidence it is impossible to determine accurately who worked on commission and who received salary and for what period of time. Apparently whether a salesman received commissions or salary depended on his volume of sales. During a certain training period new salesmen were on salary, or if their sales were not adequate to enable them to live, they were placed on salary. There is no substantial evidence in the case from which the Court can determine how much salary was paid and to whom it was paid by plaintiff. Some salesmen were on a salary part of the time and received commissions at other times during their employment.

Those who were on a commission basis received 20 per cent of the total commission. The salesmen who worked outside of Kansas City received 25 per cent commission, and for this extra five per cent they paid their own expenses. The sales methods of all competing manufacturers of this type of equipment are pretty much the same. The evidence indicates that certain schedules of prices and discounts and trade-in allowances were formulated; and discounts were not supposed to be allowed to purchasers of single machines or, generally, to purchasers of less than ten machines yearly. Purchasers of ten or more machines a year were allowed a discount of ten per cent. This practice was known as a deductible quantity discount. Another practice was known as the cumulative discount plan. Under this plan a potential purchaser of ten machines a year was promised a refund of ten per cent if at the end of the year such purchaser had purchased ten or more machines. During the year the purchase price was the regular price without discount, but if at the end of the year the number had amounted to ten or more, ten per cent was refunded.

Still another plan was designed for multiple purchasers or purchasing organizations where a number of persons had associated themselves together and set up a central or common purchasing authority. To such organizations a discount was allowed, and also to contractors engaged in the manufacture of war materials for the Government under a cost plus contract where the Government paid for equipment. Discounts were also allowable to a subsidiary of a parent organization which purchased ten or more machines yearly. These trade practices were in effect in Kansas City during the period of this controversy.

[Unfair Practices Charged]

Plaintiff insists that defendant was guilty of unfair trade practices in that it sold to one customer more cheaply than to another customer for the purpose of destroying competition and establishing a monopoly which resulted in damage to plaintiff.

Almost immediately upon plaintiff's taking over the offices in Kansas City, controversy arose between the two sales organizations. Competition seemed to be quite spirited. Each accused the other of granting discounts to purchasers who were not included within the plans or systems heretofore described. To sustain his contention, plaintiff, among other things, proved that on April 11, 1939, defendant through its local manager entered into an agreement with one Logan W. Wilson, an assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Kansas City, Missouri, under the terms of which discounts might be received by purchasers of Monroe machines on the theory that they were subsidiaries of the First National Bank. This agreement was in the form of a letter addressed to the local manager of Monroe by Wilson.[1] of Kansas City, Mo.

April 11, 1939

Monroe Calculating Machine Company, Inc.
Orange
New Jersey

Gentlemen:

It is mutually understood and agreed between your Company and ours that on all purchases of new Monroe Adding-Calculators, Listing, Bookkeeping, and Check Writing and Signing Machines, we shall receive a discount of 10% deductible at the time of billing.

This arrangement is effective from April 15, 1939, and shall continue from year to year so long as we shall have purchased an average of not less than ten machines for each preceding yearly period.

It is further understood and agreed that the machines eligible to the discount under this arrangement shall be of any new model or models regularly sold and listed by you, and that you will deliver such machines, charges

Under one of the existing discount plans it was proper to allow a discount to a purchaser who was a subsidiary of another purchaser if the parent organization, together with its subsidiaries, purchased sufficient machines within a year to be entitled to a discount. It was for the purpose of bringing purchasers, not otherwise eligible for a discount, within this particular classification that the contract with Wilson was entered into. The First National Bank was made a party to this suit, but at the close of plaintiff's case a motion to dismiss as to the bank was sustained on the ground that the contract was unauthorized by the bank, that it had no knowledge or information concerning its execution and received no benefit from any sales that were made pursuant to it, and that it was outside the scope of the authority of the assistant cashier to enter into the contract.

Under the contract discounts were allowed on the sale of 40 machines. When the sales representative of the Monroe Company found it necessary or desirable in his opinion for the purpose of making a sale, a discount of 10 per cent was offered under the terms of the contract. In some cases, but not all, the prospective purchaser was advised that a discount could be obtained through the First National Bank by claiming to be a subsidiary of such bank. When the sale was finally made, the application or the order was submitted to Wilson and authority was received from him by the Monroe representative to allow the discount to the purchaser as a subsidiary of the bank. None of these purchasers was in fact a subsidiary of the First National Bank. Many of them were not even depositors in the bank. This practice was continued during the period in controversy in this suit, that is, from April 11, 1939, through 1942. Finally, being unable to stop the practice, plaintiff brought this suit and seeks to recover damages in the sum of $35,000 for loss of profits from his business, time and money lost in training and paying salesmen unable to compete "with said unlawful practices", inability to maintain a sales force in the face of such practices, and loss of a more profitable agency through inability to show a sufficient sales volume to justify a contract with Marchant for a more profitable agency. Since Sec. 15, Title 15, U. S. C. A., authorizes the recovery of treble damages and a reasonable attorney's fee, plaintiff seeks to recover total damages of $105,000 and an attorney's fee of $25,000, and his costs.

[Violations Denied]

Defendant insists that the acts complained of are not in violation of Sec. 13, Title 15, U. S. C. A., and for that reason plaintiff cannot maintain his action under Sec. 15, Title 15, U. S. C. A. It denies that it was guilty of any unfair trade practices and that whatever deviation there was from the established sales practices was for the purpose of meeting competition and the discounts offered by plaintiff in the sale of the Marchant machines. It also contends that the calculating machines of the two manufacturers are not competitive in that they are not of like grade and quality. Defendant also contends that plaintiff has failed to show any damage resulting from the alleged unfair trade practices.

[Statutory Provisions]

The first contention of defendant, that is, that plaintiff is not authorized to maintain the action, must be resolved against it. Section 13, Title 15, U. S. C. A., provides that:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or prepaid, (to any point in the United States) as and when ordered by us within the year.

A list of our qualified branches and subsidiaries entitled to participate in this Agreement will be furnished with the understanding that they will be eligible to the discount under this arrangement, and their purchases will be considered as a part of the quantity, it being a condition that such purchases shall be for the continuous individual use of our Company and its qualified branches and subsidiaries.

It is further understood that all machines purchased under this Agreement will carry your regular one-year guarantee, and that orders will be filled with reasonable promptness, barring any delays due to causes beyond your control.

> any of the purchasers involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them * * *".

Section 15 of the same title provides that:

> "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

Section 13 makes it a violation of the law to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality. It is alleged that the defendant discriminated between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality in that he granted to some who were not entitled thereto a ten per cent discount which was refused to others similarly situated; that it was done for the purpose of preventing competition and creating a monopoly; and that as a result thereof this plaintiff, as manager of a competing company and who received his compensation through commissions, was prevented from making sales and was thereby damaged. I think the plaintiff comes within the provision of the Act and is entitled to maintain his action. Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 125 Fed. (2d) 417; Midland Oil Co. v. Sinclair Refining Co., 41 Fed. Supp. 436.

The next contention of defendant is that the calculating machines of Marchant and of Monroe were not commodities of like grade and quality and that, therefore, there was no violation of the statute. This contention must also be ruled against defendant.

Each of the manufacturers of these machines was an old and reputable manufacturer of highly technical devices. Each of the devices was designed to add, subtract, multiply and divide. Plaintiff testified that the primary functions of any calculating machine are but two, to add and to subtract, but that by repetition of functional processes, the machine performs the functions of multiplication and division.

Each machine had a keyboard upon which were arranged many keys containing numerals and figures, the number of keys depending upon the size of the machine and the purpose for which the particular type of machine was designed. Each of the machines was operated by depressing whatever number of keys was necessary to produce the desired result and by either pressing a bar or pulling a crank. This manipulation produced the correct addition. To obtain the other more complicated results, that is, to subtract, multiply and divide, the same devices and mechanisms were manipulated in a different manner which was familiar to the skilled operator. Each manufacturer sells numerous models, Marchant six and Monroe 18. The different models were designed to meet the demands and requirements of different types of businesses and of different types of calculations.

The salesmen, in paving the way for the sale of their machines where a machine had not already been placed, ordinarily surveyed the nature of the prospective purchaser's business. From that survey he determined the type of machine that would be most suitable for the particular business and attempted to sell that particular type of machine. In appearance the so-called comparable types of machines of the two companies may vary. One may be larger than the other, but they are generally designed to perform the same general functions in their respective classifications. It is true, as alleged by defendant, that the price or original cost of the two makes of machines varies. The cost of the Marchant machine is higher than that of the Monroe, this excess ranging from $25.00 to $50.00 in the smaller and cheaper models to several times that amount in the larger models. The machines range in price from around $300.00 to more than $1,000.00. To this contention plaintiff answers that Marchant machines are more valuable to the user because of certain refinements not found in the Monroe machines and are, therefore, worth the dollars and cents difference, even though performing the same functions. Calculating machines are designed to last many years, and the original cost is spread over that period of time. The person who is able to buy a calculating machine, be it small or large, having in mind the probable life of the machine, likely would not be greatly influenced by a comparatively small difference in the cost of the two makes of machines. Purchasers of calculating machines are undoubtedly like the purchasers of other types of rather expensive equipment in this modern and highly developed mechanical age.

In the purchase of typewriters, adding machines, automobiles and other forms of equipment and conveniences, many persons have their preferences. One person may have a preference for a particular model or make of typewriter simply because he or she has used that make or model and will purchase it at a greater price in preference to another make or model of equal value or utility. Many of the machines involved in this controversy were sold to persons or to businesses where the operators were accustomed to using that particular make or model, be it one or the other make. One of the strongest arguments that the machines were competitive was the strong competition itself which the sales organizations of the two companies engaged in to sell their respective machines to the same prospective purchasers for the same kind of work.

Furthermore, it was admitted that Marchant and Monroe are competitors, so that whether or not their machines were of like grade and quality, if Monroe discriminated between purchasers of its commodities of like grade and quality and the effect of such discrimination was to tend to create a monopoly or to lessen or destroy competition, there was a violation of the statute. If plaintiff was injured thereby in his property or business, he may recover.

Thus having determined the two legal obstacles to plaintiff's recovery, we may proceed to the factual questions. Those questions may to a considerable degree be grouped for determination, that is, whether defendant was guilty of any unfair trade practices or whether the granting of discounts was for the purpose of meeting competition and whether plaintiff sustained any damage.

Defendant charged that plaintiff cast the first stone; that he inaugurated the practice of violating the trade practices of the respective parties by granting excessive trade-in allowances. I doubt that either party ever lost a sale through failure to grant a discount or a trade-in allowance if he thought he could get by with it. One cannot escape the conclusion that there were numerous exceptions to the established trade practices of the parties; and that the matter of granting discounts was so full of loopholes and exceptions that it had little practical value except as to obscure purchasers who had no business connections to whom they could attach themselves for the purpose of coming under some recognized exception. The multiple purchasing group, the discount arrangements, the annual purchasing power, the subsidiaries, the nationally known organizations and some other groups were exceptions to the rule, so that when a sale was being negotiated it would be as much a problem to determine if a discount should not be allowed as it would be to determine if a discount should be allowed. In the matter of sales to Government agencies—for example, to Government contractors—I fail to find anywhere in the evidence that a sale was lost by either party because of the failure to determine whether or not to allow a discount. The doubt was always resolved in favor of the discount.

It is a well established principle of law that notwithstanding what the established trade practices and customs between competitors may be, competitors may always allow such discounts and reductions in price as may be necessary to meet competition. Sec. 13 (b), Title 15, U. S. C. A.; American Cooperative Serum Ass'n v. Anchor Serum Co., 153 F. (2) 907; General Shale Products Corp. v. Struck Construction Co., 132 F. (2) 425. That kind of competition may be what is commonly known in the language of the street as "cut throat" competition. But it is the kind of competition that may be met by a competitor by like practices. When he knows what his competitor is going to do in the way of making discounts, he may formulate his policy in such a manner as to meet that competitive situation. In this case, however, we have a different situation. The defendant inaugurated a system of competition that was far more reprehensible than "cut throat" competition. It was a subtle and underhanded kind of competition.

[Secret Agreement]

The agreement was secretly entered into with the officer of the First National Bank; and I say secretly because that agreement was not known to the Board of Directors of the bank and was apparently done solely for the purpose of permitting Monroe to make discounts to purchasers who had not the slightest claim or right to a discount under any of the regulations. The contract with Wilson and the allowance of discounts thereunder to purchasers not subsidiaries of the bank clearly was an unfair trade practice; and the conclusion is inescapable that it was entered into for the purpose of stifling and destroying competition and not for the purpose of meeting competition.

But while the Wilson contract and the practices thereunder are to be condemned in no uncertain terms as an unfair trade practice, plaintiff must show by positive proof that he suffered damage as a result thereof. Plaintiff claims that he lost every sale where he was in competition with defendant and a discount was allowed under the Wilson contract, and he claims damages in the amount of the commissions such sales would have earned. If he had any of his machines on demonstration and he failed to make the sale, he has attributed such failure solely to the allowance of the discount which the customer received.

Plaintiff testified that many of such prospective purchasers, during the period of negotiation or demonstration, asked him what discount he would allow or informed him that they could get a discount from defendant; that upon being so informed he advised such persons that if they would write on his sales agreement that they could obtain a discount from defendant, he, too, would make such an allowance, but that in each instance such purchasers refused to do so. He said that he could not give a discount and receive credit therefor from his company without such a written notation on the order or a letter to the same effect; that otherwise the discount would have been deducted by his company form his commission, and for that reason he refused to allow a discount.

In view of the nature of the unfair trade practice arising out of the Wilson contract, I have carefully reviewed the record and my own recollection of the evidence, and I fail to find a single instance where the evidence shows with that degree of positiveness which the law requires that any purchaser of a Monroe machine purchased it because of the refusal of plaintiff to grant a discount, or, to put it another way, because of the granting of a discount by defendant.

During the period in controversy 40 machines were sold by defendant and discounts improperly allowed under the Wilson contract. How many, if any, were sold by plaintiff notwithstanding the offer of a discount by defendant is not shown by the evidence. Twenty-two witnesses who had purchased machines under the "Wilson Plan" testified that their purchases of Monroe machines were not actuated by the discount, and that other considerations such as previous use of Monroe machines or some other reason entered into their selections of that machine.

Some of the witnesses said that all things being equal the price as reflected by a discount would be a matter for serious consideration in making a purchase, but even those witnesses refused to say that the discount had been the deciding factor. These 22 witnesses represented the purchasers of most of the machines sold under the "Wilson Plan". If they are to be believed, it cannot be said that plaintiff lost any of those sales because of the unlawful discount. But plaintiff insists that their testimony should not be accepted because they, too, were guilty of violating the law and were equally guilty with defendant in knowingly accepting an unauthorized discount. Their credibility was not otherwise attacked; they were reputable persons as far as the record shows, and at the time of the trial the statute of limitations had run against any possible action that might have been taken against them. Apparently they were disinterested witnesses who had no motive for not telling the truth. I cannot agree with the plaintiff that such witnesses are unworthy of belief.

While the number of unit sales and the gross value thereof may not be determinative of the question of damages, in this case it may be and, I think, is persuasive of the fact. The business of plaintiff as well as that of defendant steadily grew during the period in controversy. During this period Marchant sold 413 machines and Monroe sold 402. The following is a record of the annual sales of the two companies in the Kansas City area: [1]

1942	9	2,910.00	261.50	230.00	2,418.50

In 1942 plaintiff's number of sales was 57.4 per cent greater than his number of sales in 1939. The gross value of plaintiff's sales was 77 per cent greater in 1942 than it was in 1939. In 1942 Monroe's number of sales was 189 per cent greater than in 1939;[2] the gross value of its sales in 1942 was 158 per cent greater than it was in 1939. From 1939 through 1942 the percentage of discount allowed by plaintiff on his total sales was 10.2 per cent. During the same period the percentage of discount allowed by defendant on its total sales was 8.8 per cent. Furthermore, plaintiff's commissions increased from $5,915 in 1939 to $19,981 in 1942.

Broken down still further the figures show that plaintiff's number of sales increased 3.9 per cent in 1940 while the gross value of his sales decreased 9.6 per cent. Monroe's sales during 1940 increased 93.5 per cent and the value of its sales increased 73.1 per cent. Of its total of 89 sales only 15 were sold under the "Wilson Plan" so that even excluding these sales, defendant's number of sales increased 60.8 per cent in 1940.

In 1941 the number of plaintiff's sales increased 74.7 per cent and the gross value of his sales increased 87.7 per cent. Monroe on the other hand increased the number of its sales only 13.5 per cent and the gross value of its sales 28.4 per cent; and it sold the same number of machines under the "Wilson Plan" that it had sold in 1940. Excluding those sales defendant suffered a decrease of 3.4 per cent in the number of its sales.

In 1942 plaintiff suffered a decrease of 13.04 per cent in the number of sales, but the value of those sales increased 4.3 per cent. Defendant increased the number of its sales 31.7 per cent although the gross value of those sales increased only 16.2 per cent. Of its total of 133 sales in 1942 only 3 were made under the "Wilson Plan". So that excluding those sales the number of defendant's sales increased 28.7 per cent.

An analysis of the figures for 1942 seems to reflect the higher prices of the Marchant models sold during that year. Plaintiff suffered a loss of 13.04 per cent in number of machines sold but had a gross sales value increase of 4.3 per cent. Defendant, on the other hand, increased its number of sales 31.7 per cent but increased the gross value only 16.2 per cent.

The figures further indicate that the percentage of discounts allowed by plaintiff on his gross sales steadily increased. In 1939 the discounts allowed amounted to 7.36 per cent of the gross sales; in 1940, 8.07 per cent; in 1941, 10.18 per cent; and in 1942, 12.95 per cent. This was an increase of 5.59 per cent over the period.

Defendant's percentage of discounts remained more constant. In 1939 the discounts allowed amounted to 8.26 per cent of the gross sales; in 1940, 7.06 per cent; in 1941, 9.4 per cent; and in 1942, 9.88 per cent. This was an increase of 1.62 per cent over the period. Furthermore, the difference between the lowest and highest percentages was 2.82 per cent.

By this time the effect of the war had resulted in priorities being imposed on this type of equipment and the problem of the parties was not in finding buyers but in obtaining the machines and the priorities for their delivery.

The very considerable increase in the number of unit sales by defendant in 1942 and the decrease in unit sales of plaintiff may create some speculation or at least prompt one to wonder about probable causes. As heretofore stated, the war was on and its restrictions had been imposed. Whatever was available could be disposed of. Marchant manufactured about 6 models all priced slightly higher than defendant's comparable models. Defendant manufactured about 18 models ranging from a small portable desk model to the large sizes.

A further explanation may be found in the sales record of plaintiff during the whole period involved. During 1939 plaintiff had 9 salesmen and of the 76 sales made during the year plaintiff made 14, one salesman 19, another 17, and others 7, 6, 4, 4 and 3 respectively. In 1940 plaintiff had 6 salesmen and of the 79 sales made plaintiff made 27, one salesman 17, another 11 and the others 10, 7, 4 and 3, respectively. In 1941 plaintiff had 3 salesmen and of the 133 sales made plaintiff made 97, and his salesmen made 16, 15 and 10 sales respectively. By 1942 his sales force had fallen to two salesmen who made 7 and 6 sales respectively of the 120 sales made. Plaintiff made 107 sales.

Summarized, the record discloses that plaintiff's personal efforts were increasingly productive as the years passed while those of his sales organization were decreasingly productive. Of the 413 machines sold during the period, plaintiff personally sold 245. The last year his salesmen made only 13 sales compared to his 107 while in the previous year his salesmen made 41 sales compared to his 97. In the light of these facts the difference in the number of sales for 1942 is readily understandable.

From all the evidence I am unable to find where plaintiff has shown that he suffered any loss or damage to his business. He insists that the law does not demand of him positive proof of actual loss and that it is sufficient for him to show the unfair trade practices and that the Court may and should speculate as to damages. With this contention I am unable to agree. Plaintiff must show by the fair preponderance of the evidence that he has suffered loss. The fact of damage itself is not subject to speculation. Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson Parchment Paper Co., 282 U. S. 555; Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co., 125 Fed. (2d) 417.

However, once the fact of damage has been proved, the Court has rather wide latitude in determining the amount of damages.

Plaintiff has not sustained the burden of showing damages through the allowance of discounts. For the Court to find from the available evidence that he was damaged, the Court would have to indulge in pure speculation, and that the Court cannot do. The finding and judgment must be for defendant.

Sherman, Clayton Antitrust Acts

Declaratory Judgment—Validity of Patent—Motions to Strike and Dismiss.—In an action charging that defendants claim that plaintiff has infringed a certain patent for carrier scrapers, alleging the invalidity of defendants' patent, and seeking an adjudication that plaintiff is a licensee of the patent, motions to strike allegations that the patent was obtained by fraud and that defendants come with unclean hands, and to dismiss the count alleging violation of the antitrust laws, are dismissed. Allegations of fraud and unclean hands are not so remote to the cause of action as to require that they be stricken. Viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the allegation of antitrust violation is sufficient as a pleading to entitle plaintiff to relief.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.614, 1640.619, 1660.201.

For plaintiff: Paul D. Flehr, John F. Swain, San Francisco, California.

For defendants: Webster & Webster, Stockton, California; Leonard S. Lyon, Los Angeles, California; Wm. Edward Hann, Detroit, Michigan.

[Declaratory Judgment Sought]

Plaintiff seeks declaratory relief alleging, inter alia, that defendants claim that plaintiff has infringed and is infringing a certain patent for carrier scrapers and demand that plaintiff be adjudged to be a licensee of the patent.

[Antitrust Violations Alleged]

Plaintiff contends that defendants' patent is invalid and that plaintiff is not answerable to defendants under the facts, and in Count 1, Par. 9a alleges that defendants come with unclean hands and that the reissue patent held by defendants was obtained by fraud (Par. 5g). In Count 2 plaintiff alleges a violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. In so alleging the contention is made that the reissue patent concerned in this matter is illegal and was obtained as part of a conspiracy to restrain trade.

[Motions to Strike and Dismiss]

The defendants move to strike Paragraphs 9a and 5g of Count 1 and to dismiss all of Count 2. The ground upon which the motion to dismiss Count 2 is based is that "said count fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted"; while the motion to strike Pars. 9a and 5g of Count 1 is predicated upon the claim "that the matter is redundant, immaterial, impertinent and scandalous."

Defendants' memoranda goes into the allegations of the complaint and argues that the various acts complained of are legal and proper, justified as of right under the monopoly granted by their patent. It is also set forth that plaintiff's allegations of fraud are not sustainable because there was no requirement or duty on defendants' part to inform the Patent Office in applying for the reissue patent that there had been a prior suit or of the court's findings concerning the original patent upon which the reissue was based; and that the statutory duty was imposed solely on the clerk of the court (35 U. S. C. A. 70).

[Sufficiency of Allegations]

Of necessity the legal sufficiency of the allegations of Count 2 is to be considered to determine whether the matters contained therein are relevant and constitute a cause of action.

Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on a motion to dismiss, the complaint must be viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and a complaint should not be dismissed for insufficiency except where it appears to a certainty that the claim for relief could not be sustained under any state of facts which could be proved in support of it. Ivancik v. Wright Aeronautical Corp., 68 Fed. Supp. 270; Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, rule 8 (a), 28 U. S. C. A. following sec. 723c.

[Propriety of Allegation of Fraud]

By their motion to strike defendants have raised the question as to the propriety of an allegation of fraud in obtaining a patent by one of the litigants where the suit is by private parties.

[Scope of Motion to Strike]

Speaking generally the motion to strike under Rule 12f of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is one of limited scope. For example the court in Radtke Patents Corporation v. C. J. Tagliabue Mfg. Co., Inc., 31 Fed. Supp. 226 in denying a motion to strike portions of an answer states: "Such a motion is not favored, and will be granted only when the allegations have no possible relation to the controversy. * * * This is true even though the matter is shown to be false by the moving affidavits, as the motion to strike should not be granted if the court is in any doubt that it cannot avail as a defense, or if under any contingency it may raise an issue."

[Issue of Fraud in Obtaining Patent]

The earlier cases in patent matters hold that fraud in obtaining a patent the existence of which is the basis of the suit is collateral and not a proper issue. This view appears to be losing favor. In the Hazel-Atlas Co. v. Hartford Co., 322 U. S. 238, the Supreme Court states in effect that fraud in obtaining a patent is properly presented at any stage of the case. There the court was dealing with active fraud, but the same result should apply if fraud was committed by inaction when and if there is a duty to act.

[Unclean Hands]

The defense of unclean hands in patent suits is good. Radtke Patents Corp. v. Tagliabue Mfg. Co., supra; Keystone Driller Co. v. General Excavator Co., 290 U. S. 240.

In Oliver v. City of Shattuck, 157 Fed. 2d 150 at 153, the court in dismissing relief after judgment said: "Courts have never hesitated to grant equitable relief against a judgment, if to execute it would give the judgment creditor an unconscientious advantage procured through his own fraud or some excusable mistake, or unavoidable accident on the part of judgment debtor." and cites as authority (among other) the Hazel-Atlas Co. v. Hartford case.

Again the Hazel-Atlas Co. v. Hartford decision is cited with approval by a court discussing the setting aside of a judgment obtained by fraud in Griffith v. Bank of N. Y., 147 Fed. (2d) 899, 901, saying: "And though it was once thought necessary that such fraud be 'extrinsic,' so that it could not have been considered in the original action, * * *, the later cases no longer seem to adhere strictly to even this limitation."

[Motion to Dismiss Denied]

The motion to dismiss should be denied since the complaint being considered in a light most favorable to plaintiff is sufficient as a pleading to entitle plaintiff to relief. Kuhn v. Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Calif., 37 Fed. Supp. 102; Bowles v. Sauer, 6 F. R. D. 571.

[Motion to Strike Denied]

The words used by Judge Goodman in Montgomery Ward & Co. v. Schumacher et al., 3 F. R. D. 368, 370, aptly express my attitude regarding defendants' motion to strike: "It does not seem to me that the allegations sought to be stricken have such a remote relationship to the cause of action as to require the granting of the motion under Rule 12f."

In the light of the evidence at the trial the attack made by defendants' motions may prove to be well founded. Therefore, defendants' motions to dismiss and to strike are denied, but under the provisions of Rule 12d of the Federal Rules of Procedure, without prejudice to their renewal at the time of trial.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. No. 12226. March 18, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Appeal—Temporary Injunction—Proper Forum.—The issuance by a federal district court in Texas of a temporary injunction to prohibit maintenance of an action brought under the antitrust laws in the district court in Delaware, under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, is held erroneous, where it is shown that the venue of the Delaware action was laid pursuant to a special statute, and was in the only forum where jurisdiction and venue could be obtained as to all of the several defendants. The doctrine of forum non conveniens is inapplicable where there are not two forums in which the entire group of defendants is answerable to process.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291.

Venue Requirements—Suit Not Vexatious or Oppressive.—It is not prima facie vexatious or oppressive, within the doctrine of forum non conveniens, to sue a corporation within the judicial district which meets the three venue requirements that the corporation be found in the district, transact business therein, and be an inhabitant thereof.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Forum Non Conveniens*—Interference with Suit in Another District.—Under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, a court having jurisdiction may decline to exercise it, in a suit that in justice should be tried elsewhere. It is erroneous, as a matter of comity, for a district court in which no antitrust action against the defendants is pending, to enjoin such an action in another district court.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.10.

Reversing the decision of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, 75 Fed. Supp. 93, reported at ¶ 62,211.

For appellant: Abe Fostas, Thurman Arnold, both of Washington, D. C.; Irving L. Goldberg, Dallas, Texas.

For appellees: Joe A. Worsham, Joseph Irion Worsham, George S. Wright, all of Dallas, Texas.

[Nature of Action]

HOLMES, Circuit Judge: This appeal is from an interlocutory order of the district court that temporarily enjoined the appellees from prosecuting a certain civil action now pending in the United States District Court for the District of Delaware, and from proceeding any further therein except to dismiss the complaint. The appeal is authorized by Section 129 of the Judicial Code, 28 U. S. C. 227. The temporary injunction was issued, under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, in the exercise of the equity powers of the court. Whether said doctrine was correctly applied is the decisive question on this appeal.[1]

[The Delaware Action]

The Delaware action alleged a conspiracy in restraint of trade in the execution of which the defendants assigned to themselves and their affiliates a monopolistic position for the exhibition of motion pictures in various cities throughout the United States. It was brought under the authority of Sections 1, 2, and 7 of the Act of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act; and Sections 4, 12, and 16 of the Act of October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.[2] It was filed by the Tivoli Realty, Inc., a Texas corporation, against fourteen defendants, twelve of whom are the principal producers and distributors of motion pictures, and two of whom operate a chain of motion-picture theatres in Texas and New Mexico. All of the defendants were incorporated under the laws of Delaware, except four that were incorporated under the laws of New York. The appellant, Tivoli Realty, Inc., alleged that the defendants had collusively assigned to its theatre in Dallas, Texas, an inferior playing position and had denied it an opportunity to compete for feature pictures. It sought damages and an injunction in the Delaware federal court.

[Temporary Injunction]

Before answering in the Delaware action, two of the defendants, Interstate Circuit, Inc., and Texas Consolidated Theatres, Inc., both Delaware corporations, filed the present suit in the court below praying that Tivoli Realty be enjoined from prosecuting the Delaware action. Seven of the remaining twelve defendants in the Delaware action intervened in the court below and joined in the prayer for an injunction. The court below issued an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be granted. On the hearing five defendants in the Delaware suit, which had not intervened below, filed a paper denying that the Texas court had jurisdiction over them, but voluntarily offering to submit to its venue if the Delaware complaint were brought in Texas; but they filed no intervention, offered no evidence, and asked for no relief. At the conclusion of the hearing, the judge entered an order granting the temporary injunction from which this appeal was taken.

[Forum Non Conveniens]

Under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, a court having jurisdiction may decline to exercise it in a suit that in justice should be tried elsewhere.[3] This doctrine involves the use of discretion on the part of the court in which the suit is brought. The United States district courts are not inclined to interfere by injunction with suits in other federal districts where the inequity alleged is based solely on inconvenience;[4] but in this case the parties failed to present the issue of inconvenience to the Delaware court, and sought an injunction from the Texas court in which no anti-trust action against them was pending. State courts have enjoined parties from litigating in another state in order to evade the laws of the first state;[5] but federal district courts are within a single judicial system in which the error of one may be corrected by the ordinary processes of appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Therefore, as a matter of comity, we think the court below erred in granting the injunction.

On the merits, it appears that the venue of the Delaware action was laid pursuant to a special statute,[6] and was in the only forum where jurisdiction and venue could be obtained as to all of the several defendants. The doctrine of forum non conveniens furnishes the criteria for choice between two or more forums in which the defendant is amenable to process.[7] At least two such forums must be open to the plaintiff before the doctrine comes into play; and they shall not be dependent merely upon the will or grace of the defendant, but must be provided by law.

[Doctrine Held Inapplicable]

The five defendants who did not intervene in the Texas court are alleged to be the principal conspirators in the Delaware action. Nevertheless, the court below enjoined Tivoli from prosecuting its action against them as well as against the plaintiffs and interveners. Tivoli was not left free to require these five alleged conspirators to answer or otherwise plead in the Delaware action; nor was it left free to proceed against them by taking depositions, filing interrogatories, or otherwise. The failure of these five to intervene, and their written statements that they were not subject to the venue of the court below, evidence that this case is not one in which the doctrine of forum non conveniens applies, because, as stated to be necessary by Mr. Justice Jackson, there are not two forums in which the entire group of defendants is answerable to process.[8]

[Venue Requirements]

It is a fair inference that ordinarily one's domicile is not an inconvenient place for one to be sued. Every federal venue statute within our contemplation embraces the defendant's residence or domicile as one of the places for suits to be brought against him. The Clayton Act, supra, specially provides that any action under it against a corporation may be brought in any judicial district where it is an inhabitant, or wherein it may be found, or transacts business. Prima facie, therefore, it is not vexatious or oppressive, within the doctrine under consideration, to sue a corporation within the judicial district that meets not only one but all three of these several requirements as to venue. The Delaware action meets all three, since the appellees may be found in Delaware, transact business there, and a corporation is deemed to be an inhabitant of the state of its creation.[9]

[Only Available Forum]

In addition, the District of Delaware seems to contain the only forum available to the plaintiff in an action against all of the alleged conspirators. We are told that the only reason the appellant did not file its anti-trust action in New York was that venue could not be secured there against two of the conspirators: Interstate Circuit, Inc., and Texas Consolidated Theatres, Inc. We agree with Tivoli that the trial in Texas would be more costly than in either Delaware or New York, because the alleged conspiracy is nationwide and the necessary witnesses, in the main, would have to be brought to Texas from New York, which is much closer to Delaware than is Texas. Moreover, jurisdiction in this case does not depend upon diversity of citizenship; it arises entirely from a federal statute, which specially states the venue of actions under it, and gives more freedom to the plaintiff's choice of forums than is afforded in the federal courts by the general statute as to venue.[10]

[Cases Cited]

In numerous cases under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the applicability of the doctrine of forum non conveniens has been denied.[11] The leading case is Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Kepner, supra, wherein the Supreme Court held that the special venue provisions of the Act could not be frustrated for reasons of convenience or expense. If deemed unjust the remedy is legislative, the court said. Such provisions are substantially the same as those under the anti-trust act, since a corporation may be found in any judicial district where it is doing business;[12] but the Federal Employers' Liability Act gives concurrent jurisdiction to state and federal courts of actions under it and forbids removal to the United States Courts of any such action brought in a state court of competent jurisdiction.[13] The denial of the right of removal, however, of actions brought in a state court, although in the same paragraph, is not a part of the venue provisions as to actions in the federal courts. Therefore, the anti-trust and the employers' liability acts, having substantially identical provisions as to venue, cannot be distinguished in principle.

In the Kepner case, supra, the court said that the importance of unhampered commerce was as great as that of the carrier's freedom from harassing litigation, and did not outweigh the plain grant of a legal privilege as to venue. This applies with greater force when legal venue is weighed against a claim of vexatious litigation where a nationwide conspiracy in restraint of commerce is alleged. The general rule is that a court possessing jurisdiction must exercise it if the venue is properly laid.[14] The venue being properly laid here and the doctrine of forum non conveniens being inapplicable, the order appealed from is reversed, the temporary injunction dissolved, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

In the absence of a special statute as to venue, where jurisdiction depends upon a federal question, no civil suit may be brought in any other district than that whereof the defendant is an inhabitant, 28 U. S. C. A. 112. Therefore, but for the special venue provisions in anti-trust and F. E. L. A. cases, suits in the federal courts under these two acts against a corporation might be brought only in a district in the state that granted the charter or in a state in which the corporation had consented to be sued. Neirbo Co. v. Bethlehem Corp., 308 U. S. 165.

[14] Williams v. Green Bay & W. R. Co., 326 U. S. 549, was a stockholders' suit, with jurisdiction dependent solely on diversity of citizenship. In this case the court said, pp. 554 to 557:

"We mention this phase of the matter to put the rule of forum non conveniens in proper perspective. It was designed as an 'instrument of justice.' Maintenance of a suit away from the domicile of the defendant—whether he be a corporation or an individual—might be vexatious or oppressive. An adventitious circumstance might land a case in one court when in fairness it should be tried in another. . . . But where in this type of litigation only a money judgment is sought, the case normally is different. The fact that the claim involves complicated affairs of a foreign corporation is not alone a sufficient reason for a federal court to decline to decide it. The same may be true even where an injunction is sought. We give these merely as illustrations. Each case turns on its facts. There are no special circumstances here, however, which should lead the District Court in New York to decline to exercise the jurisdiction which it has."

In the same opinion from which the Supreme Court has just quoted, Mr. Justice Cardozo stated further: "Equity, it is said, will not be over-nice in balancing the efficacy of one remedy against the efficacy of another when action will baffle, and inaction may confirm, the purpose of the wrongdoer." 288 U. S. 151.

A fortiori, in equity, one federal district court ought not to enjoin the parties in another federal district court from seeking an injunction to stop further overt acts, which it is averred are being committed every day in every state of the Union, in a nationwide criminal conspiracy to restrain commerce.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. Civil Action No. 46 C 1289. March 22, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Device and System Patents—Practices Enjoined.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging ten corporations with combining and conspiring to monopolize the manufacture and sale of automatic sprinkler systems using rate-of-rise release devices requires a defendant, which owns all current rate-of-rise patents involved, to license all applicants on an unconditional, reasonable royalty basis under all patents which it now has or may acquire up to December 31, 1952, and to sell rate-of-rise devices to all applicants without discrimination. Agreements on the part of the other defendants not to manufacture rate-of-rise devices, and to purchase them only from the patentee defendant, and agreements on the part of the patentee defendant to prevent competitors of the other defendants from obtaining such equipment, are cancelled and enjoined.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270, 1590.

For plaintiff: John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; Sigmund Timberg, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; W. P. Epes, Special Attorney; Otto Kerner, Jr., United States Attorney; J. Albert Woll, United States Attorney; Melville C. Williams, G. B. Haddock, Ewart Harris, Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

For defendants: John A. Duncan, H. H. Johnson, Brooks W. Maccrackin, H. McKnight, Alan J. Altheimer, Joseph Strasburger, J. Bernhard Theiss, Arthur A. Olson, John J. Dooling, Ira Jeffreys, Howard Neitzert, William H. Avery, Jr., Sidley Austin Burgess & Harper.

Final Judgment

Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on July 11, 1946; all the defendants having appeared and severally filed their answers to such complaint denying any violation of law; and all parties by their respective attorneys herein having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or of law and without admission of any party herein in respect of any such issue;

Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of issues of fact or law herein, and upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby

Ordered, Adjudged, and Decreed, as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

That this Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter hereof and of all parties hereto; that the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

II

[Terms Defined]

As used in this judgment:

(a) "Defendants" refers to each and all of the defendants and each and all of their officers, directors, agents, employees, successors, subsidiaries, and assigns, and each person acting or claiming to act under, through, or for them or any of them;

(b) "Defendant Automatic" refers to Automatic Sprinkler Company of America, Automatic Sprinkler Corporation of America and their officers, directors, agents, employees, successors, subsidiaries, and assigns, and each person acting or claiming to act under, through, or for them, or any of them;

(c) "Person" means any individual, partnership, firm, corporation, association, trustee, or any other business or legal entity;

(d) "Rate-of-rise system" means any automatic sprinkler system for automatically distributing water upon a fire, which is operated by means of heat actuated devices used in conjunction with an adjustable releasing mechanism, and which is designed to operate when the rate of increase of temperature in the protected area exceeds a predetermined rate;

(e) "Rate-of-rise devices" means any of the heat actuated devices and adjustable releasing mechanisms by the means of which a rate-of-rise system is operated and any auxiliary devices specially designed for supervising a rate-of-rise system;

(f) "Rate-of-rise equipment" means any part, apparatus or accessories comprising or used in connection with a rate-of-rise system, with the exception of rate-of-rise devices;

(g) "Device patents" means all United States letters patent, and all applications for such letters patent listed in Appendix A hereof; all divisions, continuations, renewals, extensions or reissues of the foregoing patents and patent applications; all patents issued upon such applications; all patents covering any rate-of-rise devices or any process for the manufacture of rate-of-rise devices which may be issued to or acquired by defendants on or before December 31, 1952; and all such patents of which any defendant on or before that date becomes the licensee with the power to sub-license; provided that in so far as any claims of any of said patents cover combinations or systems (instead of devices) said patents with respect to such claims shall be treated as "system patents" hereunder and not "device patents";

(h) "System patents" means all United States letters patent, and all applications for such letters patent, listed in Appendix B hereof; all divisions, continuations, renewals, extensions, or reissues of the foregoing patents and patent applications; all patents covering any rate-of-rise system which may be issued to or acquired by defendants on or before December 31, 1952; and all such patents of which any defendant on or before that date becomes the licensee with the power to sublicense; provided that in so far as any claims of any of said patents cover devices (instead of combinations or systems) said patents with respect to such claims shall be treated as "device patents" hereunder and not "system patents";

(i) "1927-28 Agreements" means the following contracts and agreements:

The first agreement dated October 3, 1927, between Defendant Automatic and General Fire Extinguisher Company (now Grinnell Corporation), further identified as containing five numbered paragraphs.

The second agreement dated October 3, 1927, between Defendant Automatic and General Fire Extinguisher Company (now Grinnell Corporation, further identified as containing seventeen numbered paragraphs.

The agreement dated October 6, 1927, between Defendant Automatic and Globe Automatic Sprinkler Company of Pennsylvania.

The agreement dated January 14, 1928, between Defendant Automatic and H. G. Vogel Company.

The agreement dated March 8, 1928, between Defendant Automatic and Rockwood Sprinkler Company of Massachusetts.

The agreement dated March 3, 1928, between Defendant Automatic and Rhode Island Supply & Sprinkler Company (subsequently assigned to Rhode Island Supply & Engineering Company).

(j) "Necessary technical information" means the know-how and technical knowledge which are necessary for or useful to a licensee in the manufacture, installation, maintenance and operation of any rate-of-rise device or rate-of-rise system under patents licensed pursuant to the terms of this judgment.

[Agreements Cancelled]

The 1927-28 Agreements, as defined in this judgment, and each of them are hereby cancelled; and the defendants and each of them are hereby enjoined and restrained (1) from the further performance of any of the provisions of said agreements and of any agreements amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and (2) from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, directly or indirectly, among themselves or with any other person, or claiming any rights under any contract, agreements, understanding, plan, program or course of conduct for the purpose or with the effect of continuing, reviving, or renewing any of said agreements.

[Licensing Required]

(a) The defendant Automatic is hereby ordered and directed, with respect to patents referred to in Section II hereof under its ownership or control, to grant to each applicant therefor at his option a non-exclusive license (1) to make, use and vend, under any, some or all of its device patents as defined; and/or (2) to install, use and vend, under any, some or all of its system

patents as defined in this judgment. Defendant Automatic is hereby enjoined and restrained from making any assignment, sale or other disposition of any of said patents which would deprive it of the power or authority to grant such licenses, unless it requires, as a condition of such assignment, sale or other disposition, that the purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall observe the requirements of Sections IV, VI, VII, VIII and X of this judgment and the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall file with this Court, prior to consummation of said transaction, an undertaking to be bound by the provisions of said Sections IV, VI, VII, VIII and X of the judgment.

(b) If at any time or times hereafter any of the defendants shall grant to any other defendant a license to make, install, use or vend under any system patent or patents or any device patent or patents as herein defined, then at each such time and in each such event the defendant so licensing another defendant is hereby ordered and directed to grant to each applicant therefor a similar non-exclusive license (1) to make, use and vend under the device patent or patents so licensed to another defendant and/or (2) to install, use and vend under the system patent or patents so licensed to another defendant.

(c) Defendants are hereby enjoined and restrained from including any restriction or condition whatsoever in any license granted by them pursuant to the provisions of this Section except that (1) the license may be non-transferable; (2) a reasonable non-discriminatory royalty may be charged; (3) a reasonable provision may be made for inspection of the books and records of the licensee by an independent auditor or any person acceptable to the licensee who shall report to the licensor only the amount of the royalty due and payable; (4) reasonable provision may be made for cancellation of the license upon failure of the licensee to pay the royalties or to permit the inspection of his books and records as hereinabove provided; (5) the license must provide that the licensee may cancel the license at any time after one year from the initial date thereof by giving thirty (30) days notice in writing to the licensor; (6) the license shall provide that the licensee shall immediately have the benefit of any more favorable terms granted other licensees.

(d) Upon receipt of written request for a license under the provisions of this section, the defendant receiving such request shall advise the license applicant in writing of the royalty which it deems reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertains. If the parties are unable to agree upon a reasonable royalty within sixty (60) days from the date such request for the license was received by the defendant, the license applicant may forthwith apply to this Court for the determination of a reasonable royalty, and the defendant shall, upon receipt of notice of the filing of such court application, promptly give notice thereof to the Attorney General. In any such court proceeding, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant to establish the reasonableness of the royalty requested by it, and the reasonable royalty rates, if any, determined by the Court shall apply to the license applicant and all other licensees under the same patent or patents. For said sixty (60) day period and pending the completion of any such court proceeding, the applicant shall have the right to make, use and vend under the patent or patents to which his application pertains without payment of royalty or other compensation, but subject to the final judgment and order of the Court in such proceeding, and further subject to the following provisions: The defendant may apply to the Court to fix an interim royalty rate, pending final determination of what constitutes a reasonable royalty, if any. If the Court fixes such interim royalty rate, the defendant shall then issue and the court applicant shall accept a license, or as the case may be, a sublicense, providing for the periodic payment of royalties at such interim rate from the date of the filing of such court application by the applicant. If the court applicant fails to accept such license or fails to pay the interim royalty in accordance therewith, such action shall be ground for the dismissal of his application and for the rescission of any and all of the applicant's rights under this subsection. Where an interim license or sublicense has been issued pursuant to this subsection, or where the applicant has exercised a right to make, use and vend hereunder, reasonable royalty rates, if any, as finally determined by the Court shall be retroactive for the applicant and all other licensees under the same patents to the date the applicant files his application with the Court.

(e) Nothing herein shall prevent any applicant from attacking at any time the validity or scope of any of said patents nor shall this judgment be construed as importing any validity or value to any of said patents

V

[Infringement Suits Enjoined]

Defendants are enjoined and restrained from instituting or threatening to institute, or maintaining, or continuing any action, suit or proceeding for acts of infringement of any device or system patent occurring prior to the date of this judgment.

VI

[Furnishing of Information]

The defendants are hereby ordered and directed to furnish with all licenses issued under their respective patents pursuant to Section IV of this judgment, to all licensees making application therefor, and at any time with the term of such licenses, necessary technical information as defined in this judgment, in the possession of the defendant licensor, without charge, except that the cost of furnishing such necessary technical information may be recovered from the licensee. Such cost shall not include any overhead or general charges.

[Non-Discriminatory Sale]

Defendant Automatic is hereby ordered and directed, as long as it shall manufacture, sell or deal in rate-of-rise devices, to offer to sell, and to sell such rate-of-rise devices, in such quantities as may be reasonably reqired and to the extent that it has such devices currently available, to any prospective purchaser or user, without discrimination among such prospective purchasers or users as to availability of such devices or as to the prices, terms and conditions of their sale.

VIII

[Tying Agreements Prohibited]

Defendants are hereby enjoined and restrained from conditioning, or requiring or inducing any other person to condition any license or grant of immunity issued by them under a device or system patent, or any sale, offer to sell, distribution or use of any rate-of-rise device or rate-of-rise equipment (1) upon the purchase, securement or use of any other product, article or service from or through any defendant or from or through any particular or designated source or sources; (2) by requiring the purchaser, licensee or grantee to refrain from reselling or distributing such rate-of-rise devices or equipment; (3) by requiring the purchaser, licensee or grantee to resell such a device at a price or on other terms or conditions fixed by the defendants; (4) by requiring the purchaser, licensee or grantee to use, install or deal, exclusively or in any determined amounts or quotas, in rate-of-rise devices or equipment made by one or more specified manufacturers, or to refrain from using, selling, installing or dealing in any rate-of-rise devices or equipment; or (5) by requiring the purchaser, licensee or grantee to purchase rate-of-rise devices or equipment exclusively or in any determinate amount or quotas from one or more specified sellers thereof.

IX

[Agreements Enjoined]

The defendants herein are hereby severally and jointly enjoined and restrained, either when acting alone or pursuant to any agreement, contract, understanding, combination or conspiracy among themselves or with any other person, from requiring or inducing any person (including but not limited to other defendants, and the licensees and distributors of any defendant), (1) to sell or to purchase any rate-of-rise device subject to any condition or restriction whatsoever with respect to the use, installation or resale of such device; (2) to sell or to purchase any rate-of-rise equipment, subject to any condition or restriction whatsoever with respect to the use, installation or resale of such equipment; (3) to give or receive any license or grant of immunity under a system or device patent, subject to any condition or restriction whatsoever with respect to the use, installation or resale of such equipment, system or device; or (4) to agree not to buy, sell, use, install or otherwise deal in any rate-of-rise devices, equipment, or systems outside a specified geographical area.

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege,

(a) access during the office hours of such defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendant relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment; and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means permitted in this paragraph shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment or as otherwise required by law.

XI

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this decree to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the modification thereof, the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 62,231] Ira J. McCullough v. Kammerer Corporation and Baash-Ross Tool Company.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. No. 11,122. February 26, 1948.

Infringement Suit—Use of Patent to Suppress Competition—Restrictions Against Public Interest.—Upon appeal from an interlocutory decree holding that the patentee of devices for cutting pipe in oil wells is entitled to damages for patent infringement, it is held that a license agreement between the patentee and a licensee providing that neither the licensor nor the licensee shall acquire or use any other pipe cutter is contrary to public interest, inasmuch as it operated to stifle new competitive invention and to suppress competitive forces which stimulate newer and better products. The judgment for damages is reversed.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1660.200.

For appellant: R. Welton Whann, Robert M. McNanigal, both of Los Angeles, California; A. W. Boyken, Boyken, Mohler & Beckley, W. Bruce Beckley, all of San Francisco, California.

For appellee: Frederick S. Lyon, Leonard S. Lyon, Mark Herron, all of Los Angeles, California.

For United States, as amicus curiae: William C. Dixon, Wallace Howland, Special Assistants to the Attorney General; Julian Caplan, Special Attorney, San Francisco, California; John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

Before: DENMAN, BONE and ORR, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Action]

DENMAN, C. J.: McCullough appeals from an interlocutory decree holding that Kammerer Corporation, hereinafter called the patentee, is entitled to damages for McCullough's infringement of patentee's patents for cutting pipe in oil wells and an accounting thereof, and defying McCullough's motion to set aside a prior interlocutory order for the accounting and to dismiss the two complaints (consolidated for trial) brought against him for such infringement by the patentee and Baash-Ross Tool Company, hereinafter called the licensee, on the ground that the licensing contract between the licensor and licensee was against the public interest.[1]

[1] Cf. McCullough v. Kammerer, 138 F. 2d 482 (CCA-9), affirming the first interlocutory decree and id. 323 U. S. 327, and id. 148 F. 2d 525 (CCA-9), respecting the contention of unclean hands urged, but not decided, on appeal but committed to the district court for its consideration.

[License Contract]

One of McCullough's contentions respecting the patentee's conduct in the exploitation of its patent is that its licensing contract with the licensee[2] violated the public interest. That contract not only gave the licensee an exclusive license to manufacture and use (but not to sell) the pipe cutter in the United States and its territories but prevented both the licensor and licensee from acquiring or using any other pipe cutter. The challenged provisions of the contract are

> "11. The Licensee covenants and agrees during the term of this license agreement not to manufacture or use or rent any device which will be in competition with the device or devices covered by this license agreement.
> "12. The Licensor covenants and agrees that during the term of this agreement, not to manufacture, sell, rent, license, use, or in any way do business with the device or devices covered by this agreement or with devices which will come or be in competition with the device or devices covered by this agreement."

These covenants extend the monopoly of the patent by preventing competition with the patent of any other pipe cutter, patented or unpatented, manufactured, used or sold by the licensee, theretofore engaged in making pipe cutting tools. The licensor to procure such extension of the monopoly area of its patent also binds itself to extend the area of the monopoly by a similar restrictive agreement.

In addition it appears that the patentee is a corporation having as its general manager an inventor of pipe cutters as well as two of its officers also such inventors. Its agreement to extend the patent monopoly by eliminating competition is aided by its agreement not to avail itself of the inventive genius of its employees in creating competitive devices which it can "manufacture, sell, rent, license, use or in any way do business with."

[Matters of Substance]

It cannot be said that these are matters de minimis and not of substance. The patentee appellee describes the licensee as "a very large company" doing a world-wide business. Its operators went from state to state to operate the cutter. The evidence shows licensee's business in the United States alone extended to the oil wells of companies in eleven states. In 1923, the year the challenged contract was made, the income from the rental of the cutter to such oil companies amounted to $212,760. At the rental agreed in the licensing contract of $190 for each cutting, this amount shows that in that year wells were so serviced over these states by 1172 such cuts. The total income from such cuts in 15 years amounted to "something like about" $2,500,000 from "the running by the Baash Tool Company of the Stone and Reilly cutter."

The district court found at the trial on the issue of infringement that the licensee had a monopoly of the field of pipe cutting in the United States, all other cutters being supplanted by the cutter of which it had the patent monopoly.

Nothing could more discourage inventors or manufacturers of better competitive cutters than to take from them the patronage of the only person then using or cutting with the only device used in cutting broken pipe in all the oil fields of the United States. While it is true that this exclusive occupation of cutting in all these fields arose after the making of the challenged contract, what was aimed at by the contracting parties was just such success. What they feared is shown by the challenged covenants, withdrawing both parties from the field of inventing or using competitive devices.

[Issue of Public Interest]

In this situation the contention is entirely irrelevant that neither party was harmed by the agreement. The question is, "Was the public harmed?" We think the district court erred in holding it was not and are in accord with the Third Circuit that these restrictions are against the public interest and warrant a court of equity in refusing the relief here sought. In National Lockwasher Co. v. George K. Garrett Co., 137 F. 2d 255, 257 (CCA-3), that court states:

> "The standard form of contract used by the plaintiff in licensing agreements

[2] The contract was made on October 18, 1923, with the L. F. Baash Perforator Company which manufactured the pipe cutter and serviced oil well companies with it. On November 1, 1924, L. F. Baash Perforator Company assigned the licensing contract to Baash-Ross Tool Company which took over the servicing as well as the manufacture of the cutter. The Perforator Company was then merged with the Baash-Ross Tool Company, the licensee here.

was in evidence. That contract contains a clause that '(g) Licensee agrees that, while this agreement is in force, it will make and sell no form of non-entangling Spring Washers except such as are covered by said patent, and that it will not, either directly or indirectly, make or sell Spring Washers of the kind specifically excluded from this license under the provisions of Paragraph First (a) hereof.' There was no dispute that this provision appeared in the licensing agreements given by the plaintiff to those who sought to make spring washers utilizing the plaintiff's patent.

"We think this is enough; enough to show that the plaintiff was using its patent to suppress competition with it by non-patented articles. To the extent that the policy was successful the supply of competing non-patented washers would, of course, disappear.

"Said Mr. Chief Justice Stone in United States v. Univis Lens Co., Inc., 1942, 316 U. S. 241, 251, 62 S. Ct. 1088, 1094, 86 L. Ed. 1408: 'In construing and applying the patent law so as to give effect to the public policy which limits the granted monopoly strictly to the terms of the statutory grant, Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488, 62 S. Ct. 402, 86 L. Ed. 363, the particular form or method by which the monopoly is sought to be extended is immaterial.' This statement of principle covers the situation here. The patentee has disentitled itself to recover at present for infringement by reason of its utilization of its patent monopoly to drive unpatented competing goods from the market." [3]

We agree with that circuit that there is no difference in principle between extending the monopoly of the patent by suppressing the manufacture or use of competitive devices, patented or unpatented, and the extension of the monopoly by prohibiting the use in making the patented article of unpatented articles competing with those made by the licensor's subsidiary, held against the public interest in Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488, 493. As stated in Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U. S. 661, 666:

"The fact that the patentee has the power to refuse a license does not enable him to enlarge the monopoly of the patent by the expedient of attaching conditions to its use. United States v. Masonite Corp., supra, p. 277. The method by which the monopoly is sought to be extended is immaterial. United States v. Univis Lens Co., supra, pp. 251-252." (Italics supplied.)

[Suppression of Competition]

The public, in a system of free competition, is entitled to have the competition of other devices with a patented device and here it is against that public's interest to use the patent to suppress such competition. As stated by the Supreme Court in the recent case of Transparent-Wrap Mach. Corp. v. Stokes & Smith, 329 U. S. 637, 644:

"Protection from competition in the sale of unpatented materials is not granted by either the patent law or the general law. He who uses his patent to obtain protection from competition in the sale of unpatented materials extends by contract his patent monopoly to articles as respects which the law sanctions neither monopolies nor restraints of trade."

[Licensee's Contention Rejected]

We see no merit in the licensee's contention that the Lockwasher case is distinguishable because in that case there were several licensees and here there is but one. As seen, the licensee was a "very large company" doing a business abroad and in the United States, with an income of rentals from the cutter of $212,700 in the year the contract was made, and which had acquired mastery of the entire field of pipe cutting. In Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U. S. 663, there was a sole licensee and the license denied the use of other devices with the use of that of the patent. There the licensee could sublicense, just as here the licensee could sublicense the use of the pipe cutter.

As well could it be said that the principle here invoked would not apply if a patent for making steel was licensed solely to the Steel Corporation and that very large company in the steel business, as the licensee here is in that of pipe cutting, were required to agree not to manufacture, use or sell competing steel making devices.

With regard to the licensor's agreement with the licensee to make more certain the licensee's profit by extending the monopoly area by excluding itself from making, using, renting or licensing competitive cutters, such a patent monopoly extension by the agree- ment of the licensor has the same prejudice to the public as the restricting agreement of the licensee. In the recent case of Scott Paper Co. v. Marcalus, 326 U. S. 249, 257, it was held, distinguishing prior decisions, that it is against the public interest for an owner of a claimed patent to make an agreement with his licensee by which he binds himself not to contest the validity of the licensed patent. In the public interest the licensor must not bind himself not to make, use and vend articles covered by the terms of the patent and hence cannot bind himself not to defend such creation of goods on the ground that the patent he has purported to license is invalid because anticipated by a valid but expired patent.

[3] Cf. Pope Manufacturing Co. v. Gormully, 144 U. S. 224, 236, 237, where, in part, the agreement held against public policy provided that the licensee during the life of the licensed patents, "agrees never to import, manufacture or sell any machines or devices covered by certain other patents."

[Restrictions on Invention]

With regard to the agreement's compulsion on the patentee not to exercise the inventive power of its general manager and other employees in privity with it, in creating competing devices, the purpose of the patent law is to encourage, not to hamper, invention.

There is no merit to the contention, attempted to be based on U. S. v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, that because the patentee may refrain from making or using competing devices, unpatented or patented, he may bind his licensee so to refrain. In Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger, supra, the Suppiger Co. could have refrained from using any unpatented salt tablets other than its own in its patented machines for the insertion of salt tablets in the process of canning. Yet the court held against public policy the prevention of its licensee, as here, from using tablets competing with Suppiger's. So also in U. S. v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 280, where the lower court relying on the General Electric case was reversed. There the Masonite Corporation could have fixed its price on the patented hardboard it sold yet it was held against public policy and a violation of the antitrust laws to fix the price of the persons licensed to vend the hardboard.

Such restricting conditions are not "reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant [or licensing] of the patent is entitled to secure" mentioned in U. S. v. General Electric Co., supra., p. 489. "As stated by Mr. Justice Story in Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. 1, 19, the promotion of the progress of science and the useful arts is the 'main object'; reward of inventors is secondary and merely a means to that end. Or, in the words of Mr. Justice Daniel in Kendall v. Winsor, 21 How. 322, 329, 'Whilst the remuneration of genius and useful ingenuity is a duty incumbent upon the public, the rights and welfare of the community must be fairly dealt with and effectually guarded. Considerations of individual emolument can never be permitted to operate to the injury of these.' And see Blount Mfg. Co. v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 166 F. 555." U. S. v. Masonite Corporation, 316 U. S. 265, 278.

The licensor and licensee contend that whether or not such discouragement in invention and such suppression of competition of other devices be otherwise against the public interest, they are not prohibited where, as here, the patentee's royalty income is measured, in part, by the profits the licensee makes from its use of the patent—here by one-half the profits secured by a lien on all the licensed devices manufactured by and belonging to the licensee.

[Joint Venture]

We do not agree that the evidence supports the lower court's finding that the licensing agreement created a joint venture. The patentee here is not liable for the licensee's losses in exploiting the products of its license. On the contrary, if the licensee become bankrupt, the patentee, with its lien on the bankrupt's manufactured devices, may purchase them for $300 each, any unpaid royalties to apply on the purchase price. The parties were clearly dealing at arm's length. The transaction does not become a joint venture because the amount of the royalty is measured in part by the licensee's profits. If the lower court's holding were correct every licensing agreement yielding a profit measured by the success of the exploitation of the patent would be such a venture.

The prior owners of the patent upon which the pipe cutters were made were one Reilly and one Stone. Reilly's and Stone's invention was made while they were employees of the Baash Perforator Co., which thus had a claim on the patent. One Kammerer had a prior patent for pipe cutting, of which it was claimed the Reilly and Stone patent was an infringement, and litigation was threatened. The several parties came together and agreed it would be more profitable not to litigate. In this situation the patentee Kammerer and the patentees Reilly and Stone each could have licensed to the Baash Perforator Co. for a royalty to each and each agreed not to invent or "manufacture, sell or use" etc. any competing device and the Perforator Company likewise agreed not to manufacture, sell, use, etc.

Had this been done a similar result to that in the instant case would have been accomplished with three parties acting against the public interest instead of two. That the patentees obtain their royalties as stockholders in the Kammerer Corporation, to which they transferred their patents and of which they became the controlling officers and directors, does not change the prejudice to the public interest. In both methods the restrictive covenants are a convenient method of protecting each from inter-party competition but, as stated by Chief Justice Stone in B. B. Chemical Co. v. Ellis, 314 U. S. 495, 498, "The patent monopoly is not enlarged by reason of the fact that it would be more convenient to the patentee to have it so, or because he cannot avail himself of its benefits within the limits of the grant."

[Sharing of Profits]

Even had this patent licensing contract created a joint venture, the sharing of profits and losses is no ground for protecting them by agreements against the public interest. The case of Universal Sales Corp. v. Cal. etc. Mfg. Co., 20 Cal. (2) 751, cited by appellees, had no agreement restricting the use of competitive materials or in any way affecting the public interest. In the case of Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 18 How. 289, 293, also cited by appellees, the Court held no more than that it was "competent for two persons, being joint owners of letters-patent, whether valid or invalid, to enter into a copartnership for the manufacture and sale of the patented machines, and to stipulate that one of them should alone conduct the business." In that case there was no question of the licenses reaching beyond the patented articles and discouraging other patenting or forbidding the use of competitive devices. If the Court's statement "Besides, if the contract to refrain from the manufacture could not be enforced, as being against public policy, this would afford no answer to a claim for an account of profits actually realized by prosecuting the business, there being no connection between the illegal stipulation and the profits of the business," means that the Court will enforce such a contract, as here, affecting the public interest if there is no connection between the public injury and the profits from pipe cutting—it is overruled by many subsequent decisions such as Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger & Co., supra, where it is stated at page 494, "It is the adverse effect upon the public interest of a successful infringement suit in conjunction with the patentee's course of conduct which disqualifies him to maintain the suit, regardless of whether the particular defendant has suffered from the misuse of the patent."

McCullough also claims the contract gives the licensee the right only to "manufacture and use" the patented device. Hence, it is contended, the device cannot be rented to others and its use solely by the licensee required the employment of skilled workmen. The license, he claims, fixes the price the licensee may charge the oil drillers it serves at $190 per use, thus controlling not the mere participation price of the value of the tool in making the cut but, as well, the price charged the parties served for the workmen employed.

We do not agree that the contract so provides. At one place it grants "the exclusive right to manufacture and use, but not sell" the cutters. However, it later provides for part of the royalty, one-half the gross earnings from "the use of said devices by the licensee" and just after that for the payment of $190 per cut for the "rental for the use" of the cutters. It next provides that the licensee shall keep books of account showing "the names of the parties to whom the same [cutters] were rented or upon whose property the same are used." It then provides for a monthly "statement showing the dates of the use or rental thereof and the number of cuts made and the parties for whom the device or devices were used during the preceding calendar month."

We construe this contract to mean that where there was a rental of the use of the cutter to an oil driller, the $190 received was part of the licensee's gross earnings to be divided equally with the licensor. Where the licensee itself used the device on the property whose oil wells it served, the charges for the services and use were addtions to the gross earnings to be equally divided. We can see no public harm in such an agreement.

[Public Interest Prejudiced]

We hold that the evidence establishes that the licensing contract and the operations thereunder substantially prejudiced the public interest in that they stifled new competitive invention and suppressed competitive forces which stimulate newer and better products, and that the contract's covenants strike at the very purpose of the statute and its constitutional basis. Neither the Kammerer Corporation nor the Baash-Ross Tool Company is entitled to damages for McCullough infringement and the interlocutory judgment for damages and an accounting is reversed and the complaints are ordered dismissed.

[Judgment Reversed]

Reversed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

BONE, C. J., dissenting: In United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 478, 489, 490, a unanimous Court announced a basic rule clearly applicable to the license agreement in the case at bar and later cases do not appear to have diluted or modified that rule. The Court there said: "The patentee may grant a license to make, use and vend articles under the specifications of his patent for any royalty or upon any condition the performance of which [condition] is reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant of the patent is entitled to secure." (Italics supplied.)

Also: "The patentee may make and grant a license to another to make and use the patented articles, but withhold his right to sell them. * * * if he [the licensee] sells them, he infringes the right of the patentee, and may be held for damages and enjoined." (Italics supplied.) The Court goes even further in this case in declaring that if the patentee licenses the selling of the articles, he may limit the selling by limiting the method of sale. (See also comments of a unanimous Court on powers of a patent licensor set forth in first complete paragraph on page 456, Ethyl Gasoline Corp. v. United States, 309 U. S. 436.)

In the General Electric case the Court is speaking about, and passing upon, the dominent issue squarely confronting this court in the case at bar; that issue is "the performance" (by a licensee) of a "condition" prescribed in a license agreement. The inescapable logic of its pronouncement upon that aspect of patent law is that if the patentee himself may lawfully do the things sanctioned and authorized by our patent laws, he may (within the limits noted by the court, which "limits" were not transcended by the licensee in the instant case) lawfully grant a patent license which confers upon the licensee the lawful right to engage in precisely the same sort of operations. A license agreement, thus conditioned, does not expand or escape the orbit of the patent and/or the rights which inure to the patentee under his patent grant.

If the General Electric case is still "good law" why doubt the absolute right of Kammerer to do everything the Baash Company was authorized to do under the instant agreement. In my view of the law of this case, these "authorizations" are, in legal contemplation, but a mere recitation of business operations which licensor Kammerer, if operating alone, could lawfully "perform." This view appears to find adequate support in the doctrine announced in the General Electric case, and sanction in the very nature of our contract and patent law. If a patent owner prefers to refrain entirely from exploiting his own patent, as for example by doing and performing the very acts and things which Kammerer authorized Baash to do, but elects to confer upon a licensee the exclusive right to do and perform these acts and practices, I am unable to see how such practices by a licensee are thereby translated into legal villainies merely because they are permitted by the license agreement. Furthermore, if Kammerer had preferred to manufacture its own device and not make any patent licenses, and thereafter proceeded to do the very same things this agreement purports to authorize Baash to do, the royalty (or rental) payments collected by Kammerer would be "reasonably within the reward" which the patent grant entitled Kammerer to secure.

A license limiting the use of a patented wringer and gear mechanism to certain types of washing machines is a valid exercise of the patent monopoly. Vulcan Mfg. Co. v. Maytag, 73 F. 2d 136, cert. dismissed, 294 U. S. 734.

To avoid irrelevancies it is well at the outset to point out some of the basic conclusions upon which this court rests its opinion in this case. It says:

(1) "These covenants [paragraphs 11 and 12 of the license agreement] extend the monopoly of the patent by preventing competition with the patent of any other pipe cutter * * * used or sold by the licensee." (Italics supplied.)

Also:

(2) "The licensor to procure such extension of the monopoly area of its patent * * * binds itself to extend the area of the monopoly by a similar restrictive agreement." (Italics supplied.)

Also:

(3) "* * * the patentee [Kammerer] is a corporation having as its general manager an inventor of pipe cutters as well as two of its officers also such inventors. Its agreement to extend the patent monopoly by eliminating competition is aided by its agreement not to avail itself of the inventive genius of its employees in creating competitive devices which it can 'manufacture, sell, rent, license, use or in any way do business with.' "

The first two contentions advanced seem to me to beg the question baldly posed by this case. I prefer to suggest the answer in the general comments in this dissent. As to the third, I think that it finds a satisfactory answer in the very language of the two (cited) paragraphs of the license agreement. Paragraph 12 of the license agreement says in simple English that Kammerer agrees not to "manufacture, sell, rent, license, use or * * * do business" (with the covered device) "or with devices which will come or be in competition with the device or devices covered by the agreement." The plain purpose of this language was to permit Baash to (thereafter) exclusively use the Kammerer device, i.e., to "do business" with it. Kammerer simply agreed that it would not "do business" with its own device but preferred to yield the field of use to Baash. This is not a suppression of use. On the contrary, the agreement called for free use by Baash of the patented device in an important field of business activity.

Since this mindless creature of the law (a corporation) can hardly be charged with the offense of violating public policy by agreeing that it will not invent something, my associates turn to its employees and charge that Kammerer agreed not to avail itself of the inventive genius of its employees in creating competitive devices.

The language I have quoted above fully answers this unnatural construction of the meaning of the plain provision of Paragraph 12. On its face the license agreement shows that all of the individuals connected with the Kammerer and Baash organizations were left free to invent anything and to freely sell their inventions to any one. The language of the agreement can not be tortured into a "discouragement in invention." Our opinion is literally a holding that Kammerer was party to an agreement which "stifled invention" — but whose invention did it "stifle"? Certainly the patented device of Kammerer was not (thereby) being stifled—it was being put to the freest sort of use in eleven states. Our opinion accents the fact of what it calls "large operations" by Baash in exploiting the Kammerer patent.

Paragraph 11 applying to the licensee is equally void of language suggestive of such repression of "invention," or of the "inventive instinct." As indicated, all agents, officers and employees of both licensor and licensee were left entirely free (under the language of the agreement) to invent and give full play to their inventive instincts (and sell their invention or inventions).

Appellant makes certain specific contentions in his brief which aid materially to narrow the legal issue before us. He says: "Our contention is simply this: that, * * * the parties to a patent license agreement may not disable both of them from selling the patented invention. We believe that such a restraint, created by agreement, * * * is unlawful." (Italics supplied.) This contention is both simple and blunt and permits of no misunderstanding of what we are forced to decide. If our opinion gives sanction to it, we part company with the doctrine of the General Electric case, which holds that the patent licensor may "withhold the right to sell." Within the orbit of the patent, the patent owner may lawfully license such part of his rights as he chooses. Where in the law do we find sanction for the doctrine that the patent licensor loses this right to withhold some part of his rights, merely because he exercises a recognized legal right to grant a patent license?

The law does not compel a patent owner to sell his patent. Aside from entering into contracts not to use an invention, which are a restraint of trade, the patent owner may refrain from doing anything at all with his patent—its validity is not affected by his non-use. Continental Paper Bag Co. v. Eastern Paper Bag Co., 210 U. S. 405.

Another contention by appellant is that the use of the patented device (by a licensee) may not lawfully be restricted ("conditioned") in the license. The General Electric case also answers that contention. Kammerer could lawfully make, use and vend its patented device, and exclude all others from such operations. Or it could part company (by a license) with a part of these exclusive rights and authorize a licensee to use the licensed device "upon any condition the performance of which is reasonably within the reward" which Kammerer is entitled to secure. That "reward" would most certainly be a lawful one when it came in the form of "rentals" received for the use of the patented device.[1]

By the license to Baash, the Kammerer corporation simply agreed that its "reward" should be provided in a percentage of the rentals received by Baash for the use of the Kammerer tool. Our opinion makes an unprofitable argument on the issue raised in the case as to whether the agreement established a "joint venture" between appellees. I wholly agree with appellant who states in his Reply Brief that he believes that this particular question "is irrelevant to the fundamental question" in the case. It is. Furthermore, I see nothing illegal in this way of securing a reward to the patent owner.

It is a significant and interesting fact that no case has been cited to us which is "on all fours" with the case at bar. So in order to plaster this license agreement with badges of illegality, said to clearly appear on its face, this court turns to and lifts quotations from cases dealing with totally different states of fact. Employing this process of analogy, it concludes that the instant agreement, per se, is legal proof that the parties thereto deliberately contracted and agreed to engage in the activities, and commit the various legal sins, found to be present, and constituting the dominant legal issue in, such cases as Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U. S. 661; Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488; National Lockwasher Co. v. Garrett Co., 137 F. 2d 255 (CCA-3); Pope Mfg. Co. v. Gormully, 144 U. S. 224; Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 329 U. S. 637; Carbice Corp. v. American Patents Development Corp., 283 U. S. 27; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265.

This oblique process undertakes to prove too much. The facts and the real legal issue in this case are poles apart from those in the cases just referred to, some of which are relied upon in the court's opinion.[2] It does not provide an answer in this case to lift broad statements of general principles from cases dealing directly and specifically with "tie-in" operations and bald attempts to achieve a limited monopoly of unpatented materials, and by analogy make them apply to the limited, peculiar and wholly different facts of this case. The law and the facts in those cases cannot and should not be made into a drag-net which sweeps this case into their various orbits.

I agree with the experienced trial judge in this case whose findings were that the challenged license provisions were lawful ones; that they were not designed and fashioned to accomplish unlawful purposes, and that under them, the parties did not accom-

[1] Another contention further revealing the real basis of appellant's case is as follows: "Where the patent owner, as here, attaches to its license agreement any terms or conditions whereby the licensee is obliged not to do something which it [licensee] would have a free right to do, but for the license, it is evident that the restraint on the licensee is outside the patent monopoly and results from the agreement. The fact [here relying on the Mercoid case] that the patentee has the power to refuse a license does not enable him [patentee] to enlarge the monopoly of the patent by the expedient of attaching conditions to its use."

The foregoing argument of appellant cannot be sustained (on the theory that the restraint on Baash "enlarges" the monopoly of the Kammerer patent) unless this court completely ignores the holding in the General Electric case which is absolutely to the contrary.

McCullough insists that the license agreement in this case is objectionable, when measured by the Mercoid case, even though the royalty in that case was based on an unpatented part.

One of them ajor complaints of appellant in this case is that the license agreement is illegal because Kammerer and Baash never sold the patented tool. Cases condemning price restrictions and/or resale prices are not applicable here.

The system of renting the use of "fishing tools" when they are needed has long been the recognized method by which oil well drilling operators have economically availed themselves of the use of sundry "fishing tools"—a practice which made it unnecessary for these drillers to purchase a large stock of various sized tools which would probably be very expensive. Appellees maintained a service operation and a corps of expert operators who could take care of emergency requirements of the oil industry at any time, day or night.

[2] Scott Paper Co. v. Marcalus Co., 326 U. S. 249, is cited as supporting the views expressed in the prevailing opinion. Its bearing upon the issue we face is not apparent.

plish, or attempt to accomplish, unlawful purposes. I agree with him that the agreement did not authorize or purport to authorize monopolistic practices which transcend the orbit and scope of the Kammerer patent and the permissible range of "rights" which may lawfully be exercised by the parties to such a patent license.

Other practical matters deserve attention. Kammerer did not "withdraw" from "competition" in its "field." The admitted fact is before us that Kammerer never had a field of operations and it never competed, or attempted to compete with any one. It was apparently a "paper corporation" expressly created for the one and only purpose of holding the Kammerer patent or patents here involved—it was not, and never was, a manufacturing and/or selling company.

Another aspect of this case presents itself. For all this court knows, there may have been dozens of (patented and unpatented) pipe cutting devices on the market all available to oil well operators all over the world. That this is assumed by the court appears from its conclusion that competitors of the Kammerer tool were "discouraged" because the Kammerer tool had supplanted these competitive tools in general use.

Such considerations suggest pertinent inquiries. How does this agreement, on its face, purge, or tend to purge, the market of all such competing devices (as in the Lockwasher case, supra)? Where in the contract are the provisions, which in themselves, would actually create an unlawful monopoly in a business field? The court postulates the existence of an illegal "monopoly" by an inference arising solely from the face of the agreement—not from the evidence in the case. It has to assume the existence of some competition which was illegally restrained and/or suppressed by means of the Kammerer-Baash agreement. If actual or potential competition was not restrained or suppressed by the Kammerer-Baash agreement, why strike down the agreement? Actual legal restraint or suppression of competition, as a fact in this case, has not been established by evidence. For some reason which I think lacks pertinence, my associates stress the fact that the licensee was described as "a very large company." In one year it did a service business of $212,700 in eleven states, or an average collection of approximately $19,272 from users of its tool in each of these eleven states. If this is thought to be persuasive of anything, the answer is that unless the facts in this case demonstrate that appellees were operating outside the four corners of our patent and antitrust laws in the securing and enjoyment of this service business, the size of their business is without legal significance, as I shall endeavor to demonstrate in this dissent.

In its opinion the court comments on one finding of the trial court in the former injunction hearing in this action where the issue presented was that of patent infringement by appellant with an added claim by appellees for damages and an accounting. Speaking of this finding this court says:

> "The district court found * * * that the licensee had a monopoly of the field of pipe cutting in the United States, all other cutters being supplanted by the cutter of which it had the patent monopoly."

To the foregoing comment this court adds:

> "Nothing could more discourage inventors or manufacturers of better competitive cutters than to take from them the patronage of the only person then using or cutting with the only device used in cutting broken pipe in all the oil fields * * *." (Italics supplied.)

There is nothing in the foregoing comments of the court which demonstrates in any manner that the size of appellees' pipe cutting operations was illegal per se, or was the result of illegal practices of appellees which restrained or suppressed competition. Therefore, I conclude that the court is of the view that appellees, as a matter of law, became authors and operators of an illegal monopoly merely because their superior tool was so popular with users of such a device that they refused to use other cutters.

The court lays emphasis on the fact that inventors or manufacturers of (other) better competitive cutters became discouraged over this competitive situation since it served to take from them the patronage of persons using such devices. What is legally or morally wrong in acquiring business in great volume if the process of acquisition is wholly within the law? Since when has popularity of a product become a crime? In this case, the large volume of business flowing to appellees may have "discouraged" the "inventors or manufacturers of better competitive cutters," but this was the natural and inevitable result of offering a superior tool to users. How does the "discouragement" of these competitors, arising from their inability to retain trade going to a superior product, become a violation of law or involve any aspect of "public policy"?

There is a queer absence of realism in the court's conclusion despite its reliance on the finding of the district court in the infringement action. In that action the court found:

> "There is nothing in the prior art akin to the manner in which the elements are combined in the patent in suit. The outside cutters of the Reilly and Stone Patent No. 1,625,391 is a tool which has, with great commercial success over a long period of years, produced a better result and has achieved results not attained by any prior device known to the art.
> "That since the introduction of the device of the patent in suit to the oil industry by plaintiff, Baash Ross Tool Company, and its predecessor in interest, L. F. Baash Perforating Company, said device has displaced all prior devices in cutting and removing frozen or stuck drill pipe and tubing from wells."

It is in the second of these findings that my associates find such gloomy significance, but all that can possibly be tortured or squeezed out of its language is the conclusion that (despite the "better competitive cutters") the superior Kammerer tool so captured public approval that it supplanted and displaced what the using public must have regarded as inferior devices being offered. On the face of the whole record in this case, that is exactly what happened, and such an achievement does not violate either the letter or the spirit of our patent laws. These laws do not deprive men of the right freely to select the things they prefer to use. If we hold that this is the effect of these laws, the results on business in this circuit would be unpredictable. If national advertisers who spend millions of dollars in various forms of advertising to secure universal use of their products (protected by patents or trademarks) succeeded in securing such use by those lawful methods, we would, under the doctrine we announce, be forced to declare them law violators despite the wish and election of the buying public exclusively to use such products.

For the reason just stated, I am unwilling to translate such a legal and perfectly understandable capture of the pipe cutting business by a superior tool into an illegal operation which threatens "public interest". Is it the view of the court that it possesses the power to compel oil well operators to use or prefer an inferior device, or that it should try to force inferior and unwanted devices into a favorable competitive position with a superior product? Does it conclude that it must deprive appellees of a legal right to an accounting for damages due to infringement, merely because the infringing appellant or others unnamed could not successfully compete with the superior Kammerer tool? Yet that seems to be the objective of the decision in this case.

Our decision says that "the contention is entirely irrelevant that neither party was harmed by the agreement." For reasons I indicate in this dissent I think that absence of harm to appellant from the existence of, and operations under, the license agreement, is a matter of supreme importance in this case. The court passes to an issue which I think is not in this case—the issue of "public interest" and makes the decision turn on that point. It reads into the term "public interest" a new and very astounding meaning. It concludes that the sweeping popularity of the Kammerer tool and its claimed universal and voluntary use by oil well men is a form of "monopoly" which, ipso facto, is against "public interest;" because these oil well men refused to use other devices, this free and very normal expression of their preference for a superior tool, outrages "public interest." No case is cited which sustains this astounding theory and a sense of humor, if nothing else, should remind us of the truth of the old saw about a pathway being beaten to the door of the man who invents a better mouse trap.

The patented tool of appellees did not deprive either the public or appellant of anything they enjoyed prior to its invention. It gave something of value to the community by adding to the sum of human knowledge. It embodied elements (recognized by courts passing on the validity of the patent) entirely unknown to the prior art. Small wonder that oil well operators immediately put it into general use since it provided a satisfactory solution of their vexing mechanical problems.

But this court sees in this universal popularity and wide use of a new and efficient tool, a sinister attack upon "public interest". It refuses to recognize that this popularity and wide use was a perfectly logical (and legal) reward for inventing a superior and efficient device theretofore unknown in its field of use. The widespread and voluntary use by oil well operators seems to mean nothing to the court—it blinds itself to the obvious fact that the only kind of "public interest" involved in this case was that shown by men seeking a better pipe cutting tool. They found it in the Kammerer tool.

The evidence we face completely fails to demonstrate that (1) the practices of appellees contravened public interest, (2) stifled new competitive invention, (3) suppressed competitive forces which stimulate newer and better products. Since appellant demands that we deny to appellees the relief they seek in this court because their damage claim is tainted with illegality, it is in order to demonstrate by the record that appellees did not "stifle" or "discourage" any real inventive genius of appellant. (Reference in the court's opinion to others whose inventive genius may have been "stifled," is too vague to justify comment.) Appellees did not harm him; he was the author of his own business misfortunes and we should not charge them to appellees by a process of indirection.

How appellant worked his own undoing is an interesting story and it is accurately reported in the opinion and findings of the trial court on the original infringement suit. One finding (now binding on this court) reads as follows:

> "Defendant, Ira J. McCullough, acquired his knowledge of outside cutters while in the employ of plaintiff, Baash Ross Tool Company. Defendant left the employ of Baash Ross Tool Company and commenced working on outside cutters and applied for United States Letters Patent thereon. Defendant knew the Reilly and Stone Patent in suit when he designed and made outside pipe cutters like the devices shown in Defendant's Exhibit C., and Defendants' Exhibit D. Both of these devices have all of the elements of the combination in the same cooperative relationship, and accomplish the same result in the same way as does the device of the patent in suit."

In its Opinion in that case the trial court said:

> "* * * The background of the defendant, Ira J. McCullough, shows the acquisition of knowledge in the art in the employ of one of the plaintiffs, the Baash-Ross Tool Company. The device manufactured is, in all respects, similar to the device of the plaintiffs.
> "* * * The defendant, Ira J. McCullough, having learned the art in the employ of one of the plaintiffs, who manufactured this device for many years, both under the patent in suit and the Kammerer patents, cannot escape the penalties of infringement by manufacturing, according to the teachings of the patent, a device which, while containing all the elements of the claims in suit, operates in a manner which, although not used by the plaintiffs in their device, is claimed and taught by the patent."

So it plainly appears that appellant did not exercise his "inventive genius"—he did not stoutly resist wicked efforts of appellees to crush some "competitive force" within him which might have inspired and stimulated him to invent a tool far superior to the Kammerer tool. On the contrary he busied himself in the work of preserving and promoting his own special brand of "free enterprise" by calmly appropriating another man's original and patented idea.

No wonder the court hastens to assure us that the fact that "neither party was harmed" by the Kammerer-Baash license agreement is 'irrelevant." On this record it faced an impossible task in trying to show that appellees had harmed appellant. The shoe was on the other foot. I suggest that "public interest" would have been served in an admirable manner had appellant found in the Kammerer tool a great inspiration to invent a much superior device and then succeeded in doing it. In that event he would surely have placed himself firmly in the favorable business position occupied by appellees. I resist the temptation to speculate on what our attitude might be if that sort of a reversed situation had developed and appellant's present contentions were then presented to us by appellees.

At this point I emphasize the fact that the cases cited in the court's opinion do not justify the conclusion it reaches. One of these is Pope v. Gormully, supra, which was characterized by the court as "rare and unique," and difficult to assign to a proper place among legal obligations. Obligations there imposed upon a licensee appear to have been projected beyond the term of the license. The court narrowed the justiciable issue by this language: "* * * the real issue is whether the defendant [licensee] can estop himself from disputing patents which may be wholly void, or to which the plaintiff [licensor] may have no shadow of title."

In this case the court was considering an abuse of the licensee—a situation not factually or legally comparable to, or even claimed to exist, in the case at bar. While some language is dredged up from the Pope case to justify this court's opinion, the Court there was dealing with a license agreement (declared to be) so oppressive to the licensee that a court of equity was justified in refusing relief to the licensor plaintiff. The Court indicated that the agreement would probably foreclose the licensee from ability to earn an honest living in his chosen calling. Much of the Court's comment deals with fundamental rights of a licensee which, as a matter of public policy, may not lawfully be bartered away. The case did not decide the issue we face and its force as authority is not apparent.

The logic of the Blount case, 166 Fed. 555 (1909) does not weaken appellees' case. There two manufacturers, each with a patented invention, agreed not to compete—a factual situation absent in the case at bar. It lacks pertinence in a case such as we face. The issues we confront are within the orbit of the General Electric case. See Daniels v. Brown Shoe Co., 77 F. 2d 899 and Bement & Sons v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70.

The distinction between the facts in this case and those in the Lockwasher case, supra, is very marked. That case involved a contractual combination embracing at least six manufacturing concerns all coldly bent upon the creation of a stifling monopoly in an entire field which (under the facts disclosed at trial) was deliberately fashioned and designed to purge the entire market of competition. No such design, purpose, ability or attempt to monopolize and to "purge" the market of all or any competitors was shown in this case. Here the findings of the trial court indicate the exact contrary to be true. In fact, the findings and conclusions (supported by the evidence) repel the charge and the conclusion that the business operations of appellees were monopolistic in character, or were designed to, or achieved results of that nature.

It is easy to marshal an imposing array of cases which proclaim the mournful fact that the "monopoly" of the patent grant was abused by business practices shown in those cases. The cases cited by the instant opinion generally fall into this category. I think that they lend no weight to the conclusion we reach since they deal with factual situations not even distantly related to the facts in this case. In the instant case, the facts are shunted into the de minimis class. I think that it will be found that in practically all of these cases, the courts immediately came to grips with the facts, and the logic of this sort of approach is apparent. One excellent reason lies in the fact that no rule has yet been devised by the wit of courts which could be applied to all factual situations. Obviously this calls for a careful delineation of the facts against which even a well recognized rule should be applied.

In the instant case appellees first vigorously denied that their agreement reveals an intent to project their business practices beyond the lawful orbit of the patent grant, a contention I approve and to which the trial court agreed after a full hearing on the merits. The trial court also inquired into the practices of appellees under their agreement and determined that these did not circumvent anti-trust and/or patent laws.

This court says that the language in two or more provisions of the Kammerer-Baash license agreement is sufficient in itself to void the agreement as "contrary to public policy." Our opinion portrays "public policy" as a legal principle which necessarily calls for condemnation of the license agreement despite the absence of proof therein that the business practices of appellees harmed the business practices of appellant. This sort of condemnation, without any showing of actual injury, resulting from illegal practices, is a novel application of a wholesome principle of law designed by society to prevent the doing of legal injury to others.

Since reference has been made to the findings of the trial court, I call attention to the fact that our court rules require that specifications of error in findings and conclusions "shall state" wherein they are alleged to be erroneous. Appellant presents no such specifications of error nor does he make reference to the findings in the statement of points he relies upon. All we have from appellant is the (here summarized) assertion that the district court erred: (1) in holding that license agreement does not contain restrictive covenants which are against public policy, in restraint of trade and illegal; (2) in holding that plaintiffs are not barred from using a court of equity to enforce the patent grant; (3) in holding that plaintiffs are entitled to an accounting and a recovery of profits and damages; and (4) in denying all plaintiff's motions and entering the Order of June 5, 1945 appealed from herein. On the record before us McCullough does not attack the findings as being erroneous or contrary to or not fully supported by the record.

The trial court correctly disposed of the issues presented on the accounting and its judgment should be affirmed.

[¶ 62,232] Abraham Blum, Trading Under the Firm Name of Ben's Cut Rate Drug Store v. Benjamin Engelman and David Engelman, Trading Under the Firm Name of M. Engelman & Sons.

In the Court of Appeals of Maryland. No. 86, October Term, 1947. Filed February 25, 1948.

Maryland Unfair Sales Act

Sales Below Cost — Unfair Competition — Constitutionality of Unfair Sales Act.— On appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to a bill of complaint by a cigarette retailer to enjoin a competitor from selling certain brands of cigarettes at less than cost, it is held that a demurrer to the bill was properly overruled. The Act, which prohibits sales below cost to the retailer with intent to injure a competitor or to destroy competition, and which contains no penal provision, but provides for injunctive relief, promotes a policy within the police power of the state, and does not contravene the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution or Article 23 of the Maryland Declaration of Rights. Within the limitations imposed by the requirements that the means adopted must not be unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious, and must have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained, the state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, whether by promoting free competition by statutes aimed at monopolies or by curbing harmful competition by fixing minimum prices.

See the Maryland Unfair Sales Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8368.03.

Affirming the order of the Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,590.

For appellant: Herbert H. Rosenbaum.

For appellees: Lawrence B. Fenneman.

[Nature of Action]

DELAPLAINE, J.: The purpose of this suit is to restrain violation of the Unfair Sales Act of Maryland, and the constitutionality of the Act has been challenged. Laws of 1941, ch. 330, Laws of 1943, ch. 803, Code Supp. 1943, art. 83, secs. 111-115.

The suit was instituted in Circuit Court No. 2 of Baltimore City by Benjamin Engelman and David Engelman trading as M. Engelman & Sons, who have been selling cigarettes at retail at 27 North Howard Street. They alleged in their bill of complaint that Abraham Blum, trading as Ben's Cut Rate Store at 305 North Eutaw Street, has been selling Camel, Chesterfield, Lucky Strike and Old Gold Cigarettes at $1.43 per carton, while the cost of these brands to him was $1.54. They further alleged that he has been selling below cost with intent to injure them and destroy competition. They prayed that he be enjoined from selling cigarettes at less than cost, as defined by the Unfair Sales Act.

Defendant demurred to the bill on the ground that the Act places upon a lawful occupation unusual restrictions which arbitrarily interfere with private business, and hence the Act violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and Article 23 of the Maryland Declaration of Rights. The chancellor overruled the demurrer, and defendant appealed from that order.

[Unfair Sales Act]

The Unfair Sales Act, like the Fair Trade Act, is aimed at price-cutting. The Fair Trade Act is said to have grown out of a contest of small retailers and independent wholesalers against a practice of chain stores and large department stores of cutting prices on nationally advertised products in order to attract customers with the object of selling them other merchandise along with the "loss leaders." In 1939 the constitutionality of the Maryland Fair Trade Act (Laws of 1937, ch. 239, Code 1939, art. 83, secs. 102-110) was challenged, but the Court of Appeals held it constitutional and enforceable. Goldsmith v. Mead Johnson & Co., 176 Md. 682, 7 A. 2d 176, 125 A. L. R. 1339.

The first Unfair Sales Act in Maryland took effect on June 1, 1937. Laws of 1937, ch. 211. The Act was repealed and superseded by another Act two years later. Laws of 1939, ch. 248. The Act of 1939 made an offer to sell or sale of merchandise at less than cost a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $500. The Act also gave to any aggrieved dealer the right to obtain an injunction to restrain a violation or threatened violation thereof. In 1940 the Court of Appeals held the Act unconstitutional. Daniel Loughran Co. v. Lord Baltimore Candy & Tobacco Co., 178 Md. 38, 52, 12 A. 2d 201.

[Earlier Law Unconstitutional]

The 1939 Act was annulled on account of two provisions. One of these provisions was to the effect that sales "at prices which cannot be justified by existing market conditions" should not be used as a basis for computing costs. Laws of 1939, ch. 248, sec. 115 (d). This provision required a dealer to make a survey of "existing market conditions," and thereupon determine whether such conditions justified a certain price, and from that price the cost was to be computed. The dealer's computation was not conclusive, and accordingly if his analysis of "existing market conditions" was not correct, and it was determined in a judicial proceeding that the conditions did not justify the price, then, even though he honestly believed that his survey justified that price, his computation would be rejected, and he would stand as a violator of the law.

The other provision made it unlawful to offer for sale or sell any merchandise at less than cost "with the intent, effect or result of unfairly diverting trade from or otherwise injuring a competitor." Laws of 1939, ch. 248, sec. 116. That provision failed to provide a definite standard by which the dealer could ascertain whether he was complying with the law, because it was impossible to know whether a sale would have the "effect or result" of injuring a competitor somewhere within the State. The Act violated the rule that the application of a penal statute or the right to injunctive relief should not be a matter of uncertainty and conjecture. It is well settled that a statute which prohibits the doing of an act in terms so vague that persons of ordinary intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the constitutional guarantee of due process of law. State v. Magaha, 182 Md. 122, 32 A. 2d 477. The Act of 1939 did not provide a reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt, and thus was not sufficiently explicit to enable a person of ordinary intelligence to ascertain with a fair degree of certainty what sales it intended to prohibit.

In 1941 the Legislature repealed the 1939 Act and passed the existing Act. Laws of 1941, ch. 330. The 1941 Act corrected both of the defects. In the first place, Section 112 definitely defines "cost to the retailer" as the invoice price of the merchandise or the replacement cost, whichever is lower, less all trade discounts except customary discounts for cash, to which shall be added (1) freight charges not otherwise included in the invoice or replacement cost, (2) cartage to the retail outlet if performed or paid for by the retailer, and (3) a mark-up to cover in part the cost of doing business, which mark-up, in the absence of proof of a lesser cost, shall be 5 per cent of the cost to the retailer, after adding thereto freight charges and cartage, but before adding thereto the mark-up. Section 112 also definitely defines "cost to wholesaler." Section 112 was repealed and reenacted with amendments in 1943, but the definitions of "cost to retailer" and "cost to wholesaler" remain definite. In the second place, the 1941 Act omitted the words "effect or result." Section 113 provides that no dealer shall sell or offer to sell at less than cost "with intent to injure a competitor or destroy any competition."

[Laws of Other States]

Various Unfair Sales Acts have been enacted in other States. Some of these Acts have been held void for one reason or another. The Pennsylvania and New Jersey Acts were invalidated for the reason that they did not include intent to injure a competitor as an element of the offense. Commonwealth v. Zasloff, 338 Pa. 457, 13 A. 2d 67, 70; State v. Packard-Bamberger & Co., 123 N. J. L. 180, 8 A. 2d 291. But most of the Acts in other States have been sustained. Carroll v. Schwartz, Conn., 14 A. 2d 754; Moore v. Northern Kentucky Independent Food Dealers Ass'n, 268 Ky. 24, 149 S. W. 2d 755; Rust v. Griggs, 172 Tenn. 565, 113 S. W. 2d 733; McElhone v. Geror, Minn. 292 N. W. 414; Associated Merchants of Montana v. Ormesher, 107 Mont. 503, 86 P. 2d 1031; State v. Langley, 53 Wyo. 332, 84 P. 2d 767; Dikeou v. Food Distributors Ass'n, Col., 108 P. 2d 529; Arizona v. Walgreen, Ariz., 113 P. 2d 650; Wholesale Tobacco Dealers Bureau v. National Candy & Tobacco Co., 11 Cal. 2d 634, 82 P. 2d 3, 118 A. L. R. 486; Washington v. Sears, 2 Wash. 2d 200, 103 P. 2d 337.

[Present Law Upheld]

The Maryland Act no longer contains a penal provision. Nor does it apply to sales or offers to sell in any of the following cases: (1) where merchandise is sold in bona fide clearance sales, if advertised, marked, and sold as such; (2) where merchandise must be sold promptly in order to forestall loss; (3) where merchandise is imperfect or damaged, or is being discontinued, and is advertised, marked and sold as such; (4) where merchandise is sold upon final liquidation of any business; (5) where merchandise is sold for charitable purposes or to relief agencies; (6) where merchandise is sold on contract to governmental institutions; (7) where merchandise is sold by any officer acting under the order or direction of any court; and (8) where the price of the merchandise is made in good faith to meet competition. The Connecticut Act closely resembles the Maryland Act, and the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut sustained the constitutionality of the Act in an opinion which is carefully limited to the question now presented and distinguishes different Acts and different questions not actually presented. Carroll v. Schwartz, Conn., 14 A. 2d 754.

It is acknowledged that price-cutting is not an evil in itself. On the contrary, the more intense the competition the greater the likelihood of advantage to the buying public. In fact, there is no reason why a merchant under ordinary circumstances should not have the right to make an absolute gift to his customers if he desires to show generosity or advertise his business. It is only when the object of price-cutting is sinister that the sale of goods at less than cost may constitute an economic evil. Freedom of contract is subject to legislative regulation in the interest of public health, safety, morals or welfare. But such legislation must not be unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, and the means selected must have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained. Within these limitations the State is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, whether by promoting free competition by statutes aimed at monopolies or by curbing harmful competition by fixing minimum prices. Daniel Loughran Co. v. Lord Baltimore Candy & Tobacco Co., 178 Md. 38, 44, 12 A. 2d 201. It is our conclusion that the Unfair Sales Act, prohibiting sales below cost with intent to injure competitors and to destroy competition, promotes a policy within the police power of the State.

Section 113 of the Act contains a provision that evidence of any advertisement, offer to sell or sale of any item of merchandise by any retailer or wholesaler at less than cost to him shall be prima facie evidence of intent to injure a competitior or destroy competition. No question of the validity of this provision is now before us, as the present appeal is from an order overruling a demurrer. If this provision should be held to deny due process, it would not invalidate the rest of the Act, as the provision is procedural in its nature and is separable from the other provisions.

[Order Affirmed]

As we find nothing on this appeal in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution or Article 23 of the Maryland Declaration of Rights, we affirm the order overruling the demurrer.

Order affirmed and cause remanded, with costs.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division. Civil Action No. 24188. March 25, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Price Fixing—Surrender of Patent Rights Used to Control Industry.—Consent judgments entered in a civil action charging five corporations and six of their officers with conspiring to restrain and monopolize, and monopolization of, the duplicating equipment industry, in violation of the Sherman Act, enjoins the defendants from fixing prices, dividing markets, allocating territories, interfering with imports and exports, or discriminating against any stencil manufacturer. A defendant is required to dedicate its trademark "Mimeograph" to the public, to refrain, for a period of five years, from operating retail sales branches, to refrain, for a period of fifteen years, from acquiring any interest in any concern engaged in the manufacture or sale of stencil duplicating machines or stencil supplies, is enjoined from enforcing any judgment obtained by its patent infringement suits, and is required to disclose a secret process for the manufacture of stencils, and to dedicate a number of patents to the public. Other corporate defendants holding significant patents relating to the manufacture of stencil tissue are enjoined from enforcing those patents.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.251, 1590.

Final Judgment Against A. B. Dick Company, The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., A. B. Dick, Jr., and Edison Dick

The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on July 22, 1946; the undersigned defendants having appeared and severally filed their answers to such complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; the undersigned defendants by their attorneys herein having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment herein without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and without admission by any party in respect of any such issue;

Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of law or fact herein, and upon consent of the undersigned parties, it is hereby Ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

That this Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the undersigned parties; and that the complaint states a cause of action against these defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", as amended.

II

A. A. B. Dick Company, an Illinois corporation, shall be sometimes hereinafter referred to as "Dick". The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., a Canadian corporation, shall be sometimes hereinafter referred to as "Mimeograph, Ltd.".

B. The provisions of this judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to such defendant and each of its officers and directors and subsidiaries, and to each of its or his agents, employees, successors and assigns, and to each person acting, or claiming to act under, through or for them or any of them.

III

[Agreements and Practices Enjoined]

The defendants, A. B. Dick Company, The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., A. B. Dick, Jr. and Edison Dick are hereby jointly and severally enjoined and restrained:

1. From entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering or enforcing any contract, agreement, understanding, undertaking, plan or program with any manufacturer or distributor of, or with any person with respect to the manufacture or distribution of, stencil duplicating machines, stencils, or stencil duplicating supplies, providing for, or for the purpose or having the effect of:

(a) dividing sales or manufacturing territories;

(b) allocating markets among manufacturers or for the products of different manufacturers;

(c) limiting or preventing exports or imports;

(d) limiting production through quotas or otherwise;

(e) allowing any third person to sell without competition in any market;

(f) keeping any third party out of any market, or restricting access by any third party to any market;

(g) allocating customers;

(h) allocating sales or purchase quotas among manufacturers or for the products of different manufacturers.

2. From entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering or enforcing any contract, agreement, undertaking, plan or program with any manufacturer or distributor of, or with any person with respect to the manufacture or distribution of, stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, providing for, or for the purpose or having the effect of, fixing, determining, maintaining or adhering to the prices to be charged others for such products, or fixing, determining, maintaining or adhering to any terms of distribution or sale of any such products to or by others, provided that nothing in this clause 2 of Section III shall be deemed to enjoin or restrain said defendants from availing themselves of the benefit of the Act of August 17, 1937, C. 690, 50 Stat. 693 (Miller-Tydings Act).

3. From entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering or enforcing any contract, agreement, undertaking or plan or program with any producer or distributor of, or with any person with respect to the production or distribution of, raw materials used or useful in the production of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies providing for, or for the purpose of (a) fixing, determining, maintaining, or adhering to prices charged to or required of others for such raw materials, or (b) fixing, determining, maintaining or adhering to any terms of distribution or sale to or by others of any such products or materials, or (c) fixing, determining, maintaining, or adhering to the quality of any such products supplied to others, or (d) preventing or hindering manufacturers of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies from obtaining raw materials.

4. From suppressing or attempting to suppress evidence as to the validity or invalidity of any patent or patent application relating to stencil duplicating machines, stencils, raw materials, or stencil duplicating supplies.

5. From attempting to acquire or acquiring details of the business of other manufacturers of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies other than in the regular course of business.

6. From selling, leasing, or contracting to sell or lease, any stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies at discriminatory or unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating any competitor.

7. From refusing to sell upon non-discriminatory terms and conditions to any person any repair or replacement parts for Dick stencil duplicating machines, which are available to any distributor or to any user of Dick machines, or to any other person.

8. From (a) discriminating or threatening to discriminate, in any manner, in the availability or furnishing of repair or maintenance services, or in the entering into or performance of repair or maintenance contracts with any stencil duplicating machine owner or user, on the ground that stencils or stencil duplicating supplies manufactured by others than Dick are used on said machines; and from (b) preventing, or attempting to prevent, manufacturers or distributors of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies from soliciting business through public advertising media; and from (c) conditioning the leasing, selling, contracting to sell or making available of any stencil duplicating machines, stencils, stencil duplicating supplies, machines, or processes for the manufacture thereof, or methods or techniques of operation of such machines or processes, by any provision, express or implied, that the lessee, purchaser or other contracting party shall use any or all other stencil duplicating machines, stencils, stencil duplicating supplies, machines or processes for the manufacture thereof, or methods or techniques of operation thereof, manufactured or controlled by Dick or by any other designated source.

9. From acquiring, within fifteen years from the date of the entry of this judgment, either in whole or in part, either directly or indirectly, any shares of stock in, or assets of, or any other interest in, any existing or future corporation, partnership or individual business, which is engaged in the manufacture or sale of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, provided, that nothing in this clause 9 of Section III shall be deemed to enjoin or restrain any lawful corporate reorganization involving only Dick, or its subsidiaries, or both. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to addressing machines and supplies for such machines if, upon notice and hearing, defendants establish to the satisfaction of the Court that their acquisition of such an addressing machine business or any interest therein would not materially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

10. From maintaining, or for a period of seven years from the date of the entry of this judgment from acquiring, obtaining or securing any exclusive license under any patent relating to the manufacture or use of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies.

11. From instituting, maintaining or furthering, or threatening to institute, maintain or further, any claim, suit or proceeding:

(a) for the purpose of enforcing any existing injunction prohibiting any person other than Dick from engaging in the manufacture or distribution of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, or

(b) for the purpose of collecting any royalties, charges, damages or judgment, or for the purpose of enforcing or securing injunctive relief (1) on account of infringement of, or under the designation, "Mimeograph", or (2) on account of infringement of, or under, any patent now or heretofore owned or controlled by Dick relating to stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies.

12. From enforcing, or attempting or threatening to enforce, any rights:

(a) under existing United States or foreign patents owned or controlled by said defendants, or

(b) under any United States or foreign patent supplementary to and dependent on said patents which may issue to or be owned or controlled by said defendants or any of them within a period of ten years from the date of the entry of this judgment, or

(c) under the designation "Mimeograph", to prevent the sale, importation or use of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies made in any other country in or into the United States, or to prevent the sale, importation or use of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies made in the United States into any other country.

13. From

(a) cancelling, or threatening to cancel, any dealer or distributor contract or arrangement, or

(b) in any way discriminating against any dealer or distributor, or

(c) using any quota or other system, for the purpose of preventing or attempting to prevent a dealer or distributor from dealing in stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies manufactured by others than Dick, or coercing or attempting to coerce a dealer or distributor to cease dealing in any such product.

14. From entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering or enforcing any contract, agreement, understanding, undertaking or plan or program with any dealer or distributor of Dick stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, which forecloses any such dealer or distributor from selling or attempting to sell to any purchaser or prospective purchaser.

15. From coercing, or attempting to coerce, directly or indirectly, any user of a stencil duplicating machine to use Dick stencils or Dick stencil duplicating supplies instead of the stencils or stencil duplicating supplies manufactured by others than Dick, by any unfair means including, without limitation, jimmying, tampering with or interfering with the proper operation of any stencil duplicating machine, or making knowingly false statements with respect to any stencil duplicating machines, stencils, stencil duplicating supplies or any manufacturer or distributor thereof.

16. From suggesting to, urging, instructing or coercing any person to jimmy, tamper with or interfere with the proper operation of any stencil duplicating machine, or make knowingly false statements with respect to any stencil duplicating machines, stencils, stencil duplicating supplies or any manufacturer or distributor thereof.

[Practices Permitted]

Nothing in clauses 1 (a) or 1 (f) of Section III shall be deemed to enjoin either Dick or Mimeograph, Ltd., from granting to dealers or distributors of Dick stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, preferential selling or distribution rights for such products in designated territories, provided, however, that this Section IV shall not be deemed to determine, adjudicate or affect the legality or illegality of any grant of preferential sale or distribution rights, and provided further that such grants do not involve and are not associated with any agreement, arrangement or understanding with a dealer or distributor relating to products or commodities manufactured by or secured from any person other than Dick or Mimeograph, Ltd.

V

[Dedication of Patents]

The defendants A. B. Dick Company, The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., A. B. Dick, Jr., and Edison Dick are hereby jointly and severally ordered and directed:

1. Forthwith to take such steps as may be necessary to dedicate, transfer and assign to the public (including defendant A. B. Dick Company) all United States Letters Patent, and applications for Letters Patent owned or controlled by said defendants on the date of the entry of this judgment, reading on or claiming stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies or raw materials or reading on or claiming any processor methods for making stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, including, but not limited to the following:

and to furnish to each applicant therefor a non-exclusive, unconditional and unrestricted license without payment of royalty or other compensation on any patent supplementary to and dependent on said patents which may issue to or be owned or controlled by them or any of them within a period of ten years from the date of the entry of this judgment.

2. To furnish to any applicant making written application therefor at any time during the statutory life of any of the patents referred to in clause 1 of this Section V, a written manual describing the methods and processes used by these defendants, or any of them, as of the date of the application, in their commercial practice of the inventions described in said patents in the manufacture of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies.

VI

[Specifications to Be Made Available]

The defendant A. B. Dick Company is hereby ordered and directed to furnish, upon the payment of the reproduction cost of the descriptive material at Chicago, Illinois, to any applicant making written application therefor within five years from the date of the entry of this judgment, the plans and specifications as of the date of the application for all machines for the production of duplicating stencils by the web manufacturing process (known as the Wheel Machines), including any and all drawings and patterns utilized by Dick in the building of such machines or in their operation.

Defendant A. B. Dick Company is hereby ordered and directed:

1. To take within six months such steps as may be necessary in the United States Patent Office to dedicate, transfer and assign to the public (including defendant A. B. Dick Company) without payment of any compensation whatever therefor the trademark "Mimeograph"; and to take such further steps as may become necessary to dedicate, transfer and assign to the public (including defendant A. B. Dick Company) without payment of any compensation whatever therefor the trademark "Mimeograph" in countries other than the United States.

2. To discontinue and disestablish, within eighteen months from the date of the entry of this judgment, each of its branch offices in the United States now engaged in the sale of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies, and to open no new or different branch offices for such sales for a period of five years from the date upon which the last such branch office is closed.

3. During the period its branch offices must be discontinued as provided in clause 2, to sell its stencil duplicating machines, stencils and stencil duplicating supplies in the United States only through independent dealers or distributors, except that the sales of such products to governments or government institutions may be made directly by defendant Dick, and sales only of stencils and stencil duplicating supplies to customers who have establishments and may purchase on an annual arrangement for use in three or more states may be made directly by Dick. Sales of repair or replacement parts for Dick machines which are available to any person shall be sold directly by Dick to any other person on request therefor.

4. To require its dealers and distributors to refrain from any of the following practices by reserving expressly in its agreements with each of its dealers and distributors the power, and after due warning exercising the power, to terminate on 30 days' notice the dealership or distributorship of any dealer or distributor who shall:

(a) discriminate, or threaten to discriminate, in any manner, in the repair or maintenance, or in the entering into of repair or maintenance contracts, with any Dick stencil duplicating machine owner or user on the ground that stencils or stencil duplicating supplies manufactured by others than Dick are used on said machines;

(b) coerce, or attempt to coerce any user of a stencil duplicating machine to use Dick stencils or stencil duplicating supplies rather than the stencils or stencil duplicating supplies of other manufacturers, by any unfair means including, without limitation, jimmying, tampering with or interfering with the proper operation of a stencil duplicating machine, or by making knowingly false statements;

(c) suggest to, urge, instruct or coerce any person to jimmy, tamper with or interfere with the proper operation of any stencil duplicating machine, or make knowingly false statements with respect to any stencil duplicating machines, stencils, stencil duplicating supplies or any manufacturer or distributor thereof;

(d) refuse to sell upon non-discriminatory terms and conditions to any person any repair or replacement parts for Dick machines which are available through said dealer or distributor to any distributor or user of Dick machines or to any other person.

5. To state in its advertising literature and otherwise in a manner appropriate to notify the purchaser or prospective purchaser of any Dick stencil duplicating machine, stencil or stencil duplicating supply being sold or offered for sale by Dick or its distributors or dealers at the time of entry of this judgment that said product is not designed primarily for use with other Dick stencil duplicating products; and to make similar statements, to the extent that such is the fact, regarding any Dick stencil duplicating machine, stencil or stencil duplicating supply thereafter being sold or offered for sale by Dick or its distributors or dealers.

6. The provisions of clause 4 of this section VII shall apply to any agreement between Dick and its dealers and distributors hereafter executed, renewed or extended, and Dick shall within six months from the date of the entry of this judgment revise all of its existing agreements with its dealers and distributors to bring them into conformity with the provisions of clause 4 of this section VII.

7. Defendants shall forthwith take such steps as may be necessary and appropriate to bring them into full compliance with clause 5 of this section VII not later than six months from the date of the entry of this judgment.

VIII

[Terms Defined]

As used in this judgment, the following words and phrases shall mean:

"Stencil duplicating" means the art of reproducing written, typewritten or other matter by means of a stencil on which the letters or designs to be reproduced are inscribed by removing portions of the coating, thus exposing the porous base sheet and permitting ink to pass through the stencil to form the letters or designs upon a sheet of blank paper placed in momentary contact with the stencil.

"Stencil" means a porous base sheet coated with chemicals to render it impervious to ink, and shall include the backing sheet and any customary or necessary cushion sheets furnished therewith, in form ready for stencilization.

"Stencil duplicating machine" means the machine upon which the stencil is placed and which affords the means for inking the stencil and mechanically reproducing copies of material inscribed or cut upon the stencil, and shall include parts of such machines and all supplementary devices such as paper feed, interleaving and other attachments to the stencil duplicating machine.

"Stencil duplicating supplies" mean inks, stencil base tissue, correction fluids, hand lettering devices, and all other materials normally and customarily used or intended to be used, now or hereafter, in stencil duplicating.

"Dealer" and "distributor" are used interchangeably herein and mean any person, firm or corporation engaged in the sale at wholesale or retail of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies.

"Raw materials" shall include ingredients, supplies, machinery and equipment for the manufacture or processing of stencil duplicating machines, stencils or stencil duplicating supplies.

"Web manufacturing process" means the continuous manufacture by machine of stencils from stencil base tissue in roll form.

IX

[Inspection for Compliance Purposes]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, and subject to any legally recognized privilege, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on the written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to the defendants, be permitted (a) access, during office hours of the defendants, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession of or under the control of the defendants relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment; and (b) without restraint or interference from the defendants, to interview officers or employees of any defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and (c) upon such request, the defendants shall submit such reports concerning matters directly related to compliance with this judgment as may from time to time be reasonably necessary to check compliance with the provisions of this judgment or which otherwise may be directly related to matters prohibited or required to be done under the terms of this judgment, provided, however, that information obtained by the means permitted in this Section shall not be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to appeal to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary and appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of, compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

Final Judgment Against C. H. Dexter & Sons, Inc., Aldine Paper Company, Inc., Dexter D. Coffin, Herbert H. Griswold and Harry E. Gould

The plaintiff, the United States of America, having filed its complaint in this action on July 22, 1946; the defendants, C. H. Dexter & Sons, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as "Dexter"), Dexter D. Coffin, Herbert H. Griswold, Aldine Paper Company, Inc.

(hereinafter referred to as "Aldine"), and Harry E. Gould, having appeared and severally filed their answers to said complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; and the plaintiff and said defendants, by their respective attorneys, having consented to the entry of this final judgment herein:

Now, therefore, before the taking of any testimony and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party with respect to any such issue, and upon consent of the undersigned parties, it is hereby:

Ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the undersigned parties; the complaint states a cause of action against these defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", said Act being commonly known as the "Sherman Act".

II

[Terms Defined]

(A) As used in this judgment, "stencil tissue" means any paper, a single sheet of which is, by prevailing standards, commercially usable as a base for a stencil capable of reproducing on a duplicating machine at least 2500 legible and undistorted copies of written and typewritten matter inscribed thereon, but under Section V of this judgment, shall not include tissue manufactured by Dexter solely for experimental purposes or on experimental orders.

(B) The provisions of this judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to such defendant and to each of its officers, directors, agents and employees and to each of its subsidiaries, affiliates, successors and assigns and to each person acting, or claiming to act under, through or for them or any of them.

[Litigation Enjoined]

Defendants Dexter, Dexter D. Coffin, and Herbert H. Griswold, be and each of them hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from instituting, maintaining or furthering or threatening to institute, maintain or further any action, suit, claim or proceeding for the infringement or the alleged infringement of, or to collect damages or royalties under (1) United States Letters Patent Nos. 2,045,095 or 2,045,096 on account of any manufacture, sale or use of stencil tissue or (2) any foreign patents owned or controlled by said defendants corresponding to either of said United States patents, where such action, suit, claim or proceeding under the foreign patent is based on the use or sale in, or the importation into, the United States of stencil tissue manufactured in a foreign country, or the use or sale in or the importation into a foreign country of stencil tissue manufactured in the United States.

[Practices Enjoined]

Each of the defendants, Dexter, Dexter D. Coffin, Herbert H. Griswold, Aldine, and Harry E. Gould be and each of them hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from:

(a) Granting or allowing, directly or indirectly, any preferential treatment to defendant A. B. Dick Company (hereinafter referred to as "Dick") over any other manufacturer of stencils or any user of stencil tissue as to the grade, type or quality of any tissue for stencils available for purchase or acquisition, except that Dexter shall not be prohibited from manufacturing stencil tissue for experimental purposes on experimental order for any manufacturer of stencils, provided it accepts on non-discriminatory terms and conditions experimental orders for or from any manufacturer of stencils.

(b) Agreeing with defendant Dick to obtain and transmit, or systematically obtaining and transmitting to defendant Dick information concerning the business operations or activities of competitors of Dick, or transmitting to Dick trade secrets or confidential details concerning the business operations or activities of competitors of defendant Dick.

(c) Granting or acquiring an exclusive patent license for the manufacture, use or sale of stencil tissue during the period of five years after the date of the entry of this judgment.

(d) Inducing any manufacturer, dealer or distributor of stencils to refrain from bidding for government contracts or competing for government orders.

[Products To Be Made Available to All Manufacturers]

A. Defendants Dexter, Dexter D. Coffin and Herbert H. Griswold be and each of them hereby is directed through any lawful means to make stencil tissue produced by Dexter available to all manufacturers of stencils in the United States at non-discriminatory charges and upon reasonable and non-discriminatory terms and conditions, subject however to normal and usual credit requirements. Compliance herewith shall require that (1) the maximum quantity discount and most favorable current price, terms and conditions of sale for each grade, type or quality of such stencil tissue shall be available to all manufacturers of stencils who purchase or agree to purchase at least 30,000 pounds of stencil tissue in the aggregate in any 12-month period for delivery in shipments of not less than 7,500 pounds, and (2) if quantity discounts or differentials are offered, the price offered or granted for each such grade, type or quality of stencil tissue to any manufacturer of stencils who purchases or agrees to purchase less than 30,000 pounds of stencil tissue in the aggregate in any 12-month period may exceed such most favorable price only to the extent of actual differences in the cost of manufacture, sale and delivery. In any proceeding to enforce or secure compliance with the provisions of this Section V of this judgment, the burden of justifying any differences in prices charged for such lesser quantities, or in the terms or conditions of sale or availability applicable to stencil tissue shall rest upon the defendant Dexter. Without limiting the provisions of Section V hereof, defendant Dexter shall be entitled, upon such conditions as the court determines to be appropriate, to have this Section V of this judgment vacated or modified upon a showing to the Court, upon thirty days' notice to the Attorney General, that substantial competition exists in the manufacture of stencil tissue in the United States, provided that such an application for the purpose of vacating or modifying this Section V hereof shall not be made more often than once in every two years.

B. Defendants Dexter, Dexter D. Coffin and Herbert H. Griswold, shall forthwith take such steps as may be necessary and appropriate to bring them into full compliance with Paragraph A. of this Section V not later than ninety days from the date of the entry of this judgment.

VI

A. Defendants Aldine and Harry E. Gould be and each of them is hereby directed through any lawful means to make stencil tissue sold or distributed by Aldine available to all manufacturers of stencils in the United States at non-discriminatory charges and upon reasonable and non-discriminatory terms and conditions, subject however to normal and usual credit requirements. Compliance herewith shall require that (1) the maximum quantity discount and most favorable current price, terms and conditions of sale for each grade, type or quality of such stencil tissue shall be available to all manufacturers of stencils who purchase or agree to purchase at least 30,000 pounds of stencil tissue in the aggregate in any 12-month period for delivery in shipments of not less than 7,500 pounds, and (2) if quantity discounts or differentials are offered the price offered or granted for each such grade, type or quality of stencil tissue to any manufacturer of stencils who purchases or agrees to purchase less than 30,000 pounds of stencil tissue in the aggregate in any 12-month period may exceed such most favorable price only to the extent of actual differences in the cost of sale and delivery. In any proceeding to enforce or secure compliance with the provisions of this Section VI of this judgment, the burden of justifying any differences in prices charged for such lesser quantities, or in the terms or conditions of sale or availability applicable to stencil tissue shall rest upon the defendant Aldine. Without limiting the provisions of this Section VI hereof, defendant Aldine shall be entitled, upon such conditions as the Court determines to be appropriate, to have this Section VI of this judgment vacated or modified upon a showing to the court, upon thirty days' notice to the Attorney General, that substantial competition exists in the United States in the distribution and sale of stencil tissue, provided that such an application for the vacating or modifying of Section VI hereof shall not be made more often than once in every two years.

B. Defendants Aldine and Harry E. Gould shall forthwith take such steps as may be necessary to bring them into full compliance with Paragraph A of this Section VI not later than ninety days from the date of the entry of this judgment.

[Unlawful Agreements Enjoined]

Defendants Dexter, Dexter D. Coffin, Herbert H. Griswold, Aldine and Harry E. Gould be and each of them hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering, or enforcing any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program among any of them or with any manufacturer of tissue, or with John A. Manning Paper Company, Inc., Dick or The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., to;

(a) Fix, determine, maintain or adhere to prices or other terms or conditions of sale for stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be charged or submitted to, or required of or by, any other person;

(b) Determine or maintain terms or conditions for the availability of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be offered to any other person;

(c) Limit the type or quality of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be available to others;

(d) Limit, restrict or prevent exports or imports or production of materials for stencil tissue, or of stencil tissue;

(e) Exclude any person from, or restrict or limit any person in, the distribution or purchase of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue;

(f) Exclude any person from, or restrict or limit any person in, the manufacture or use of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue or allocate, divide, restrict or assign territories, customers or markets for the manufacture, distribution, or use of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue;

(g) Grant or receive an exclusive patent license under any United States patent for the manufacture, use or sale of stencil tissue for a period of fifteen years after the date of entry of this judgment.

Subsections (a), (b) and (e) of this Section VII shall not be deemed to prohibit sales by any manufacturer of stencil tissue, including Dexter, through Aldine as a bona fide sales agent so long as Aldine is not a manufacturer of stencil tissue.

VIII

[Applicability of Other Laws]

Nothing in this judgment shall prevent the defendants from availing themselves of the benefits of (1) the Act of Congress of April 10, 1918, commonly called the Webb-Pomerene Act, or (2) the Act of Congress of 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings proviso to Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890 entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies".

IX

[Inspection for Compliance Purposes]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, and subject to any legally recognized privilege, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on the written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, be permitted: (a) Access, during office hours of such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession of or under the control of such defendant relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment; (b) Subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and (c) Upon such request, such defendant shall submit such reports concerning matters directly related to compliance with this judgment as may from time to time be reasonably necessary to check compliance with the provisions of this judgment or which otherwise may be directly related to matters prohibited or required to be done under the terms of this judgment, provided, however, that information obtained by the means permitted in this Section shall not be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary and appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

Final Judgment Against John A. Manning Paper Company, Inc., and James P. Adams

The plaintiff, the United States of America, having filed its complaint in this action on July 22, 1946; the defendants, John A. Manning Paper Company, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as "Manning") and James F. Adams, having appeared and severally filed their answers to said complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; and the plaintiff and said defendants, by their respective attorneys, having consented to the entry of this final judgment herein:

Now, therefore, before the taking of any testimony and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party with respect to any such issue, and upon consent of the undersigned parties, it is hereby

Ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the undersigned parties; the complaint states a cause of action against these defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", said Act being commonly known as the "Sherman Act".

II

[Terms Defined]

(A) As used in this judgment "stencil tissue" means any paper, a single sheet of which is, by prevailing standards, commercially usable as a base for a stencil capable of reproducing on a duplicating machine at least 2500 legible and undistorted copies of written and typewritten matter inscribed thereon.

(B) The provisions of this judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to such defendant and to each of its officers, directors, agents and employees and to each of its subsidiaries, affiliates, successors and assigns and to each person acting, or claiming to act under, through or for them or any of them.

III

[Acts Enjoined]

Defendants Manning and James F. Adams be and each of them hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from:

(a) Instituting, maintaining or furthering or threatening to institute, maintain or further any action, suit, claim or proceeding for the infringement or the alleged infrigement of, (1) United States Letters Patent Nos. 2,069,766 or 2,088,479 on account of any manufacture, sale or use of stencil tissue, or (2) any foreign patents owned or controlled by said defendants corresponding to either of said United States patents, where such action, suit, claim or proceeding under the foreign patent is based on the use or sale in, or the importation into the United States of stencil tissue manufactured in a foreign country, or the use or sale in, or the importation into a foreign country of stencil tissue manuiactured in the United States.

(b) Granting or allowing, directly or indirectly, any preferential treatment to defendant A. B. Dick Company (hereinafter referred to as "Dick") over any other manufacturer of stencils or any user of stencil tissue as to the grade, type or quality of any tissue for stencils available for purchase or acquisition, except that Manning shall not be prohibited from manufacturing stencil tissue for experimental purposes on experimental order for any manufacturer of stencils, provided it accepts on non-discriminatory terms and conditions experimental orders for or from any manufacturer of stencils.

(c) Agreeing with defendant Dick to obtain and transmit, or systematically obtaining and transmitting to defendant Dick information concerning the business operations or activities of competitors of Dick, or transmitting to Dick trade secrets or confidential details concerning the business operations or activities of competitors of defendant Dick.

IV

[Agreements Prohibited]

Defendants Manning and James F. Adams be and each of them hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining, furthering, or enforcing any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program with any manufacturer of tissue, or with any of the defendants A. B. Dick Company, The Mimeograph Company, Ltd., C. H. Dexter & Sons, Inc. or Aldine Paper Company, Inc. to:

(a) Fix, determine, maintain or adhere to prices or other terms or conditions of sale for stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be charged or submitted to, or required of, or by any other person;

(b) Determine or maintain terms or conditions for the availabiilty of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be offered to any other person or to limit the type or quality of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue to be available to others;

(c) Limit, restrict or prevent exports or imports, or production of materials for stencil tissue, or of stencil tissue;

(d) Exclude any person from, or restrict or limit any person in the manufacture, distribution, purchase or use of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue, or allocate, divide, restrict or assign territories, customers or markets for the manufacture, distribution or use of stencil tissue or materials for stencil tissue;

(e) Refrain from competing or bidding for any business, or leave any person free from competition in any territory, or market in the manufacturer, distribution or use of stencil tissue;

(f) Grant or receive an exclusive license under any United States patent for the manufacture, use or sale of stencil tissue for a period of fifteen years after the date of entry of this judgment.

[Applicability of Other Acts]

Nothing in this judgment shall prevent defendants Manning and James F. Adams from availing themselves of the benefits of (1) The Act of Congress of April 10, 1918, commonly called the Webb-Pomerene Act, or (2) The Act of Congress of 1937, commonly called The Miller-Tydings proviso to Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies".

VI

[Inspection for Compliance Purposes]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, and subject to any legally recognized privilege, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on the written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, be permitted: (a) Access, during office hours of such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession of or under the control of such defendant relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment; (b) Subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and (c) Upon such request, such defendant shall submit such reports concerning matters directly related to compliance with this judgment as may from time to time be reasonably necessary to check compliance with the provisions of this judgment or which otherwise may be directly related to matters prohibited or required to be done under the terms of this judgment, provided, however, that information obtained by the means permitted in this Section shall not be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary and appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 62,234] B. R. McLendon, Jeannette McLendon, Jeff D. McLendon, Maggie E. McLendon and Gordon B. McLendon v. Loew's, Inc.; Paramount Pictures, Inc.; R. K. O. Pictures; 20th Century-Fox, Inc. of Texas; Warner Brothers Pictures; Warner Brothers Distributing, Inc.; Columbia Pictures, Inc.; Universal Corp.; United Artists, Inc.; Interstate Circuit, Inc.; Robb and Rowley United, Inc.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division. Civil No. 2703. March 9, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Suit for Injunction and Damages—Motion Picture Exhibitor—Failure to Sustain Burden of Proof.—In an action for injunctive relief and damages for an alleged conspiracy in restraint of trade in the distribution and exhibition of motion pictures, it is held that plaintiff fails to sustain the burden of proof of conspiracy. It is found that film rental contracts containing mutual covenants as to availability and clearance, between defendant distributors and exhibitors, were entered into independently and not as a result of a conspiracy among the defendants, and that each exhibitor individually determined the admission price to be charged by his theater.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.335.

For plaintiffs: Clark, Coon, Holt & Fisher, Dallas, Texas; Thomas C. McConnell, Norman Korfist, both of Chicago, Illinois.

For defendants: Joe Worsham, Dallas, Texas, for Interstate Circuit, Inc.; L. M. Rice, Dallas, Texas, for Robb & Rowley; George S. Wright, Dallas, Texas, for all other defendants.

[Nature of Action]

ATWELL, D. J.: The suit complexioned by the restraint sought under the Anti-trust Acts, and for $1,200,000 damages, was filed on September 15th, 1947.

The damages claimed grow out of a sale by the plaintiffs, B. R. McLendon, at all times acting for all of the plaintiffs, alleged to have been forced, of the Beverly Hills theater to defendants, Robb & Rowley, and to the alleged discrimination that the Beverly Hills theater suffered while operated by the plaintiffs, as well as discriminations suffered by the Casa Linda theater, still owned by the plaintiffs. That such discriminations in both instances were the result of a conspiracy between the defendants in violation of the Trust statutes. (Sherman Anti-trust Act, 15 U. S. Code, Sec. 1 et seq.; and Secs. 1, 4 and 16, Clayton Act, in its original and amended form.)

The testimony discloses that prior to the plaintiff's coming to Dallas a few years previous, both Robb & Rowley and the Interstate had been exhibitors of moving pictures in metropolitan Dallas. That area consisted of what is commonly designated as the Oak Cliff portion, which is west of the Trinity River, and that portion, considerably larger, which is composed of a number of suburban districts as well as the downtown section, and included such suburbs as Highland Park, University Park, Lakewood and others.

Metropolitan Dallas has sixty-five theaters. In that part of Dallas east of the Trinity, Interstate, as well as other owners, not necessary to mention, operate, of which Interstate has approximately nineteen theaters. In the part west of the Trinity known as Oak Cliff, Robb & Rowley have six theaters, and there are others unnecessary to mention.

When the plaintiff came to Dallas he was learned in the picture business, was a successful trader, and had been a lawyer for some twenty-seven years. He chose sites for two theaters, one in a very sparsely settled location east of the Trinity, and a similar sparsely settled portion west of the Trinity. The first he named the Casa Linda, and the second, the Beverly Hills.

After the erection and opening of each and enjoying the income therefrom he solicited the sale of the Beverly Hills to Robb & Rowley, and after such profitable sale he solicited the sale of the Casa Linda to the Interstate. In the presentment of his reasons for each of such solicitations there was no complaint of either business or restriction, and, in truth, his profit on the Beverly Hills sale was approximately what he thought he was entitled to.

His string of theaters outside of the two suburban Dallas theaters, is known as the Tri-state. He operates or has operated theaters in Texas, outside of Dallas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and Arkansas.

Among the reasons assigned for the sales of Beverly Hills and Casa Linda was an alleged indebtedness to Dallas banks, and that his son, one of the plaintiffs, needed a large sum of money to go into the radio business.

Prior to the filing of this suit, he had been furnished pictures by certain distributors on what is called "test runs," which means a division of profit between the distributor and the exhibitor. The distributors did not think that he had properly accounted for the proceeds from such pictures and that they had not gotten their appropriate part and they insisted upon an inspection of records and verification of the amounts that he had paid to them. This, he resisted, and, since they still persisted, he filed this suit.

During the taking of testimony, the words, "clearance," "availability," and "admission price," were the crucial points. Great volumes of exhibits were garnered, as were also voluminous depositions and a large record of oral testimony, charts, summaries, etc., so that the hearing of the cause occupied an entire week, including some rather extended sessions and one night session, all calling for deep and careful consideration.

Such consideration includes the thought that the moving picture, as it comes to the public, is short-lived. It consists of a string of small pictures which are so ingeniously connected and operated as to have a fascinating continuity and are thrown upon a screen with accompanying music, words, gestures and colorings. The life of a film is measured by a rather brief number of exhibitions, perhaps, under twenty. These films are produced in California and shipped to the respective key points, or, exchanges, throughout the United States, one of which is Dallas, and another, Camden, New Jersey. Quite frequently they reach Dallas from the New Jersey depot. These films are never sold. They are merely leased to the exhibitor. Such leases are usually printed contracts, inquiring as to the name, location, admission price, and mutual covenants as to availability for exhibition, clearance, return, etc.

[Contracts Not Result of Conspiracy]

These contracts, while containing blanks which cover practically the same information as does the ordinary rental contract for real estate, or, warranty deed for such estate, were in no sense, the result of agreement or conspiracy between either the producers or distributors, or any other interested exhibitor. They were information that went to the lessor, practically the same information as goes to all life insurance companies, or, fire insurance companies before policies are issued.

The distributor, vested with a property right, certainly was entitled to enjoy the fruitage of an uncoerced contract between itself and its lessee, and the proper return of its property to it after the lessee's term had been completed.

"Clearance," and "availability," are recognized in the reasonable grounds assigned in United States v. Paramount, 66 F. (2d) 323, and in United States v. Interstate, 20 F. (2d) 868, affirmed in 306 U. S. 208.

The downtown theaters, Majestic and Palace, of metropolitan Dallas, were, beyond question, entitled to such priority as was given them. The same may be said of the other theaters throughout the city.

The testimony shows that the admission price for all the theaters in Dallas is below that of any other comparable city in the United States. There were three pictures which were shown at a larger price in Dallas than the public in Dallas usually has to pay, though not in excess of the prices which were charged for the same pictures in other cities, but they were what is known as "road shows," and included the effort of the exhibitor and distributor to determine the value of the particular film as an attraction. In such three instances, the distributor divided super advertising costs with the exhibitor and the receipts had ratable and proportionate division.

[Failure to Meet Burden of Proof]

Upon the controversial points, the plaintiff has failed to successfully meet the requirement of the burden of proof, and upon the submission of testimony which, for its truthfulness and weight, is the solvent. He is not entitled to any equitable relief, nor to any damages.

A motion which was made by the defendants at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, had there been a jury called for the assistance of the court as to that feature, would have been granted, because it would have been error to have refused it.

Finding of Facts

I.

The films that were sold and displayed at Dallas, Texas, by all of the parties, were interstate commerce.

II.

That the contracts for the same were made independently by the respective distributors with the respective exhibitors, and that neither producers nor distributors made an agreement with reference to availability, admission price, nor any other matter with any other distributor or producer or exhibitor named as a defendant. Each acted independently.

III.

That any and all recognized the propriety of the Majestic and Palace as the best houses in Dallas in all points that should be reasonably considered in passing upon first-run privileges. That "availability" and "clearance," though somewhat synonymous, were not the result of an agreement or conspiracy among the defendants.

IV.

That the exhibitors made their own admission prices and upon such admission prices each of the defendants exercised his own judgment as to the charges that would be made for films that would be exhibited by such exhibitor.

V.

That in determining "availability" and "clearance," whichever is applicable, the standards and determinations that enter into a grading of the exhibitor's location, seating capacity, appointments, and advertising that had been indulged by the first-run houses, and the advantages that accrued to subsequent run distributors by reason of such advertising, were appropriate and reasonable.

Conclusions of Law

It follows from what I have said, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover and the decree may go for the defendants.

[¶ 62,235] In the Matter of Motions of Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., et al. for Return of Documents.

In the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island. Indictment No. 6055. February 6, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Indictment—Grand Jury Illegally Constituted—Motion for Return of Documents.—Motions by defendants for the return of photostatic copies of documents, obtained by the government under subpoenas duces tecum issued upon an indictment charging manufacturers of chlorinating equipment with conspiring to monopolize and restrain trade in violation of the Sherman Act, are granted in a case where the indictment was later dismissed because the grand jury was found to be illegally constituted. It is held that the subpoenas amounted to unreasonable search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and that the government has no valid basis in law for the intrusion which it committed in making photostatic copies of the documents and in retaining possession of them.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.156.

For plaintiff: George F. Troy, United States Attorney, Providence, Rhode Island; Chalmers Hamill, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; Alfred Karsted, Special Attorney; Grant Kelleher, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, all of Washington, D. C.

For defendant: William H. Edwards, Gerald W. Harrington, Edwards & Angell; Harold E. Staples; Chauncey E. Wheeler and S. Everett Wilkins, Jr.; Edward T. Hogan and Laurence J. Hogan, Hogan & Hogan; Aisenberg & Joslin, all of Providence, Rhode Island; Conrad H. Poppenhusen, Edward R. Johnston, Anan Raymond, of Poppenhusen, Johnston, Thompson & Raymond, Chicago, Illinois; James F. Dulligan and Jeremiah F. Cross, New York, N. Y.

[Nature of Action]

HARTIGAN, J.: This matter was heard on the motions of Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., Wallace & Tiernan Products, Inc., Wallace & Tiernan Sales Corporation and Novadel-Agene Corporation and on the affidavit of William H. Edwards, Esq., filed May 9, 1947,

"that all photostat copies of documents referred to in the 'Order on Motion for Return of Impounded Documents' entered by this Honorable Court on the 19th day of March, 1947, in Criminal Action number 6055 be returned to the movants forthwith. * * *"

[Return of Documents Ordered]

The affidavit of Mr. Edwards sets forth in substance that on December 10, 1946, there was filed in this Court in Indictment No. 6055, two motions for return of impounded documents in behalf of Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., Wallace & Tiernan Products, Inc., and Wallace & Tiernan Sales Corporation and Novadel-Agene Corporation, which asked for the return of all documents produced by these companies in compliance with certain subpoenas issued at the instance of the grand jury which had returned Indictment No. 6055, such subpoenas being listed in said motions.

The affidavit further sets forth that on March 19, 1947, an order was entered in Indictment No. 6055 granting said motions and ordered the immediate return of the documents referred to in said motions.

[Photostat Copies Made]

The affidavit further alleges that to the affiant's knowledge the attorneys and representatives of the United States of America have made a large number of photostat copies of said documents and still retain them, unlawfully and without justification, in their possession; that on February 7, 1947, the affiant made to Alfred Karsted, Esq., Special Attorney for the United States, an oral request for the return of such photostat copies and again a similar request was made May 2, 1947. The requests so made had not been complied with and, accordingly, on May 5, 1947, letters from the attorneys for the Wallace & Tiernan Companies and Novadel-Agene Corporation were sent to the United States Attorney for this District making formal demand for the immediate return of all photostat copies and that no definite reply, either by way of compliance or refusal, has been received.

The Government has filed no counter-affidavit.

[Text of Order]

The "Order on Motion for Return of Impounded Documents" entered March 19, 1947, is as follows:

"This cause came on to be heard on the motions of the defendants, Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., et al., and Novadel-Agene Corporation, et al., respectively, for return of impounded documents, etc., and was argued by counsel, and thereupon, upon consideration thereof, it is hereby ORDERED:

"1. That the documents listed in said motions be, and they hereby are, made available to the defendants forthwith for return to them;

"2. That the orders of impounding described in said motions be, and they hereby are, vacated and rescinded."

[Subpoenas Duces Tecum]

April 29, 1946, a grand jury was impaneled in this district. On the same date subpoenas duces tecum were issued to Wallace & Tiernan Company, Inc., Wallace & Tiernan Products, Inc., and Wallace & Tiernan Sales Corporation.

Motions to quash all of the subpoenas were filed on the ground, among others, that the subpoenas constituted an unreasonable search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

May 22, 1946, after hearing and argument, the motions to quash were denied.

September 6, 1946, subpoenas duces tecum were issued to Novadel-Agene Corporation, Industrial Appliance Corporation and the three Wallace & Tiernan Companies. Motions to quash these subpoenas were also filed. However, a satisfactory compliance with the subpoenas was worked out by negotiation between attorneys for the Government and the corporations. Pursuant to the subpoenas, documents were produced by the movants and were impounded by the Court upon application by the Government.

[Indictment Returned]

November 18, 1946, the grand jury returned an Indictment, No. 6055, charging eighteen defendants, including the movants, with violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, commonly known as the Sherman Act.

December 10, 1946, the movants filed a motion for the return of the impounded documents.

[Motion to Dismiss]

December 21, 1946, the defendants (except Schutte & Koerting Company) in said indictment moved to dismiss the indictment on the ground, among others, that the grand jury was illegally constituted in that women were intentionally arbitrarily and entirely excluded from the panel from which the grand jury was drawn.

[Grand Jury Illegally Constituted]

March 19, 1947, the Court, after hearing argument on the motions to dismiss, held that the grand jury was illegally constituted and that said indictment should be dismissed and an order to that effect was entered April 7, 1947.

April 1, 1947, the Government filed a motion to dismiss the indictment as against Schutte & Koerting Company and the motion was granted.

The Government did not appeal the Court's decision dismissing the indictment and ordering the return of the impounded documents.

[Objections to Return of Photostats]

The Government now objects to the return of all photostat copies made by it of the documents referred to in the order of March 19, 1947.

[Government's Contentions]

It is the Government's contention that a subpoena being a distinct and separate process of the court, is not rendered illegal by the fact that the grand jury for whose consideration the documents were subpoenaed, was an illegally constituted grand jury.

The Government in its brief states:

> "Since subpoenas constitute but a 'figurative' search and seizure, the question of whether they ever constitute an unreasonable search and seizure under any conditions requires a balancing of the public interest against private security."

In support of this they cite Okla. Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186.

It seems to me that the Okla. Press Pub. Co. case is not analogous to the instant case. There the Supreme Court said at p. 210:

> "All the records sought were relevant to the authorized inquiry, the purpose of which was to determine two issues, whether petitioners were subject to the Act and, if so, whether they were violating it."

The authorized inquiry referred to investigations conducted by the Administrator pursuant to § 11 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 52 Stat. 1060.

[Legal Compulsion May Constitute Unreasonable Search and Seizure]

The subpoenas duces tecum in the instant matter commanded the movants to appear before the grand jury on a day certain and bring with them and produce certain records and then and there to testify concerning certain matters under investigation by the grand jury and not depart the court without leave thereof or of the United States.

The appearance of the witness and the production of the records in response to such subpoenas cannot be said to be voluntary when failure to appear would subject him to punishment.

The cases are too numerous to cite that hold that either actual force or legal compulsion may constitute unreasonable search and seizure.

The subpoenas did not violate the Fourth Amendment and the Government was entitled to have the documents produced for presentation to a legal grand jury. It seems to me that when the grand jury turned out to be illegally constituted and the indictment was dismissed that the subpoenas amounted to unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the Fourth Amendment:

> "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

[No Waiver of Rights]

There is nothing in the record that convinces me that the movants in their role as witnesses or defendants waived any of their rights. As witnesses they contested the subpoenas and contended that they violated the Fourth Amendment and when they became defendants they made timely objection to the legality of the grand jury.

[No Permission to Photostat]

I find nothing in the record that indicates that the movants gave permission to the Government's representatives to make photostat copies of the documents which were produced in compliance with the subpoenas.

[Unreasonable Search and Seizure]

In Johnson v. United States, decided February 2, 1948, (16 L. W. 4133, 4135), the Supreme Court said:

> "Thus the Government is obliged to justify the arrest by the search and at the same time to justify the search by the arrest. This will not do. An officer gaining access to private living quarters under color of his office and of the law which he personifies must then have some valid basis in law for the intrusion. Any other rule would undermine 'the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects,' and would obliterate one of the most fundamental distinctions between our form of government, where officers are under the law, and the police-state where they are the law."

It is my opinion that the Government, gaining access to the documents by means of an illegal grand jury, has no "valid basis in law for the intrusion," which the Government committed in making the photostats of said documents and retaining possession of them.

[Motions Granted]

The motions, therefore, are granted.

Since these motions stem from Indictment No. 6055, the Clerk is ordered to make the motions, the hearings thereon, and this opinion part of the record of said indictment.

In the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. Civil Action No. 6150. March 22, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Public Fire Alarm Systems—Practices Enjoined—Catalogue To Be Submitted to Court.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging a manufacturer of public fire alarm systems with using its dominant position in the industry to cause specifications for equipment to be so drawn that only its products could meet them, thus excluding competition, requires the defendant to discontinue collusive and discriminatory bidding practices, including advance framing of specifications to be issued by municipal bodies in connection with bids for fire alarm systems equipment. Defendant is required to submit for approval a catalogue describing in general terms equipment necessary for performance of particularly designated functions, but not describing the methods whereby such functions are performed. Thereafter the defendant may furnish information only in the exact language of the catalogue and only upon written request from a prospective purchaser, and must immediately transmit the same information to all competitors named in the appendix to the judgment. The defendant is further enjoined from continuing to defray entertainment costs and other expenses of persons connected with the buying of such equipment for public bodies, and is required to desist from conducting harassing litigation against competitors, to dedicate trademarks to the public, and to license its patents to all applicants on a reasonable royalty basis.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.151, 1270.151, 1590.

For plaintiff: John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; John Ford Baecher, First Assistant, Antitrust Division; Morton H. Steinberg, Edward R. Kenney, Donald P. McHugh, William D. Kilgore, Jr.; Sigmund Timberg, Special Assistant to the Attorney General; William T. McCarthy, United States Attorney.

For defendants: Charles B. Rugg, Ropes, Gray, Best, Coolidge & Rugg.

Final Judgment

Plaintiff, the United States of America, having filed its complaint in this action on the 14th day of November, 1946; and all the parties hereto by their attorneys herein having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment herein without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without admission by any party hereto in respect to any such issue;

NOW, THEREFORE, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby

ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein, and of all parties to this judgment and the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants, and each of them, under Section 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," as amended, commonly known as the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. sec. 2).

II

[Applicability, Definition]

A. The provisions of this final judgment applicable to defendant, The Gamewell Company (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "defendant Gamewell"), shall apply to each of its subsidiaries, affiliates, successors, assignees, and nominees, and to each of its officers, directors, agents and employees, and to each person acting or claiming to act under, through or for such defendant, including defendants Frederick B. Philbrick, Edward J. McCarthy, and Grenfell Swim.

B. For the purposes of the complaint herein and of this final judgment, the term "public fire alarm systems" means fire alarm systems owned or operated, directly or indirectly, or intended or designed to be owned or operated, directly or indirectly, by public authorities, organizations or agencies, including, but not limited to, municipalities, other governmental subdivisions or bodies or tax supported institutions.

[Acquisition of Assets]

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from hereafter acquiring, or holding after such acquisition, any interest in the capital stock or assets (except goods or merchandise bought as incidental to the ordinary course of business) of any person engaged in manufacturing, selling, distributing or installing apparatus or equipment (a) useful only in fire alarm systems, or (b) appropriate in connection with fire alarm systems and in the manufacture, distribution or installation of which defendant Gamewell is engaged.

[Exclusive Licenses Prohibited]

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from acquiring any license, sublicense, or grant of immunity, to make, use, vend or install, under any patents, patent rights or trademarks covering apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with fire alarm systems, unless said license or sublicense or grant of immunity is non-exclusive and requires that throughout its life similar licenses, sublicenses or grants of immunity be given to others requesting same on terms and conditions at least as favorable as those accorded defendant Gamewell.

V

[Practices Enjoined]

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

A. Agreeing with, coercing, inducing or influencing, or attempting to coerce, induce or influence, directly or indirectly, any other manufacturer, distributor or installer of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems not to compete with defendant Gamewell generally, or with respect to any type or variety of such apparatus or equipment, or with respect to any transaction;

B. Arranging for or causing one or more dummy or collusive bids for contracts for apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, or installation or engineering services in connection therewith, to be submitted;

C. Instigating or causing others to bring suits seeking to enjoin or otherwise interfere with the award of any contract for apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, or for installation thereof or engineering services in connection therewith, to a competitor of defendant Gamewell;

D. Threatening to bring or bringing suits to enjoin or restrain any official or agent of a governmental subdivision, authority or agency from awarding any contract for apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, or for installation thereof or engineering services in connection therewith, to a competitor of defendant Gamewell; or threatening to bring or bringing any suit in connection with the award of such contract to third persons, except suits based on fraud, bribery, or wilful negligence;

E. Threatening to bring or bringing suits based on (1) trademarks listed in Appendix A (annexed hereto and hereby made a part hereof), provided, however, that defendant Gamewell may, consistently with this subsection, take steps necessary to insure that other users of such trademarks indicate the source of origin of the trademarked product, or (2) any patent infringement occurring prior to the date of this final judgment;

F. Offering, paying or granting, or causing to be offered, paid or granted, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, to an agent, representative, or other intermediary in the sale or purchase of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, or for installation or engineering services in connection therewith, or who is subject to the direct or indirect control of any party to such transaction other than defendant Gamewell;

G. Offering to furnish or sell, or furnishing or selling, apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, or installation or engineering services in connection therewith, to a prospective purchaser, without cost or below the cost of doing business. However, where the prospective purchaser does not purchase from Gamewell apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, defendant Gamewell may, at its option, consistently with this subsection, furnish such engineering services on any charge or donation basis, if lawful, provided it makes an otherwise completely unrestricted and unconditional grant of such services to such prospective purchaser. In all bids submitted by defendant Gamewell for any contract for the furnishing or selling of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, the cost of all relevant engineering services furnished or sold, or to be furnished or sold, shall be separately and specifically stated. No installation or engineering services furnished pursuant to the provisions of this subsection shall contain any information concerning the product of any specific manufacturer or distributor (including defendant Gamewell) of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems;

H. For the purpose of destroying a competitor in the manufacture, distribution or installation of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems, price cutting or price discrimination;

I. Engaging in any other unfair trade practice in connection with the manufacture, sale, distribution or installation of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems.

VI

[Practices Permitted]

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from initiating or participating in any manner in any program, plan, arrangement, understanding or undertaking with prospective purchasers of apparatus or equipment or installation or engineering services, appropriate for use in public fire alarm systems, or with their agents, employees, or representatives, regarding terms and conditions under which prospective suppliers thereof shall be awarded contracts for such apparatus, equipment or installation or engineering services, except that:

A. Defendant Gamewell may disseminate general information concerning such apparatus or equipment manufactured, sold or installed by it, in a catalogue or manual prepared by defendant Gamewell, but only in compliance with the following terms and conditions:

1. Defendant Gamewell shall submit its proposed catalogue or manual to this Court for its approval prior to use, with thirty days' notice of such submission and a copy of the proposed catalogue or manual to the Attorney General, within six months from the date of this final judgment;

2. Said catalogue or manual shall be confined to a general description of what types and arrangements of apparatus or equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems are necessary for the performance of particularly designated functions, but may not describe the methods whereby such functions are performed;

3. Defendant Gamewell is to furnish to prospective purchasers of such apparatus or equipment or installation or engineering services only such information concerning such apparatus or equipment as is contained in said catalogue or manual, after approval thereof by this Court, and only in the exact language thereof;

4. Defendant Gamewell, prior to the furnishing of such information, has received written request therefor from a prospective purchaser independently initiated by that purchaser; and

5. Defendant Gamewell simultaneously address copies of all information furnished to a prospective purchaser pursuant to the provisions of subsections 3 and 4 of this Section VI-A, with respect to the request and the purchaser (except such information as relates exclusively to installation or engineering services furnished pursuant to the provisions of Section V-G of this judgment), to the persons named in Appendix B (annexed hereto and hereby made a part of this judgment), and promptly upon written or telegraphic request therefor to any other person, stating the name of the prospective purchaser to whom such information has been furnished; and

B. Pending approval of the catalogue or manual to be submitted to this Court by defendant Gamewell as required in subsection A-1 of this Section VI, defendant Gamewell may disseminate general information concerning such apparatus or equipment manufactured, sold, distributed or installed by it, upon the following terms and conditions:

1. Such general information shall be of the character described in subsection A-2 of this Section VI; and

2. Such general information may be furnished by defendant Gamewell only under the conditions prescribed in subsections A-3, 4 and 5 of this Section VI.

VII

[Catalogue Subject to Revision]

A. The catalogue or manual provided for in subsection A of Section VI of this judgment shall be subject from time to time to such revision or revisions as may be agreed upon by the parties hereto and approved by the Court.

B. In the event defendant Gamewell, upon receipt of an inquiry independently initiated by a particular prospective purchaser, determines that the descriptions contained in the catalogue or manual are not adequate to describe the types and arrangements of fire alarm apparatus or equipment necessary to meet the then requirements of that purchaser, and that the catalogue or manual cannot be revised under the provisions of subsection A of this Section VII in time to answer the inquiry, it may furnish to such purchaser general information concerning such apparatus or equipment without following the exact language of the catalogue or manual, but only after the following conditions have been satisfied:

1. Defendant Gamewell shall have furnished in writing to the Department of Justice (a) the name and address of the prospective purchaser, (b) the general information which Gamewell proposes to furnish such purchaser, and (c) an explanation why the catalogue or manual cannot adequately convey the information to the purchaser and cannot be revised in accordance with subsection A of this Section VII in time to answer the prospective purchaser;

2. The Department of Justice shall not have notified defendant Gamewell of its disapproval of the proposed description of such apparatus or equipment or the furnishing thereof, within ten days after receipt by the Department of all the statements referred to in the preceding subsection B-1;

3. Defendant Gamewell shall follow as closely as possible in furnishing the information the language of the catalogue or manual;

4. The information furnished shall comply with the requirements of subsection A-2 of Section VI, and shall, except as specifically modified by this subsection B of Section VII, be supplied under the conditions set forth in subsections A-3, 4 and 5 of Section VI.

Failure of the Department of Justice to take action under subsection B-2 of this Section VII within the said ten day period shall not estop the plaintiff herein from seeking enforcement of or compliance with this final judgment, or the punishment of violations thereof, except that in such case the furnishing of such general description to the particular prospective purchaser shall not be received as evidence of violation of this final judgment.

VIII

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

A. Participating in any manner in the preparation of any part or parts of plans or specifications or any other document or documents issued or to be issued by a prospective purchaser of apparatus, equipment, or installation or engineering services appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems; or

B. Influencing or inducing prospective purchasers of such apparatus, equipment, or installation or engineering services to (1) disqualify or discourage others than defendant Gamewell from bidding for award of contracts therefor, (2) limit the issuance of invitations to bid for such contracts to defendant Gamewell, or provide for the issuance of such invitations or of notices in connection therewith in a manner more favorable to defendant Gamewell than to others, or (3) reject all bids submitted for such contracts and readvertise for new bids for such contracts.

IX

[Contributions Enjoined]

Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

A. Making any contribution to or underwriting, in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, the expenses of any organization or association, or the officers, directors, agents or employees thereof, whose principal membership consists of individuals, business firms, or other organized groups whose principal activities are related to or concern primarily (1) fire prevention, (2) apparatus or equipment in fire alarm systems or installation or engineering services in connection therewith, or (3) purchasing or recommending the purchase of such apparatus, equipment, or services, provided that defendant Gamewell may pay only regular or sustaining membership dues in, or hire space for use in exhibiting such apparatus or equipment at conventions of, such organizations or associations, and may contribute not to exceed $250 annually for scientific research by any one such organization or association, but not to exceed an aggregate of $1000 annually for scientific research by all such organizations or associations; or

B. Defraying in whole or in part the expenses of any persons (other than persons employed by defendant Gamewell and acting solely in the interests of defendant Gamewell) in connection with meetings or conventions of organizations or associations of the character described in subsection A of this Section IX, and paying any expenses incurred in connection with entertainment of said persons attending said meetings or conventions.

[Licensing Required]

A. Defendant Gamewell is hereby ordered and directed to grant to each applicant therefor a non-exclusive license to make, use and vend under any United States patent covering inventions used in public fire alarm systems (1) listed in Appendix C (annexed hereto and hereby made a part of this final judgment); and (2) hereafter issued to or acquired by defendant Gamewell or in which defendant Gamewell acquires any interest, except such patents hereafter issued or acquired as meet the following three criteria; (a) the patent is issued on a patent application filed subsequent to the entry of this final judgment; (b) application for the patent is made by an employee of defendant Gamewell and is based on an invention or discovery of said employee while in Gamewell's employ; and (c) the patent does not cover an improvement on an invention covered by a patent or patent application existing or pending on the date of entry of this final judgment.

B. Defendant Gamewell is hereby enjoined and restrained from including any restriction or condition whatsoever in any license or sublicense granted by it pursuant to the provisions of this Section X, except that (1) a uniform reasonable royalty may be charged; (2) reasonable provisions may be made for periodic inspection of the books and records of the licensee by an independent auditor or any person acceptable to the licensee who shall report to the licensor only the amount of the royalty due and payable, (3) reasonable provision may be made for cancellation of the license upon failure of the licensee to pay the royalties or to permit the inspection of his books and records as hereinabove provided (4) the license must provide that the licensee may cancel the license at any time by giving thirty days' notice in writing to the licensor; and (5) the license must provide that the licensee shall immediately have the benefit of any more favorable terms granted other licensees.

C. Upon application for a license in accordance with the provisions of subsection A of this Section X, defendant Gamewell shall advise the applicant of the royalty it deems reasonable for the patents to which the application pertains. If the parties are unable to agree upon what constitutes a reasonable royalty within sixty (60) days from the date application for the license was received by defendant Gamewell, the applicant for a license may apply forthwith to this Court for a determination of a reasonable royalty, and defendant Gamewell shall, upon receipt of notice of filing such application, promptly give notice thereof to the Attorney General. In any such proceeding the burden of proof shall be upon defendant Gamewell, or its assignee, vendee, or transferee to establish the reasonableness of the royalty requested by it; and the reasonable royalty rates, if any, determined by the Court shall apply to the applicant and to the holders of all other licenses issued under the same patent or patents. Pending the completion of negotiations or of any such Court proceeding, the applicant shall have the right to make, use and vend under the patents to which its application pertains, without payment of royalty or other compensation, but subject to the following provisions: Defendant Gamewell, its assignee, vendee, or transferee may apply to the Court to fix an interim royalty rate pending final determination of what constitutes a reasonable royalty, if any. If the Court fixes such interim royalty rate, a license shall then issue and defendant Gamewell shall then issue and the applicant shall accept such license providing for the periodic payment of royalties at such interim rate from the date of the making of such application. If the applicant fails to accept such license or to pay the interim royalty therein provided, such action shall be ground for the dismissal of his application. Where an interim license has been issued pursuant to these provisions, reasonable royalty rates, if any, as finally determined by the Court shall be retroactive for the applicant and all other licensees under substantially the same patents to the date the applicant filed his application with the Court for the fixing of a reasonable royalty.

XI

Defendant Gamewell is hereby ordered and directed:

A. To instruct, in writing, within 60 days from the date of this judgment, those of its agents, solicitors, salesmen, engineers and other employees or persons engaged in the sale of apparatus or equipment or the installation or engineering services appropriate in connection with public fire alarm systems (1) that the practices described in Sections V and VIII of this final judgment are enjoined and that each and every such employee and person is enjoined by this final judgment from engaging in said practices; and (2) of the contents of Sections VI and VII hereof, and the necessity for compliance therewith; and

B. To maintain for a period of ten years complete and intact, in an orderly classification and not in storage, permitting prompt and selective examination of particular documents or categories of documents, all its books and records, correspondence, memoranda, reports and other writings relating to its business of manufacturing, selling, distributing or installing, or attempts to manufacture, sell, distribute, or install apparatus and equipment appropriate for use in connection with public fire alarm systems.

XII

Defendant Gamewell is hereby ordered and directed to furnish promptly upon written or telegraphic request:

A. A copy of this final judgment to any person, including any governmental subdivision, body or agency, making such request; and

B. The requested number of copies of this final judgment, if not unreasonable, to any association or organization (other than competitors of defendant Gamewell) whose members are interested in the purchase or installation of apparatus or equipment for use in connection with fire alarm systems.

XIII

[Inspection for Compliance Purposes]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, on reasonable notice to the defendant, The Gamewell Company, made to its principal offices, be permitted (a) access during the office hours of said defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment; and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding such matters. Upon request said defendant shall submit such reports as might from time to time be reasonably necessary to the enforcement of this judgment, provided, however, that no information obtained by the means provided in this section shall be divulged by the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment or as otherwise required by law.

XIV

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for, and for the Court to make, such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the modification thereof, or for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Federal Trade Commission Act

Jurisdiction of Federal Trade Commission—Violation of Sherman Act as Unfair Method of Competition—Simultaneous Antitrust and Commission Proceedings.—The Federal Trade Commission has jurisdiction to declare that conduct tending to restrain trade is an unfair method of competition even though the selfsame conduct may also violate the Sherman Act. The filing of a Sherman Act suit by the Attorney General does not require the termination of Federal Trade Commission proceedings involving the same practices. Both the legislative history of the Federal Trade Commission Act and its specific language indicate a congressional purpose to permit the simultaneous use of both types of proceedings.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.222, and the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.122.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Jurisdiction of Federal Trade Commission—Respondent Engaged in Intrastate Commerce.—The fact that one or two of the numerous participants in an alleged combination in restraint of trade happen to be selling only within the borders of a single state is not controlling in determining the scope of the Commission's jurisdiction. The important factor is that the concerted action of all of the parties to the combination is essential in order to make wholly effective the restraint of commerce among the states.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.414.

Jurisdiction of Federal Trade Commission—Disqualification Because of Prior Opinion as to Unfairness of Practice.—The Commission properly refused to disqualify itself in a proceeding involving the basing point system of pricing because of the fact that members of the Commission had, prior to the proceedings, formed an opinion that the basing point system of pricing was illegal.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.402.

Evidence.—Although the Federal Trade Commission complaint alleged that respondents engaged in an illegal combination in 1929, the Commission properly admitted evidence as to respondents' activities many years previously, some in compliance with the National Recovery Act. The consideration given these activities by the Commission was well within the established judicial rule of evidence that testimony of prior or subsequent transactions, which for some reason is barred from forming the basis for a suit, may nevertheless be introduced if it tends reasonably to show the purpose and character of the particular transactions under scrutiny. Furthermore, administrative agencies like the Federal Trade Commission have never been restricted by rigid rules of evidence.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.422.

Unfair Methods of Competition—Concerted Maintenance of the Basing Point Delivered Price System.—The Commission's holding that concerted maintenance of the basing point delivered price system is an unfair method of competition is sustained. The Court cannot say that the Commission was wrong in concluding that the delivered-price system as here used provided an effective instrument which, if left free for use of the respondents, would result in complete destruction of competition and the establishment of monopoly in the cement industry.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6380.60.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Basing Point System as Price Discrimination.—The Federal Trade Commission properly concluded that respondents' multiple basing point delivered price system resulted in price discriminations which substantially lessened competition. The varying mill nets received by respondents on sales between customers in different localities constituted a discrimination in price between different purchasers within the prohibition of Section 2(a).

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.592.

Dissenting Opinion—Insufficiency of Evidence—Issue of Individual and Independent Absorptions of Freight Charges.—A dissenting opinion upholds the decision of the court below that the evidence does not support the Commission's finding of the existence of a combination among respondents to restrain competition. The failure of the Commission and the majority of the Supreme Court to reach the question of individual and independent absorptions of freight charges to meet lower prices of competitors, in the course of bona fide competition, requires the setting aside of the order of the Commission. The judgment of the Court of Appeals should have been affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the court.

We granted certiorari to review the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals which, with one judge dissenting, vacated and set aside a cease and desist order issued by the Federal Trade Commission against the respondents. 157 F. 2d 533. Those respondents are: The Cement Institute, an unincorporated trade association composed of 74 corporations [1] which manufacture, sell and distribute cement; the 74 corporate members of the Institute;[2] and 21 individuals who are associated with the Institute. It took three years for a trial examiner to hear the evidence which consists of about 49,000 pages of oral testimony and 50,000 pages of exhibits. Even the findings and conclusions of the Commission cover 176 pages. The briefs with accompanying appendixes submitted by the parties contain more than 4,000 pages. The legal questions raised by the Commission and by the different respondents are many and varied. Some contentions are urged by all respondents and can be jointly considered. Others require separate treatment. In order to keep our opinion within reasonable limits, we must restrict our record references to the minimum consistent with an adequate consideration of the legal questions we discuss.

The proceedings were begun by a Commission complaint of two counts. The first charged that certain alleged conduct set out at length constituted an unfair method of competition in violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. 38 Stat. 719, 15 U. S. C. § 45. The core of the charge was that the respondents had restrained and hindered competition in the sale and distribution of cement by means of a combination among themselves made effective through mutual understanding or agreement to employ a multiple basing point system of pricing. It was alleged that this system resulted in the quotation of identical terms of sale and identical prices for cement by the respondents at any given point in the United States. This system had worked so successfully, it was further charged, that for many years prior to the filing of the complaint, all cement buyers throughout the nation, with rare exceptions, had been unable to purchase cement for delivery in any given locality from any one of the respondents at a lower price or on more favorable terms than from any of the other respondents.

The second count of the complaint, resting chiefly on the same allegations of fact set out in Count I, charged that the multiple basing point system of sales resulted in systematic price discriminations between the customers of each respondent. These discriminations were made, it was alleged, with the purpose of destroying competition in price between the various respondents in violation of § 2 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526. That section, with certain conditions which need not here be set out, makes it "unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, . . . either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality. . . ." 15 U. S. C. § 13.

Resting upon its findings, the Commission ordered that respondents cease and desist from "carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy" to do a number of things, 37 F. T. C. 87, 258-262, all of which things, the Commission argues, had to be restrained in order effectively to restore individual freedom of action among the separate units in the cement industry. Certain contentions with reference to the order will later require a more detailed discussion of its terms. For the present it is sufficient to say that, if the order stands, its terms are broad enough to bar respondents from acting in concert to sell cement on a basing point delivered price plan which so eliminates competition that respondents' prices are always identical at any given point in the United States.

[1] The Commission dismissed the proceedings without prejudice against respondent Castalia Portland Cement Co., which went into bankruptcy.

[2] Respondent Valley Forge Cement Co. is associated with the Institute only by reason of its affiliation with a member company.

We shall not now detail the numerous contentions urged against the order's validity. A statement of these contentions can best await the separate consideration we give them.

Jurisdiction

At the very beginning we are met with a challenge to the Commission's jurisdiction to entertain the complaint and to act on it. This contention is pressed by respondent Marquette Cement Manufacturing Co. and is relied upon by other respondents. Count I of the complaint is drawn under the provision in § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act which declares that "Unfair methods of competition . . . are hereby declared unlawful." Marquette contends that the facts alleged in Count I do not constitute "an unfair method of competition" within the meaning of § 5. Its argument runs this way: Count I in reality charges a combination to restrain trade. Such a combination constitutes an offense under § 1 of the Sherman Act which outlaws "Every . . . combination . . . in restraint of trade." 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. § 1. Section 4 of the Sherman Act provides that the attorney general shall institute suits under the Act on behalf of the United States, and that the federal district courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction of such suits. Hence, continue respondents, the Commission, whose jurisdiction is limited to "unfair methods of competition," is without power to institute proceedings or to issue an order with regard to the combination in restraint of trade charged in Count I. Marquette then argues that since the fact allegations of Count I are the chief reliance for the charge in Count II, this latter count also must be interpreted as charging a violation of the Sherman Act. Assuming, without deciding, that the conduct charged in each count constitutes a violation of the Sherman Act, we hold that the Commission does have jurisdiction to conclude that such conduct may also be an unfair method of competition and hence constitute a violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

As early as 1920 this Court considered it an "unfair method of competition" to engage in practices "against public policy because of their dangerous tendency unduly to hinder competition or create monopoly." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Gratz, 253 U. S. 421, 427. In 1922, the Court in Federal Trade Comm'n v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441, sustained a cease and desist order against a resale price maintenance plan because such a plan "necessarily constitutes a scheme which restrains the natural flow of commerce and the freedom of competition in the channels of interstate trade which it has been the purpose of all the anti-trust acts to maintain." Id. at 454. The Court, in holding that the scheme before it constituted an unfair method of competition, noted that the conduct in question was practically identical with that previously declared unlawful in Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373, and United States v. Schrader's Son, Inc., 252 U. S. 85, the latter a suit brought under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Again in 1926 this Court sustained a Commission unfair-method-of-competition order against defendants who had engaged in a price-fixing combination, a plain violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Federal Trade Comm'n v. Pacific States Paper Trade Assn., 273 U. S. 52. In 1941 we reiterated that certain conduct of a combination found to conflict with the policy of the Sherman Act could be suppressed by the Commission as an unfair method of competition. Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 312 U. S. 457, 465. The Commission's order was sustained in the Fashion Originators' case not only because the prohibited conduct violated the Clayton Act but also because the Commission's findings brought the "combination in its entirety well within the inhibition of the policies declared by the Sherman Act itself." In other cases this Court has pointed out many reasons which support interpretation of the language "unfair methods of competition" in § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act as including violations of the Sherman Act.[8] Thus it appears that soon after its creation the Commission began to interpret the prohibitions of § 5 as including those restraints of trade which also were outlawed by the Sherman Act,[4] and that this Court has consistently approved that interpretation of the Act.

Despite this long and consistent administrative and judicial construction of § 5, we are urged to hold that these prior interpretations were wrong and that the term "unfair methods of competition" should not be construed as embracing any conduct within the ambit of the Sherman Act. In support of this contention, Marquette chiefly relies upon its reading of the legislative history of the Commission Act. We have given careful consideration to this contention because of the earnestness with which it is pressed. Marquette points to particular statements of some of the Act's sponsors which, taken out of their context, might lend faint support to its contention that Congress did not intend the Commission to concern itself with conduct then punishable under the Sherman Act. But on the whole the Act's legislative history shows a strong congressional purpose not only to continue enforcement of the Sherman Act by the Department of Justice and the Federal District Courts but also to supplement that enforcement through the administrative process of the new Trade Commission. Far from being regarded as a rival of the Justice Department and the District Courts in dissolving combinations in restraint of trade, the new Commission was envisioned as an aid to them and was specifically authorized to assist them in the drafting of appropriate decrees in antitrust litigation.[5] All of the committee reports and the statements of those in charge of the Trade Commission Act reveal an abiding purpose to vest both the Commission and the courts with adequate powers to hit at every trade practice, then existing or thereafter contrived, which restrained competition or might lead to such restraint if not stopped in its incipient stages. These congressional purposes are revealed in the legislative history cited below, most of which is referred to in respondents' briefs.[6] We can conceive of no greater obstacle this Court could create to the fulfillment of these congressional purposes than to inject into every Trade Commission proceeding brought under § 5 and into every Sherman Act suit brought by the Justice Department a possible jurisdictional question.

We adhere to our former rulings. The Commission has jurisdiction to declare that conduct tending to restrain trade is an unfair method of competition even though the selfsame conduct may also violate the Sherman Act.

There is a related jurisdictional argument pressed by Marquette which may be disposed of at this time. While review of the Commission's order was pending in the Circuit Court of Appeals, the Attorney General filed a civil action in the Federal District Court for Denver, Colorado, to restrain the Cement Institute, Marquette and 88 other cement companies, including all of the present respondents, from violating § 1 of the Sherman Act. Much of the evidence before the Commission in this proceeding might also be relevant in that case, which, we are informed, has not thus far been brought to trial. Marquette urges that the Commission proceeding should now be dismissed because it is contrary to the public interest to force respondents to defend both a Commission proceeding and a Sherman Act suit based largely on the same alleged misconduct.

We find nothing to justify a holding that the filing of a Sherman Act suit by the Attorney General requires the termination of these Federal Trade Commission proceedings. In the first place, although all conduct violative of the Sherman Act may likewise come within the unfair trade practice prohibitions of the Trade Commission Act, the converse is not necessarily true. It has long been recognized that there are many unfair methods of competition that do not assume the proportions of Sherman Act violations. Federal Trade Comm'n v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., 291 U. S. 304; Federal Trade Comm'n v. Gratz, 253 U. S. 421, 427. Hence a conclusion that respondents' conduct constituted an unfair method of competition does not necessarily mean that their same activities would also be found to violate § 1 of the Sherman Act. In the second place, the fact that the same conduct may constitute a violation of both acts in nowise requires us to dismiss this Commission proceeding. Just as the Sherman Act itself permits the Attorney General to bring simultaneous civil and criminal suits against a defendant based on the same misconduct, so the Sherman Act and the Trade Commission Act provide the Government with cumulative remedies against activity detrimental to competition. Both the legislative history of the Trade Commission Act and its specific language indicate a congressional purpose, not to confine each of these proceedings within narrow, mutually exclusive limits, but rather to permit the simultaneous use of both types of proceedings. Marquette's objections to the Commission's jurisdiction are overruled.

Objections to Commission's Jurisdiction by Certain Respondents on Ground That They Were Not Engaged in Interstate Commerce

One other challenge to the Commission's jurisdiction is specially raised by Northwestern Portland and Superior Portland. The Commission found that "Northwestern Portland makes no sales or shipments outside the State of Washington," and that "Superior Portland, with few exceptions, makes sales and shipments outside the State of Washington only to Alaska." These two respondents contend that, since they did not engage in interstate commerce and since § 5 of the Trade Commission Act applies only to unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce, that the Commission was without jurisdiction to enter an order against them under Count I of the complaint. For this contention they chiefly rely on Federal Trade Comm'n v. Bunte Bros., 312 U. S. 349. They also argue that for the same reason the Commission lacked jurisdiction to enforce against them the price discrimination charge in Count II of the complaint.

We cannot sustain this contention. The charge against these respondents was not that they, apart from the other respondents, had engaged in unfair methods of competition and price discriminations simply by making intrastate sales. Instead, the charge was, as supported by the Commission's findings, that these respondents in combination with others agreed to maintain a delivered price system in order to eliminate price competition in the sale of cement in interstate commerce. The combination, as found, includes the Institute and cement companies located in many different states. The Commission has further found that "In general, said corporate respondents have maintained, and now maintain, a constant course of trade and commerce in cement among and between the several States of the United States." The fact that one or two of the numerous participants in the combination happen to be selling only within the borders of a single state is not controlling in determining the scope of the Commission's jurisdiction. The important factor is that the concerted action of all of the parties to the combination is essential in order to make wholly effective the restraint of commerce among the states.[7] The Commission would be rendered helpless to stop unfair methods of competition in the form of interstate combinations and conspiracies if its jurisdiction could be defeated on a mere showing that each conspirator had carefully confined his illegal activities within the borders of a single state. We hold that the Commission did have jurisdiction to make an order against Superior Portland and Northwestern Portland.

The Multiple Basing Point Delivered Price System

Since the multiple basing point delivered price system of fixing prices and terms of cement sales is the nub of this controversy, it will be helpful at this preliminary stage to point out in general what it is and how it works. A brief reference to the distinctive characteristics of "factory" or "mill prices" and "delivered prices" is of importance to an understanding of the basing point delivered price system here involved.

[7] See Ramsay Co. v. Bill Posters Assn., 260 U. S. 501, 511; Stevens Co. v. Foster & Kleiser Co., 311 U. S. 255, 260-261; United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293, 297-298.

Goods may be sold and delivered to customers at the seller's mill or warehouse door or may be sold free on board (f. o. b.) trucks or railroad cars immediately adjacent to the seller's mill or warehouse. In either event the actual cost of the goods to the purchaser is, broadly speaking, the seller's "mill price" plus the purchaser's cost of transportation. However, if the seller fixes a price at which he undertakes to deliver goods to the purchaser where they are to be used, the cost to the purchaser is the "delivered price." A seller who makes the "mill price" identical for all purchasers of like amount and quality simply delivers his goods at the same place (his mill) and for the same price (price at the mill). He thus receives for all f. o. b. mill sales an identical net amount of money for like goods from all customers. But a "delivered price" system creates complications which may result in a seller's receiving different net returns from the sale of like goods. The cost of transporting 500 miles is almost always more than the cost of transporting 100 miles. Consequently if customers 100 and 500 miles away pay the same "delivered price," the seller's net return is less from the more distant customer. This difference in the producer's net return from sales to customers in different localities under a "delivered price" system is an important element in the charge under Count I of the complaint and is the crux of Gount II.

The best known early example of a basing point price system was called "Pittsburgh plus." It related to the price of steel. The Pittsburgh price was the base price, Pittsburgh being therefore called a price basing point. In order for the system to work, sales had to be made only at delivered prices. Under this system the delivered price of steel from anywhere in the United States to a point of delivery anywhere in the United States was in general the Pittsburgh price plus the railroad freight rate from Pittsburgh to the point of delivery.[8] Take Chicago, Illinois, as an illustration of the operation and consequences of the system. A Chicago steel producer was not free to sell his steel at cost plus a reasonable profit. He must sell it at the Pittsburgh price plus the railroad freight rate from Pittsburgh to the point of delivery. Chicago steel customers were by this pricing plan thus arbitrarily required to pay for Chicago produced steel the Pittsburgh base price plus what it would have cost to ship the steel by rail from Pittsburgh to Chicago had it been shipped. The theoretical cost of this fictitious shipment became known as "phantom freight." But had it been economically possible under this plan for a Chicago producer to ship his steel to Pittsburgh, his "delivered price" would have been merely the Pittsburgh price, although he actually would have been required to pay the freight from Chicago to Pittsburgh. Thus the "delivered price" under these latter circumstances required a Chicago (non-basing point) producer to "absorb" freight costs. That is, such a seller's net returns became smaller and smaller as his deliveries approached closer and closer to the basing point.

Several results obviously flow from use of a single basing point system such as "Pittsburgh plus" originally was. One is that the "delivered prices" of all producers in every locality where deliveries are made are always the same regardless of the producers' different freight costs. Another is that sales made by a non-base mill for delivery at different localities result in net receipts to the seller which vary in amounts equivalent to the "phantom freight" included in, or the "freight absorption" taken from the "delivered price."

As commonly employed by respondents, the basing point system is not single but multiple. That is, instead of one basing point, like that in "Pittsburgh plus," a number of basing point localities are used. In the multiple basing point system, just as in the single basing point system, freight absorption or phantom freight is an element of the delivered price on all sales not governed by a basing point actually located at the seller's mill.[9] And all sellers quote identical delivered prices in any given locality regardless of their different costs of production and their different freight expenses. Thus the multiple and single systems function in the same general manner and produce the same consequences—identity of prices and diversity of net returns.[10] Such differences as there are in matters here pertinent are therefore differences of degree only.

[8] This was not true as to steel produced and shipped from Birmingham, Alabama. Under the system Birmingham steel had to be sold at the Pittsburgh price plus an arbitrary addition of $5 per ton. There were also other minor variations from the system as here described. See United States Steel Corp. et al., 8 F. T. C. 1.

[9] A base mill selling cement for delivery at a point outside the area in which its base price governs, and inside the area where another base mill's lower delivered price governs, adopts the latter's lower delivered price. The first base mill thus absorbs freight and becomes as to such sales a non-base mill.

Alleged Bias of the Commission

One year after the taking of testimony had been concluded and while these proceedings were still pending before the Commission, the respondent Marquette asked the Commission to disqualify itself from passing upon the issues involved. Marquette charged that the Commission had previously prejudged the issues, was "prejudiced and biased against the Portland cement industry generally," and that the industry and Marquette in particular could not receive a fair hearing from the Commission. After hearing oral argument the Commission refused to disqualify itself. This contention, repeated here, was also urged and rejected in the Circuit Court of Appeals one year before that court reviewed the merits of the Commission's order. Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 147 F. 2d 589.

Marquette introduced numerous exhibits intended to support its charges. In the main these exhibits were copies of the Commission's reports made to Congress or to the President, as required by § 6 of the Trade Commission Act. 15 U. S. C. § 46. These reports, as well as the testimony given by members of the Commission before congressional committees, make it clear that long before the filing of this complaint the members of the Commission at that time, or at least some of them, were of the opinion that the operation of the multiple basing point system as they had studied it was the equivalent of a price fixing restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act. We therefore decide this contention, as did the Circuit Court of Appeals, on the assumption that such an opinion had been formed by the entire membership of the Commission as a result of its prior official investigations. But we also agree with that court's holding that this belief did not disqualify the Commission.

In the first place, the fact that the Commission had entertained such views as the result of its prior ex parte investigations did not necessarily mean that the minds of its members were irrevocably closed on the subject of the respondents' basing point practices. Here, in contrast to the Commission's investigations, members of the cement industry were legally authorized participants in the hearings. They produced evidence—volumes of it. They were free to point out to the Commission by testimony, by cross-examination of witnesses, and by arguments, conditions of the trade practices under attack which they thought kept these practices within the range of legally permissible business activities.

Moreover, Marquette's position, if sustained, would to a large extent defeat the congressional purposes which prompted passage of the Trade Commission Act. Had the entire membership of the Commission disqualified in the proceedings against these respondents, this complaint could not have been acted upon by the Commission or by any other government agency. Congress has provided for no such contingency. It has not directed that the Commission disqualify itself under any circumstances, has not provided for substitute commissioners should any of its members disqualify, and has not authorized any other government agency to hold hearings, make findings, and issue cease and desist orders in proceedings against unfair trade practices.[11] Yet if Marquette is right, the Commission by making studies and filing reports in obedience to congressional command, completely immunized the practices investigated, even though they are "unfair," from any cease and desist order by the Commission or any other governmental agency.

[10] The Commission in its findings explained how the multiple basing point system affects a seller's net return on sales in different localities and how the delivered price is determined at any particular point. "Substantially all sales of cement by the corporate respondents are made on the basis of a delivered price; that is, at a price determined by the location at which actual delivery of the cement is made to the purchaser. In determining the delivered price which will be charged for cement at any given location, respondents use a multiple basing-point system. The formula used to make this system operative is that the delivered price at any location shall be the lowest combination of base price plus all-rail freight. Thus, if Mill A has a base price of $1.50 per barrel, its delivered price at each location where it sells cement will be $1.50 per barrel plus the all-rail freight from its mill to the point of delivery, except that when a sale is made for delivery at a location at which the combination of the base price plus all-rail freight from another mill is a lower figure, Mill A uses this lower combination so that its delivered price at such location will be the same as the delivered price of the other mill. At all locations where the base price of Mill A plus freight is the lowest combination, Mill A recovers $1.50 net at the mill, and at locations where the combination of base price plus freight of another mill is lower, Mill A shrinks its mill net sufficiently to equal that price. Under these conditions it is obvious that the highest mill net which can be recovered by Mill A is $1.50 per barrel, and on sales where it has been necessary to shrink its mill net in order to match the delivered price of another mill, its net recovery at the mill is less than $1.50." 37 F. T. C. at 147-148.

There is no warrant in the Act for reaching a conclusion which would thus frustrate its purposes. If the Commission's opinions expressed in congressionally required reports would bar its members from acting in unfair trade proceedings, it would appear that opinions expressed in the first basing point unfair trade proceedings would similarly disqualify them from ever passing on another. See Morgan v. United States, 313 U. S. 409, 421. Thus experience acquired from their work as commissioners would be a handicap instead of an advantage. Such was not the intendment of Congress. For Congress acted on a committee report stating: "It is manifestly desirable that the terms of the commissioners shall be long enough to give them an opportunity to acquire the expertness in dealing with these special questions concerning industry that comes from experience." Report of Committee on Interstate Commerce, No. 597, June 13, 1914, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 10-11.

Marquette also seems to argue that it was a denial of due process for the Commission to act in these proceedings after having expressed the view that industry-wide use of the basing point system was illegal. A number of cases are cited as giving support to this contention. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U. S. 510, is among them. But it provides no support for the contention. In that case Tumey had been convicted of a criminal offense, fined, and committed to jail by a judge who had a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in reaching his conclusion to convict. A criminal conviction by such a tribunal was held to violate procedural due process. But the Court there pointed out that most matters relating to judicial disqualification did not rise to a constitutional level. Id. at 523.

Neither the Tumey decision nor any other decision of this Court would require us to hold that it would be a violation of procedural due process for a judge to sit in a case after he had expressed an opinion as to whether certain types of conduct were prohibited by law. In fact, judges frequently try the same case more than once and decide identical issues each time, although these issues involve questions both of law and fact. Certainly, the Federal Trade Commission cannot possibly be under stronger constitutional compulsions in this respect than a court.[12]

The Commission properly refused to disqualify itself. We thus need not review the additional holding of the Circuit Court of Appeals that Marquette's objection on the ground of the alleged bias of the Commission was filed too late in the proceedings before that agency to warrant consideration.

Alleged Errors in re Introduction of Evidence

The complaint before the Commission, filed July 2, 1937, alleged that respondents had maintained an illegal combination for "more than eight years last past." In the Circuit Court of Appeals and in this Court the Government treated its case on the basis that the combination began in August, 1929, when the respondent Cement Institute was organized. The Government introduced much evidence over respondents' objections, however, which showed the activities of the cement industry for many years prior to 1929, some of it as far back as 1902. It also introduced evidence as to respondents' activities from 1933 to May 27, 1935, much of which related to the preparation and administration of the NRA Code for the cement industry pursuant to the National Industrial Recovery Act, 48 Stat. 195, held invalid by this Court May 27, 1935, in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U. S. 495. All of the testimony to which objection was made re-

[12] "Section Five of the Federal Trade Commission Act does not provide private persons with an administrative remedy for private wrongs." The Commission is not a court. It can render no judgment, civil or criminal. Federal Trade Comm'n, v. Klesner, 280 U. S. 19, 25; and see Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U. S. 602, 628; *Louisville & N. R. Co. v. lated to the initiation, development, and carrying on of the basing point practices.

Respondents contend that the pre-1929 evidence, especially that prior to 1919, is patently inadmissible with reference to a 1929 combination, many of whose alleged members were non-existent in 1919. They also urge that evidence of activities during the NRA period was improperly admitted because § 5 of Title I of the NRA provided that any action taken in compliance with the code provisions of an industry should be "exempt from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States." And some of the NRA period testimony relating to basing point practices did involve references to code provisions. The Government contends that evidence of both the pre-1929 and the NRA period activities of members of the cement industry tends to show a continuous course of concerted efforts on the part of the industry, or at least most of it, to utilize the basing point system as a means to fix uniform terms and prices at which cement would be sold, and that the Commission had properly so regarded this evidence. The Circuit Court of Appeals agreed with respondents that the Commission had erroneously considsidered both the NRA period evidence and the pre-1929 evidence in making its findings of the existence of a combination among respondents.

We conclude that both types of evidence were admissible for the purpose of showing the existence of a continuing combination among respondents to utilize the basing point pricing system.[13]

The Commission did not make its findings of post-1929 combination, in whole or in part, on the premise that any of respondents' pre-1929 or NRA code activities were illegal. The consideration given these activities by the Commission was well within the established judicial rule of evidence that testimony of prior or subsequent transactions, which for some reason are barred from forming the basis for a suit, may nevertheless be introduced if it tends reasonably to show the purpose and character of the particular transactions under scrutiny. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 46-47; United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 43-44. Here the trade practices of an entire industry were under consideration. Respondents, on the one hand, insisted that the multiple basing point delivered price system represented a natural evolution of business practices adopted by the different cement companies, not in concert, but separately in response to customers' needs and demands. That the separately adopted business practices produced uniform terms and conditions of sale in all localities was, so the respondents contended, nothing but an inevitable result of long-continued competition. On the other hand, the Government contended that, despite shifts in ownership of individual cement companies, what had taken place from 1902 to the date the complaint was filed showed continued concerted action on the part of all cement producers to develop and improve the basing point system so that it would automatically eliminate competition. In the Government's view the Institute when formed in 1929 simply took up the old practices for the old purpose and aided its member companies to carry it straight on through and beyond the NRA period. See Fort Howard Paper Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 156 F. 2d 899, 906.

Furthermore, administrative agencies like the Federal Trade Commission have never been restricted by the rigid rules of evidence. Interstate Commerce Comm'n v. Baird, 194 U. S. 25, 44. And of course rules which bar certain types of evidence in criminal or quasi-criminal cases are not controlling in proceedings like this, where the effect of the Commission's order is not to punish or to fasten liability on respondents for past conduct but to ban specific practices for the future in accordance with the general mandate of Congress.

The foregoing likewise largely answers respondents' contention that there was error in the admission of a letter written by one Treanor in 1934 to the chairman of the NRA code authority for the cement industry. Treanor, who died prior to the filing of the complaint, was at the time president of one of the respondent companies and also an active trustee of the Institute. In the letter he stated among other things that the cement industry was one "above all others that cannot stand free competition, that must systematically restrain competition or be ruined." The statement was made as part of his criticism of the cement industry's publicity campaign in defense of the basing point system. The relevance of this statement indicating this Institute official's informed judgment is obvious. That it might be only his conclusion does not render the statement inadmissible in this administrative proceeding.

[13] We need not here determine what protection was afforded respondents by the exemption from the antitrust laws conferred by the Act later held unconstitutional. Nor need we decide whether this provision also exempted respondents from the unfair methods of competition provisions of the Trade Commission Act. The Government does not press either contention here.

All contentions in regard to the introduction of testimony have been considered. None of them justify refusal to enforce this order.

The Old Cement Case

This Court's opinion in Cement Mfrs. Protective Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 588, known as the Old Cement case, is relied on by the respondents in almost every contention they present. We think it has little relevance, if any at all, to the issues in this case.

In that case the United States brought an action in the District Court to enjoin an alleged combination to violate § 1 of the Sherman Act. The respondents were the Cement Manufacturers Protective Association, four of its officers, and nineteen cement manufacturers. The District Court held hearings, made findings of fact, and issued an injunction against those respondents. This Court, with three justices dissenting, reversed upon a review of the evidence. It did so because the Government did not charge and the record did not show "any agreement or understanding between the defendants placing limitations on either prices or production," or any agreement to utilize the basing point system as a means of fixing prices. The Court said "But here the Government does not rely upon agreement or understanding, and this record wholly fails to establish, either directly or by inference, any concerted action other than that involved in the gathering and dissemination of pertinent information with respect to the sale and distribution of cement to which we have referred; and it fails to show any effect on price and production except such as would naturally flow from the dissemination of that information in the trade and its natural influence on individual action." Id. at 606. In the Old Cement case and in Maple Flooring Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 563, decided the same day, the Court's attention was focused on the rights of a trade association, despite the Sherman Act, openly to gather and disseminate statistics and information as to production costs, output, past prices, merchandise on hand, specific job contracts, freight rates, etc., so long as the Association did these things without attempts to foster agreements or concerted action with reference to prices, production, or terms of sale. Such associations were declared guiltless of violating the Sherman Act, because "in fact, no prohibited concert of action was found." Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 324 U. S. 726, 735.

The Court's holding in the Old Cement case would not have been inconsistent with a judgment sustaining the Commission's order here, even had the two cases been before this Court the same day. The issues in the present Commission proceedings are quite different from those in the Old Cement case, although many of the trade practices shown here were also shown there. In the first place, unlike the Old Cement case the Commission does here specifically charge a combination to utilize the basing point system as a means to bring about uniform prices and terms of sale. And here the Commission has focused attention on this issue, having introduced evidence on the issue which covers thousands of pages. Furthermore, unlike the trial court in the Old Cement case, the Commission has specifically found the existence of a combination among respondents to employ the basing point system for the purpose of selling at identical prices.

In the second place, individual conduct, or concerted conduct, which falls short of being a Sherman Act violation may as a matter of law constitute an "unfair method of competition" prohibited by the Trade Commission Act. A major purpose of that Act, as we have frequently said, was to enable the Commission to restrain practices as "unfair" which, although not yet having grown into Sherman Act dimensions would, most likely do so if left unrestrained. The Commission and the courts were to determine what conduct, even though it might then be short of a Sherman Act violation, was an "unfair method of competition." This general language was deliberately left to the "Commission and the courts" for definition because it was thought that "There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field"; that consequently, a definition that fitted practices known to lead towards an unlawful restraint of trade today would not fit tomorrow's new inventions in the field; and that for Congress to try to keep its precise definitions abreast of this course of conduct would be an "endless task."

See Federal Trade Commission v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., 291 U. S. 304, 310-312, and congressional committee reports there quoted.

These marked differences between what a court must decide in a Sherman Act proceeding and the duty of the Commission in determining whether conduct is to be classified as an unfair method of competition are enough in and of themselves to make the Old Cement decision wholly inapplicable to our problem in reviewing the findings in this case. That basic problem is whether the Commission made findings of concerted action, whether those findings are supported by evidence, and if so whether these findings are adequate as a matter of law to sustain the Commission's conclusion that the multiple basing point system as practiced constitutes an "unfair method of competition," because it either restrains free competition or is an incipient menace to it.

Findings and Evidence

It is strongly urged that the Commission failed to find, as charged in both counts of the complaint, that the respondents had by combination, agreements, or understandings among themselves utilized the multiple basing point delivered price system as a restraint to accomplish uniform prices and terms of sale. A subsidiary contention is that assuming the Commission did so find, there is no substantial evidence to support such a finding. We think that adequate findings of combination were made and that the findings have support in evidence.

The Commission's findings of fact set out at great length and with painstaking detail numerous concerted activities carried on in order to make the multiple basing point system work in such way that competition in quality, price and terms of sale of cement would be nonexistent, and that uniform prices, job contracts, discounts, and terms of sale would be continuously maintained. The Commission found that many of these activities were carried on by the Cement Institute, the industry's unincorporated trade association, and that in other instances the activities were under the immediate control of groups of respondents. Among the collective methods used to accomplish these purposes, according to the findings, were boycotts; discharge of uncooperative employees; organized opposition to the erection of new cement plants; selling cement in a recalcitrant price cutter's sales territory at a price so low that the recalcitrant was forced to adhere to the established basing point prices; discouraging the shipment of cement by truck or barge; and preparing and distributing freight rate books which provided respondents with similar figures to use as actual or "phantom" freight factors, thus guaranteeing that their delivered prices (base prices plus freight factors) would be identical on all sales whether made to individual purchasers under open bids or to governmental agencies under sealed bids. These are but a few of the many activities of respondents which the Commission found to have been done in combination to reduce or destroy price competition in cement. After having made these detailed findings of concerted action, the Commission followed them by a general finding that "the capacity, tendency, and effect of the combination maintained by the respondents herein in the manner aforesaid is to . . . promote and maintain their multiple basing point delivered-price system and obstruct and defeat any form of competition which threatens or tends to threaten the continued use and maintenance of said system and the uniformity of prices created and maintained by its use." [14] The Commission then concluded that "The aforesaid combination and acts and practices of respondents pursuant thereto and in connection therewith, as hereinabove found, under [14] Paragraph 26 of the Findings is as follows: "The Commission concludes from the evidence of record and therefore finds that the capacity, tendency, and effect of the combination maintained by the respondents herein in the manner aforesaid and the acts and practices performed thereunder and in connection therewith by said respondents, as set out herein, has been and is to hinder, lessen, restrain, and suppress competition in the sale and distribution of cement in, among, and between the several States of the United States; to deprive purchasers of cement, both private and governmental of the benefits of competition in price; to systematically maintain artificial and monopolistic methods and prices in the sale and distribution of cement, including common rate factors used and useful in the pricing of cement; to prevent purchasers from utilizing motor trucks or water carriers for the transportation of cement and from obtaining benefits which might accrue from the use of such transportation agencies; to require that purchases of cement be made on a delivered price basis, and to prevent and defeat efforts of purchasers to avoid this requirement; frequently to deprive agencies of the Federal Government of the benefits of all or a part of the lower land-grant rates available to such purchasers; to require certain agencies of the Federal Government to purchase their requirements of cement through dealers at higher prices than are available in direct purchases from manufacturers; to establish and maintain an agreed classification of the conditions and circumstances set forth, constitute unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act." And the Commission's cease and desist order prohibited respondents "from entering into, continuing, cooperating in, or carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy between and among any two or more of said respondents . . ." to do certain things there enumerated.

Thus we have a complaint which charged collective action by respondents designed to maintain a sales technique that restrained competition, detailed findings of collective activities by groups of respondents to achieve that end, then a general finding that respondents maintained the combination, and finally an order prohibiting the continuance of the combination. It seems impossible to conceive that anyone reading these findings in their entirety could doubt that the Commission found that respondents collectively maintained a multiple basing point delivered price system for the purpose of suppressing competition in cement sales. The findings are sufficient. The contention that they were not is without substance.

Disposition of this question brings us to the related contention that there was no substantial evidence to support the findings. We might well dispose of the contention as this Court dismissed a like one with reference to evidence and findings in a civil suit brought under the Sherman Act in Sugar Institute v. United States, 297 U. S. 553, 601: "After a hearing of extraordinary length, in which no pertinent fact was permitted to escape consideration, the trial court subjected the evidence to a thorough and acute analysis which has left but slight room for debate over matters of fact. Our examination of the record discloses no reason for overruling the court's findings in any matter essential to our decision." In this case, which involves the evidence and findings of the Federal Trade Commission, we likewise see no reason for upsetting the essential findings of the Commission. Neither do we find it necessary to refer to all the voluminous testimony in this record which tends to support the Commission's findings.

Although there is much more evidence to which reference could be made, we think that the following facts shown by evidence in the record, some of which are in dispute, are sufficient to warrant the Commission's finding of concerted action.

When the Commission rendered its decision there were about 80 cement manufacturing companies in the United States operating about 150 mills. Ten companies controlled more than half of the mills and there were substantial corporate affiliations among many of the others. This concentration of productive capacity made concerted action far less difficult than it would otherwise have been. The belief is prevalent in the industry that because of the standardized nature of cement, among other reasons, price competition is wholly unsuited to it. That belief is historic. It has resulted in concerted activities to devise means and measures to do away with competition in the industry. Out of those activities came the multiple basing point delivered price system. Evidence shows it to be a handy instrument to bring about elimination of any kind of price competition. The use of the multiple basing point delivered price system by the cement producers has been coincident with a situation whereby for many years, with rare exceptions, cement has been offered for sale in every given locality at identical prices and terms by all producers. Thousands of secret sealed bids have been received by public agencies which corresponded in prices of cement down to a fractional part of a penny.[15] customers who may purchase cement from manufacturers thereof; to maintain uniform terms and conditions of sale; to hinder and obstruct the sale of imported cement through restraints upon those who deal in such cement; and otherwise to promote and maintain their multiple basing-point delivered-price system and obstruct and defeat any form of competition which threatens or tends to threaten the continued use and maintenance of said system and the uniformity of prices created and maintained by its use." 37 F. T. C. 257-258.

[15] The following is one among many of the Commission's findings as to the identity of sealed bids:

An abstract of the bids for 6,000 barrels of cement to the United States Engineer Office at Tucumcari, New Mexico, opened April 23, 1936, shows the following:

Occasionally foreign cement has been imported, and cement dealers have sold it below the delivered price of the domestic product. Dealers who persisted in selling foreign cement were boycotted by the domestic producers. Officers of the Institute took the lead in securing pledges by producers not to permit sales f. o. b. mill to purchasers who furnished their own trucks, a practice regarded as seriously disruptive of the entire delivered price structure of the industry.

During the depression in the 1930's, slow business prompted some producers to deviate from the prices fixed by the delivered price system. Meetings were held by other producers; an effective plan was devised to punish the recalcitrants and bring them into line. The plan was simple but successful. Other producers made the recalcitrant's plant an involuntary base point. The base price was driven down with relatively insignificant losses to the producers who imposed the punitive basing point, but with heavy losses to the recalcitrant who had to make all its sales on this basis. In one instance, where a producer had made a low public bid, a punitive base point price was put on its plant and cement was reduced 10¢ per barrel; further reductions quickly followed until the base price at which this recalcitrant had to sell its cement dropped to 75¢ per barrel, scarcely one-half of its former base price of $1.45. Within six weeks after the base price hit 75¢ capitulation occurred and the recalcitrant joined a portland cement association. Cement in that locality then bounced back to $1.15, later to $1.35, and finally to $1.75.

The foregoing are but illustrations of the practices shown to have been utilized to maintain the basing point price system. Respondents offered testimony that cement is a standardized product, that "cement is cement," that no differences existed in quality or usefulness, and that purchasers demanded delivered price quotations because of the high cost of transportation from mill to dealer. There was evidence, however, that the Institute and its members had, in the interest of eliminating competition, suppressed information as to the variations in quality that sometimes exist in different cements.[16] Respondents introduced the testimony of economists to the effect that competition alone could lead to the evolution of a multiple basing point system of uniform delivered prices and terms of sale for an industry with a standardized product and with relatively high freight costs. These economists testified that for the above reasons no inferences of collusion, agreement, or understanding could be drawn from the admitted fact that cement prices of all United States producers had for many years almost invariably been the same in every given locality in the country. There was also considerable testimony by other economic experts that the multiple basing point system of delivered prices as employed by respondents contravened accepted economic principles and could only have been maintained through collusion.

The Commission did not adopt the views of the economists produced by the respondents. It decided that even though competition might tend to drive the price of standardized products to a uniform level, such a tendency alone could not account for the almost perfect identity in prices, discounts, and cement containers which had prevailed for so long a time in the cement industry. The Commission held that the uniformity and absence of competition in the industry were the results of understandings or agreements entered into or carried out by concert of the Institute and the other respondents. It may possibly be true, as respondents' economists testified, that cement producers will, without agreement express or implied and without understanding explicit or tacit, always and at all times (for such has been substantially the case here) charge for their cement precisely, to the fractional part of a penny, the price their competitors charge. Certainly it runs counter to what many people have believed, namely, that without agreement, prices will vary—that the desire to sell will sometimes be so strong that a seller will be willing to lower his prices and take his chances. We therefore hold that the Commission was not compelled to accept the views of respondents' economist-witnesses that active competition was bound to produce uniform cement prices. The Commission was authorized to find understanding, express or implied, from evidence that the industry's Institute actively worked, in cooperation with various of its members, to maintain the multiple basing point delivered

[16] See Sugar Institute v. United States, 297 U. S. 553, 600: "The fact that, because sugar is a standardized commodity, there is a strong tendency to uniformity of price, makes it the more important that such opportunities as may exist for fair competition should not be impaired."

price system; that this pricing system is calculated to produce, and has produced, uniform prices and terms of sale throughout the country; and that all of the respondents have sold their cement substantially in accord with the pattern required by the multiple basing point system.[17]

Some of the respondents contend that particularly as to them crucial findings of participation by them in collective action to eliminate price competition and to bring about uniformity of cement prices are without testimonial support. On this ground they seek to have the proceedings dismissed as to them even though there may be adequate evidence to sustain the Commission's findings and order as to other respondents. The Commission rejected their contentions; the Circuit Court of Appeals did not consider them in its opinion. Those respondents whose individual contentions in this respect deserve special mention are central and southern California cement companies; Superior Portland Cement Company and Northwestern Portland Cement Company, both of the State of Washington; Huron Portland Cement Company, which does business in the Great Lakes region; and Marquette Cement Manufacturing Company with plants in Illinois and Missouri.

These companies support their separate contentions for particularized consideration by pointing out among other things that there was record evidence which showed differences between many of their sales methods and those practiced by other respondents. Each says that there was no direct evidence to connect it with all of the practices found to have been used by the Institute and other respondents to achieve delivered price uniformity.

The record does show such differences as those suggested. It is correct to say, therefore, that the sales practices of these particular respondents, and perhaps of other respondents as well, were not at all times precisely like the sales practices of all or any of the others. For example, the Commission found that in 1929 all of the central California mills became basing points. There was evidence that the Institute's rate books did not extend to the states in which some of the California companies did business. The Commission found that "In Southern California the basing point system of pricing is modified by an elaborate system of zone prices applicable in certain areas," that the California system does not require separate calculations to determine the delivered price at each destination, but that complete price lists were published by the companies showing delivered prices at substantially all delivery points. Northwestern and Superior assert that among other distinctive practices of theirs, they were willing to and did bid for government contracts on a mill price rather than a delivered price basis. Huron points out that it permitted the use of trucks to deliver cement, which practice, far from being consistent with the plan of others to maintain the basing point delivered price formulas, was frowned on by the Institute and others as endangering the success of the plan. Marquette emphasizes that it did not follow all the practices used to carry out the anti-competition plan, and urges that although the Commission rightly found that it had upon occasion undercut its competitors, it erroneously found that its admitted abandonment of price cutting was due to the combined pressure of other respondents, including the Institute.

What these particular respondents emphasize does serve to underscore certain findings which show that some respondents were more active and influential in the combination than were others,[18] and that some companies probably unwillingly abandoned

[17] It is enough to warrant a finding of a "combination" within the meaning of the Sherman Act, if there is evidence that persons, with knowledge that concerted action was contemplated and invited, give adherence to and then participate in a scheme. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 226-227; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 275; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U. S. 707, 722-723; United States v. U. S. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, 393-394. See United States Maltsters Assn. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 152 F. 2d 161, 164: "We are of the view that the Commission's findings that a price fixing agreement existed must be accepted. Any other conclusion would do violence to common sense and the realities of the situation. The fact that petitioners utilized a system which enabled them to deliver malt at every point of destination at exactly the same price is a persuasive circumstance in itself. Especially is this so when it is considered that petitioners' plants are located in four different states and that the barley from which the malt is manufactured is procured from eight or nine different states." See also Milk & Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 152 F. 2d 478 481; Fort Howard Paper Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 156 F. 2d 899, 907.

[18] For example, there was evidence which showed that Huron's officials participated in meetings held in connection with another respondent's practices deemed inimical to the policy of non-competition. As a result of that meeting the offending company agreed that it would "play the game 100%"; that it would not countenance "chiseling"; that it would not knowingly invade territory of its competitors, or "tear down the price structure."

competitive practices and entered into the combination. But none of the distinctions mentioned, or any other differences relied on by these particular respondents, justifies a holding that there was no substantial evidence to support the Commission's findings that they cooperated with all the others to achieve the ultimate objective of all—the elimination of price competition in the sale of cement. These respondents' special contentions only illustrate that the Commission was called upon to resolve factual issues as to each of them in the light of whatever relevant differences in their practices were shown by the evidence. For aside from the testimony indicating the differences in their individual sales practices, there was abundant evidence as to common practices of these respondents and the others on the basis of which the Commission was justified in finding cooperative conduct among all to achieve delivered price uniformity.

The evidence commonly applicable to these and the other respondents showed that all were members of the Institute and that the officers of some of these particular respondents were or had been officers of the Institute. We have already sustained findings that the Institute was organized to maintain the multiple basing point system as one of the "customs and usages" of the industry and that it participated in numerous activities intended to eliminate price competition through the collective efforts of the respondents. Evidence before the Commission also showed that the delivered prices of these respondents, like those of all the other respondents, were, with rare exceptions, identical with the delivered prices of all their competitors. Furthermore, there was evidence that all of these respondents, including those who sold cement on a zone basis in sections of southern California, employed the multiple basing point delivered price system on a portion of their sales.

Our conclusion is that there was evidence to support the Commission's findings that all of the respondents, including the California companies, Northwestern Portland and Superior Portland, Huron and Marquette, cooperated in carrying out the objectives of the basing point delivered price system.

Unfair Methods of Competition

We sustain the Commission's holding that concerted maintenance of the basing point delivered price system is an unfair method of competition prohibited by the Federal Trade Commission Act. In so doing we give great weight to the Commission's conclusion, as this Court has done in other cases. Federal Trade Comm'n v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., 291 U. S. 304, 314; Federal Trade Comm'n v. Pacific States Paper Trade Assn., 273 U. S. 52, 63. In the Keppel case the Court called attention to the express intention of Congress to create an agency whose membership would at all times be experienced, so that its conclusions would be the result of an expertness coming from experience. We are persuaded that the Commission's long and close examination of the questions it here decided has provided it with precisely the experience that fits it for performance of its statutory duty. The kind of specialized knowledge Congress wanted its agency to have was an expertness that would fit it to stop at the threshold every unfair trade practice—that kind of practice, which if left alone, "destroys competition and establishes monopoly." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Raladam Co., 283 U. S. 643, 647, 650. And see Federal Trade Comm'n v. Raladam Co., 316 U. S. 149, 152.

We cannot say that the Commission is wrong in concluding that the delivered-price-system as here used provides an effective instrument which, if left free for use of the respondents, would result in complete destruction of competition and the establishment of monopoly in the cement industry. That the basing point price system may lend itself to industry-wide anti-competitive practices is illustrated in the following among other cases: United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. 364, Sugar Institute v. United States, 297 U. S. 553. We uphold the Commission's conclusion that the basing point delivered price system employed by respondents is an unfair trade practice which the Trade Commission may suppress.[19]

The Price Discrimination Charge in Count Two

The Commission found that respondents' combination to use the multiple basing point

[19] While we hold that the Commission's findings of combination were supported by evidence, that does not mean that existence of a "combination" is an indispensable ingredient of an "unfair method of competition" under the Trade Commission Act. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441, 455.

delivered price system had effected systematic price discrimination in violation of § 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. 49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C. § 13. Section 2 (a) of that Act declares it to "be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce . . . either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality . . . where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them . . ." Section 2 (b) provides that proof of discrimination in price (selling the same kind of goods cheaper to one purchaser than to another), makes out a prima facie case of violation, but permits the seller to rebut "the prima facie case thus made by showing that his lower price . . . was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor . . ."

The Commission held that the varying mill nets received by respondents on sales between customers in different localities constituted a "discrimination in price between different purchasers" within the prohibition of § 2 (a), and that the effect of this discrimination was the substantial lessening of competition between respondents. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the Commission on this count. It agreed that respondents' prices were unlawful insofar as they involved the collection of phantom freight, but it held that prices involving only freight absorption came within the "good faith" proviso of § 2 (b).

The respondents contend that the differences in their net returns from sales in different localities which result from use of the multiple basing point delivered price system are not price discriminations within the meaning of § 2 (a). It held that these net return differences are price discriminations prohibited by § 2 (a), they contend that the discriminations were justified under § 2 (b) because "made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor." Practically all the arguments presented by respondents in support of their contentions were considered by this Court and rejected in 1945 in Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 324 U. S. 726, and in the related case of Federal Trade Comm'n v. Staley Co., 324 U. S. 746. As stated in the Corn Products opinion at 730, certiorari was granted in those two cases because the "questions involved" were "of importance in the administration of the Clayton Act in view of the widespread use of basing point price systems." For this reason the questions there raised were given thorough consideration. Consequently, we see no reason for again reviewing the questions that were there decided.

In the Corn Products case the Court in holding illegal a single basing point system specifically reserved decision upon the legality under the Clayton Act of a multiple basing point price system, but only in view of the "good faith" proviso of § 2 (b), and referred at that point to the companion Staley opinion. 324 U. S. at 735. The latter case held that a seller could not justify the adoption of a competitor's basing point price system under § 2 (b) as a good faith attempt to meet the latter's equally low price. Thus the combined effect of the two cases was to forbid the adoption for sales purposes of any basing point pricing system. It is true that the Commission's complaint in the Corn Products and Staley cases simply charged the individual respondents with discrimination in price through use of a basing point price system, and did not, as here, allege a conspiracy or combination to use that system. But the holdings in those two cases that § 2 forbids a basing point price system are equally controlling here, where the use of such a system is found to have been the result of a combination. Respondents deny, however, that the Corn Products and Staley cases passed on the questions they here urge.

Corn Products Co. was engaged in the manufacture and sale of glucose. It had two plants, one in Chicago, one in Kansas City. Both plants sold "only at delivered prices, computed by adding to a base price at Chicago the published freight tariff from Chicago to the several points of delivery, even though deliveries are in fact made from their factory at Kansas City as well as from their Chicago factory." 324 U. S. at 729. This price system we held resulted in Corn Products Co. receiving from different purchasers different net amounts corresponding to differences in the amounts of phantom freight collected or of actual freight charges absorbed. We further held that "price discriminations are necessarily involved where the price basing point is distant from the point of production," because in such situations prices "usually include an item of unearned or phantom freight or require the absorption of freight with the consequent variations in the seller's net factory prices. Since such freight differentials bear no relation to the actual cost of delivery, they are systematic discriminations prohibited by Section 2 (a) whenever they have the defined effect upon competition." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Staley, supra at 750-751. This was a direct holding that a pricing system involving both phantom freight and freight absorption violates § 2 (a) if under that system prices are computed for products actually shipped from one locality on the fiction that they were shipped from another. And this Court made the holding despite arguments, which are now repeated here, that in passing the Robinson-Patman Act, Congress manifested its purpose to sanction such pricing systems; that this Court had approved the system in Maple Flooring Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 563, and in Cement Mfrs. Assn. v. United States, 268 U. S. 588; and that there was no discrimination under this system between buyers at the same point of delivery.

Respondents attempt to distinguish their multiple basing point pricing system from those previously held unlawful by pointing out that in some situations their system involves neither phantom freight nor freight absorption; for example, sales by a base mill at its base price plus actual freight from the mill to the point of delivery involve neither phantom freight nor freight absorption. But the Corn Products pricing system which was condemned by this Court related to a base mill, that at Chicago, as well as to a non-base mill, at Kansas City. The Court did not permit this fact to relieve the pricing system from application of § 2, or to require any modification of the Commission's order. So here, we could not require the Commission to attempt to distinguish between sales made by a base mill involving actual freight costs and all other sales made by both base and non-base mills, when all mills adhere to a common pricing system.

Section 2 (b) permits a single company to sell one customer at a lower price than it sells to another if the price is "made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor." But this does not mean that § 2 (b) permits a seller to use a sales system which constantly results in his getting more money for like goods from some customers than he does from others. We held to the contrary in the Staley case. There we said that the Act "speaks only of the seller's 'lower' price and of that only to the extent that it is made 'in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor.' The Act thus places emphasis on individual competitive situations, rather than upon a general system of competition." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Staley, supra at 753. Each of the respondents, whether all its mills were basing points or not, sold some cement at prices determined by the basing point formula and governed by other base mills. Thus, all respondents to this extent adopted a discriminatory pricing system condemned by § 2. As this in itself was evidence of the employment of the multiple basing point system by the respondents as a practice rather than as a good faith effort to meet "individual competitive situations," we think the Federal Trade Commission correctly concluded that the use of this cement basing point system violated the Act. Nor can we discern under these circumstances any distinction between the "good faith" proviso as applied to a situation involving only phantom freight and one involving only freight absorption. Neither comes within its terms.

We hold that the Commission properly concluded that respondents' pricing system results in price discriminations. Its finding that the discriminations substantially lessened competition between respondents and that they were not made in good faith to meet a competitor's price are supported by evidence. Accordingly, the Commission was justified in issuing a cease and desist order against a continuation of the unlawful discriminatory pricing system.

The Order

There are several objections to the Commission's cease and desist order. We consider the objections, having in mind that the language of its prohibitions should be clear and precise in order that they may be understood by those against whom they are directed. See Illinois Commerce Comm'n v. Thomson, 318 U. S. 675, 685. But we also have in mind that the Commission has a wide discretion generally in the choice of remedies to cope with trade problems entrusted to it by the Commission Act. Jacob Siegel Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 327 U. S. 608, 611-613.

There is a special reason, however, why courts should not lightly modify the Commission's orders made in efforts to safeguard a competitive economy. Congress when it passed the Trade Commission Act felt that courts needed the assistance of men trained to combat monopolistic practices in the framing of judicial decrees in antitrust litigation. Congress envisioned a commission trained in this type of work by experience in carrying out the functions imposed upon it.[29] To this end it provided in § 7 of the Act, 15 U. S. C. § 47, that courts might, if it should be concluded that the Government was entitled to a decree in an antitrust case, refer that case "to the Commission, as a master in chancery, to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree therein." The Court could then adopt or reject such a report.

In the present proceeding the Commission has exhibited the familiarity with the competitive problems before it which Congress originally anticipated the Commission would achieve from its experience. The order it has prepared is we think clear and comprehensive. At the same time the prohibitions in the order forbid no activities except those which if continued would directly aid in perpetuating the same old unlawful practices. Nor do we find merit to the charges of surplusage in the order's terms.

Most of the objections to the order appear to rest on the premise that its terms will bar an individual cement producer from selling cement at delivered prices such that its net return from one customer will be less than from another, even if the particular sale be made in good faith to meet the lower price of a competitor. The Commission disclaims that the order can possibly be so understood. Nor do we so understand it. As we read the order, all of its separate prohibiting paragraphs and subparagraphs, which need not here be set out, are modified and limited by a preamble. This preamble directs that all of the respondents "do forthwith cease and desist from entering into, continuing, cooperating in, or carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination or conspiracy between and among any two or more of said respondents, or between any one or more of said respondents and others not parties hereto, to do or perform any of the following things . . . ." Then follow the prohibitory sentences. It is thus apparent that the order by its terms is directed solely at concerted, not individual activity on the part of the respondents.

Respondents have objected to the phrase "planned common course of action" in the preamble. The objection is twofold; first, that it adds nothing to the words that immediately follow it; and second, that if it does add anything, "the Commission should be required to state what this novel phrase means in this order and what it adds to the four words." It seems quite clear to us what the phrase means. It is merely an emphatic statement that the Commission is prohibiting concerted action—planned concerted action. The Commission chose a phrase perhaps more readily understood by businessmen than the accompanying legal words of like import.

Then there is objection to that phrase in the preamble which would prevent respondents, or any of them, from doing the prohibited things with "others not parties hereto." We see no merit in this objection. The Commission has found that the cement producers have from time to time secured the aid of others outside the industry who are not parties to this proceeding in carrying out their program for preserving the basing point pricing system as an instrument to suppress competition. Moreover, there will very likely be changes in the present ownership of cement mills, and the construction of new mills in the future may be reasonably anticipated. In view of these facts, the Commission was authorized to make its order broad enough effectively to restrain respondents from combining with others as well as among themselves.

[29] In speaking of the authority granted the Commission to aid the courts in drafting antitrust decrees, the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce said:

"These powers, partly administrative and partly quasi-judicial, are of great importance and will bring both to the Attorney General and to the court the aid of special expert experience and training in matters regarding which neither the Department of Justice nor the courts can be expected to be proficient.

"With the exception of the Knight case, the Supreme Court has never failed to condemn and to break up any organization formed in violation of the Sherman law which has been brought to its attention; but the decrees of the court, while declaring the law satisfactorily as to the dissolution of the combinations, have apparently failed in many instances in their accomplishment simply because the courts and the Department of Justice have lacked the expert knowledge and experience necessary to be applied to the dissolution of the combinations and the reassembling of the divided elements in harmony with the spirit of the law." Sen. Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 12 (1914).

One other specific objection to the order will be noted. Paragraph 1 prohibits respondents from "quoting or selling cement pursuant to or in accordance with any other plan or system which results in identical price quotations or prices for cement at points of quotation or sale or to particular purchasers by respondents using such plan or system, or which prevents purchasers from finding any advantage in price in dealing with one or more of the respondents against any of the other respondents." This paragraph like all the others in the order is limited by the preamble which refers to concerted conduct in accordance with agreement or planned common course of action. The paragraph is merely designed to forbid respondents from acting in harmony to bring about national uniformity in whatever fashion they may seek by collective action to achieve that result. We think that no one would find ambiguity in this language who concluded in good faith to abandon the old practices. There is little difference in effect between paragraph 1 to which objection is here raised and paragraph 5 which was sustained as proper in Federal Trade Comm'n v. Beech-Nut Pkg. Co., 257 U. S. 441, 456 (1922), one of the first Trade Commission cases to come before this Court. Paragraph 5 in the Beech-Nut case read: ". . . by utilizing any other equivalent cooperative means of accomplishing the maintenance of prices fixed by the company."

Many other arguments have been presented by respondents. All have been examined, but we find them without merit.

The Commission's order should not have been set aside by the Circuit Court of Appeals. Its judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded to that court with directions to enforce the order.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Dissenting Opinion

MR. JUSTICE BURTON, dissenting: While this dissent is written with special reference to case No. 23 against The Cement Institute, et al., its conclusions apply to cases Nos. 23-34, all of which were considered together.

It is important to note that this Court has disagreed with the conclusions of the court below as to the material facts constituting the premise on which that court and this have based their respective conclusions. Accordingly, this Court has neither reversed nor directly passed upon the principal conclusion of law reached by the court below. The court below concluded that there was not sufficient evidence to support a finding by the Federal Trade Commission of the existence of that combination among the respondents to restrain the competition in price that was charged in both counts of the complaint.[1] The court below even doubted that the Commission had clearly stated that it found such a combination existed. However, rather than send the case back to the Commission for clarification of the Commission's findings of fact, the Court of Appeals assumed that those findings did state that such a combination existed. The court then concluded that, even if the Commission had so found, there was not sufficient evidence to support the finding.[2] Accordingly, the court below applied the law of the case to a set of facts that did not include such a combination. On that basis, it held that the Commission's order to cease and desist should be set aside. I agree with the court below in both of these

[1] ". . . For more than eight years last past, respondents have maintained and now have in effect a combination among themselves to hinder, lessen, restrict and restrain competition in price, among producing respondents in the course of their aforesaid commerce among the states. The said combination is made effective by mutual understanding or agreement to employ, and by the actual employment of, the methods and practices set forth in Paragraphs Five to Seven inclusive, of this Count." Count I, Paragraph Four, of complaint.

". . . As Paragraphs One to Five, inclusive, of Count II of this complaint the Commission hereby incorporates Paragraphs One to Five, inclusive, of Count I to precisely the same extent as if each and all of them were set forth in full and repeated verbatim in this Count." Count II, Paragraphs One to Five, inclusive, of complaint. 37 F. T. C. at pp. 102, 117.

[2] The Court of Appeals considered it a "highly controverted issue" as to whether the findings as made by the Commission, even if supported by sufficient evidence in the record, would "sustain the charge of combination alleged in the complaint." 157 F. 2d 533, 543. That court then said that if—

"this were an ordinary proceeding we would return it to the Commission for the purpose of revising its findings if it could and so desired in the light of what we have said. However, we are confronted with what might be termed an extraordinary situation. As already observed, it will soon be ten years since this proceeding was initiated. . . . We think the case should be on its way up and not down. For this reason we shall not return it to the Commission but shall proceed to decide the legal issues involved." Id. at p. 553.

conclusions.[3] On the other hand, this Court today has held not only that the Commission found the existence of the combination as charged, but that such finding is sufficiently supported by evidence in the record. This Court accordingly has applied the law of the case to a set of facts which includes a combination among the respondents to restrain competition in price as alleged in the complaint. The resulting effect is that, while the court below has held that without such a combination there was not the alleged violation either of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act[4] or of § 2 of the amended Clayton Act,[5] yet on the other hand, this Court has held that, including such a combination, there was a violation of each of those Sections to the extent charged in the several cases. This Court, therefore, has not here determined the relation, if any, of either of the foregoing statutes to the absorption of freight charges by individuals when not participating in a combination of the kind charged by the Commission.[6]

49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C. § 13.

[6] The final section of the opinion of the Court makes appropriate disclaimers as to the breadth of the Commission's order and of its own decision sustaining that order. Among these is the statement that "the order by its terms is directed solely at concerted, not individual activity on the part of the respondents." These disclaimers are further supported by such statements as the following in the brief filed for the Commission in this Court:

"It is plain that under this order there is a violation of its provisions only in the event that there is a 'planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy' to which a respondent is a party to do something specified in the numbered paragraphs of the order. This is an essential qualification of the prohibitions of these paragraphs. The order therefore leaves each respondent free —provided he acts individually and with that variability in action respecting particular competitive situations which is characteristic of genuine competitive endeavor and a free market—to absorb freight in order to meet a competitor's low price or to sell at a delivered price

The Commission based its conclusion upon its finding of the existence of the combination charged in its complaint.[7] The court below was in a position to, and did, judicially examine the record at length, hear extended argument upon it and pass upon the many inferences to be drawn from the evidence it contained. In the light of that court's recent experience with many cases in this particular field of the law, and of what it has described as its "long and careful study of the situation," it concluded that the evidence was not sufficient to support a finding of the combination charged. Its opinion reviewed the evidence and pointed out many weaknesses in the inferences upon which the Commission had based its finding of the existence of the alleged unlawful combination.[8]

The absence of sufficient evidence to support the conclusions of the Commission was especially impressive in the cases concerning the central California group, the southern California group, the Washington-Oregon group[9] and the Huron

"What the order does is to bar acting in concert in adopting, continuing, or implementing the multiple basing-point delivered-price system or any similar system which necessarily operates to suppress price competition. The order is aimed at uprooting the pricing system which has flourished by virtue of the agreement among respondents, charged and found, to stifle price competition by selling cement at identical prices.

"The error of the court below is epitomized in its statement that 'this court is now urged to hold that the [multiple basing-point delivered-price] system is illegal per se, and to require that cement be sold on an f. o. b. plant basis' . . . . The system as such was not attacked; what was attacked was agreement to maintain and implement the system and to eliminate price competition.

". . . Had the Commission inferred agreement from the system alone, it might loosely be said that the system itself was attacked as illegal per se. But this is not what the Commission did. Its searching inquiry disclosed in specific detail the collective action which had been taken to implement and continue the system. And from all these facts, as well as the existence of the system itself, the Commission found combination among respondents to suppress price competition."

The statement by this Court, in its note 19, to the effect that the Court does not hold "that existence of a 'combination' is an indispensable ingredient of an 'unfair method of competition' under the Trade Commission Act" is accompanied by a citation which shows that that statement is one of general application and that it is not intended as a denial that the combination found by the Commission in this case is not a highly material and possibly decisive factor in this particular case.

[7] See paragraph twenty-six of the Commission's "Findings as to Facts and Conclusion":

". . . The Commission concludes from the evidence of record and therefore finds that the capacity, tendency, and effect of the combination maintained by the respondents herein in the manner aforesaid and the acts and practices performed thereunder and in connection therewith by said respondents, as set out herein, has been and is to hinder, lessen, restrain, and suppress competition in the sale and distribution of cement in, among, and between the several States of the United States; to deprive purchasers of cement, both private and governmental, of the benefits of competition in price; to systematically maintain artificial and monopolistic methods and prices in the sale and distribution of cement, including common rate factors used and useful in the pricing of cement; . . . ." 37 F. T. C. at p. 257.

The Commission followed this paragraph twenty-six immediately with the following conclusion of law:

"The aforesaid combination and acts and practices of respondents pursuant thereto and in connection therewith, as hereinabove found, under the conditions and circumstances set forth, constitute unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act; and the discriminations in price by respondents, as hereinabove set out, constitute violations of subsection (a) of Section 2 of an Act of Congress entitled 'An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes,' approved October 15, 1914 (the Clayton Act), as amended by Act approved June 19, 1936 (the Robinson-Patman Act)." Id. at p. 258.

[8] A further review of the insufficiently supported inferences would be of little value here. By way of illustration, however, it may be noted that the Commission and this Court, in its note 15, have emphasized the fact that secret sealed bids for 6,000 barrels of cement were received by a public agency from ten or more of the respondent companies and that the bid of each company was precisely $3.286854 a barrel. Such a fractional identity of price would, on its face, create an inference of collusion. However, the Commission failed to explain, as has the court below, that the highly fractional figure merely reflected the freight charge. The bid, apart from the freight charge, was $2.10 per barrel while "the land grant freight rate to which the government was entitled from the nearest mill of the eleven bidders was $1.1865854 [$1.186854] per barrel." Aetna Portland Cement Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 157 F. 2d 533, 567.

The southern California group to:

Monolith Portland Cement Company,
Riverside Cement Company,
Southwestern Portland Cement Company (Victorville, California, plant).

The Washington-Oregon group to:

The decision of the Commission and of this Court even in those cases was made dependent upon the conclusion of the existence of a combination, however attenuated the basis for that conclusion might be.[10] The cease and desist orders in all of these cases are therefore to be regarded as based upon the unique and extended record presented in this case, including what this Court refers to as "abundant evidence as to common practices of these respondents and the others on the basis of which the Commission was justified in finding cooperative conduct among all to achieve delivered price uniformity."

On the view of the evidence taken by the court below and by me, that evidence does not support the Commission's finding of the combination as charged. Unlike the Commission and the majority of this Court, the lower court and I, therefore, have faced the further issue presented by the Commission's charges unsupported by a finding of the alleged combination. This has led us to consider an issue quite different from that decided by this Court today. That issue lies within the long-established and widespread practice by individuals of bona fide competition by freight absorption with which practice Congress has declined to interfere, although asked to do so.[11] This is the field where a producer, for his own purposes and without collusion, often ships his product to a customer who, in terms of freight charges, is located nearer to one or more of the producer's competitors than to the producer himself. In selling to such a customer, this producer is at an obvious freight disadvantage. To meet the lower delivered-price of his competitor, the producer, therefore, reduces his delivered-price in that area by a sum sufficient to absorb his freight disadvantage. He might do this for many reasons. For example, this customer might be such a large customer that the volume of his orders would yield such a return to the producer that the producer, by distributing his fixed charges over the resultingly increased volume of business, could absorb the freight differential without loss of profit to his business as a whole and without raising any charges to his other customers. The securing of this particular business might even enable the producer to reduce his own basic factory price to all his customers. It might make the difference between a profitable and a losing business, resulting in the producer's solvency or bankruptcy. If the advantage to be derived from this customer's business were not sufficient, in itself, thus completely to absorb the freight differential, the producer might absorb all or part of such differential by a reduction in his net earnings without affecting his other customers. Whether or not he would be justified in absorbing any or all of this freight differential by increasing his charges to other customers, in his own freight-advantage area, raises a separate question as to the validity of such an increase. The Commission and the majority of this Court did not reach the question of individual and independent absorptions of freight charges by one or more producers to meet lower prices of competitors in such competitors' respective areas of freight advantage.

[10] In a general finding the Commission indicated that the evidence concerning certain of the respondent companies was less conclusive than that relating to some of the other respondents.

"Some of the respondents have been parties to substantially all of these activities; other respondents have participated in a lesser degree, or fully or partially for shorter periods of time; other respondents have been mere followers, adopting and supporting the practices of their more active associates; and a few respondents have from time to time, for various reasons, participated only reluctantly in some of the practices, and have occasionally opposed for a time particular instances of group action." [11] "Furthermore, the basing point price system has been in use by industry for almost a half century. There has been and is a marked diversity of opinion among economists, lawmakers and people generally as to whether it is good or bad. Numerous bills have been introduced in Congress seeking to outlaw its use. Countless time has been spent in hearings by Congressional committees, before whom it has been assailed and defended. The pages of the Congressional Record bear mute but indisputable proof of the fact that Congress has repeatedly refused to declare its use illegal. There is no occasion to relate this Congressional history. It is a matter of common and general knowledge. In the Corn Products case, the court in commenting upon some of this legislative history stated (324 U. S. at page 737, 65 S. Ct. at page 967, 89 L. Ed. 1320): 'We think this legislative history indicates only that Congress was unwilling to require f. o. b. factory pricing, and thus to make all uniform delivered price systems and all basing point systems illegal per se.' Notwithstanding this Congressional attitude as recognized by the Supreme Court, this court is now urged to hold that the system is illegal per se, and to require that cement be sold on an f. o. b. plant basis.

"In our judgment, the question as to whether the basing point price system should be declared illegal rests clearly within the legislative domain. We know of no criticism so often and so forcibly directed at courts, particularly Federal courts, as their propensity for usurping the functions of Congress. If this pricing system which Congress has over the years steadfastly refused to declare illegal, although vigorously urged to do so, is now to be outlawed by the courts, it will mark the high tide in judicial usurpation." Aetna Portland Cement Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, supra, at p. 573.

I conclude, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Appeals setting aside the order of the Federal Trade Commission should have been affirmed, but I emphasize what I regard as equally important—that this Court, in sustaining the order of the Commission, has done so on such a different premise that it has not passed upon the validity of freight absorptions made in sales by one or more producers in the course of bona fide competition, where such producers have not acted as part of a combination to hinder, lessen, restrain or suppress competition in the sale or distribution of the products so sold.

[¶ 62,238] United States v. Scophony Corporation of America, General Precision Equipment Corporation, Television Productions, Inc., Paramount Pictures, Inc., Scophony Limited, et al.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 41. April 26, 1948.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Venue—Corporation Transacting Business in District.—The acts of a foreign corporation, in shifting from a course of business in pursuit of certain corporate objects, such as manufacturing and selling, to another continuing mode of achieving a basic corporate objective, namely, the exploiting of patents by complex working arrangements partaking of the character of a common enterprise with others, and requiring constant supervision and intervention beyond normal exercise of shareholders' rights by the participating companies' representatives as such, constitute the engaging in business required to render such corporation subject to the venue provision of Section 12 of the Clayton Act. Cessation of manufacturing and selling activities by a corporation, and the subsequent execution by it of agreements amounting to a joint adventure with other companies for the licensing and exploiting of its patents, amounted to such continuing, intensive activities as to constitute "transacting business" within the meaning of the statute.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.

Reversing and remanding the decision of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, 69 Fed. Supp. 666, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,506.

For appellant: George T. Washington, Acting Solicitor General.

For appellee: Edwin Foster Blair.

[Facts]

MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellee Scophony, Limited is a British corporation which has its offices and principal place of business in London, England. The question is whether that company "transacted business" and was "found" within the Southern District of New York under § 12 of the Clayton Act,[1] so that it could be sued and served there in a civil proceeding charging violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2. The violations stated were that Scophony and the other defendants[2] had monopolized, attempted to monopolize, and conspired to restrain and monopolize interstate and foreign commerce in products, patents and inventions useful in television and allied industries. The cause is here on direct appeal[3] from an order of the District Court granting Scophony's motion to quash the service of process and dismiss the complaint as to it. 69 F. Supp. 666.

Scophony manufactures and sells television apparatus and is the owner and licensor of inventions and patents covering television reception and transmission.[4] With the outbreak of the European War in 1939, the British Broadcasting Corporation stopped television broadcasting. Consequently it became impossible for Scophony to continue in the commercial development, manufacture and sale of television equipment in England. It therefore sent personnel to the United States, opened an office in New York City, and began demonstrations of its product and other activities preliminary to establishing a manufacturing and selling business in this country.

Late in 1941 Scophony found itself in financial distress, in part because of restrictions imposed by the British Government on the export of currency. It became imperative that new capital from American sources be found for the enterprise. Accordingly, Arthur Levey, a director of Scophony and one of its founders, undertook negotiations in New York with American motion picture and television interests, including Paramount and General Precision. They culminated in the execution of three interlacing contracts, the so-called master agreement of July 31, 1942, and two supplemental agreements of August 11, 1942. Copies of the latter had been attached to the master agreement, which provided for their later execution, and they when executed in effect carried out its terms. The alleged violations of the Sherman Act center around these agreements.

The master agreement was executed by Scophony, William George Elcock, as mortgagee of all of Scophony's assets, General Precision, and Productions, the latter a wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount. It provided for the formation of a new Delaware corporation, American Scophony, with an authorized capital stock of 1,000 Class "A" shares and a like number of Class "B" shares. Scophony and individuals interested in it[5] were to be given the Class "A" shares. Under the agreement, ownership of those shares conferred the right to elect three of American Scophony's five directors and its president, vice president and treasurer. The Class "B" shares were allotted to General Precision and Productions. By virtue of

That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all processes in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found." 38 Stat. 736, 15 U. S. C. § 22.

[2] The suit was instituted against Scophony, Limited (designated in this opinion as "Scophony"), Scophony Corporation of America (designated "American Scophony"), General Precision Equipment Corporation (designated "General Precision"), Television Productions, Inc. (designated "Productions"), Paramount Pictures, Inc. (designated "Paramount"), and three individual defendants, Arthur Levey and the presidents of General Precision and Productions. The corporations, except Scophony, are incorporated in the United States.

[4] The inventions and patents in the main relate to two systems of television transmission and reception, one known as the "supersonic" system and the other as the "skiatron" system. We shall at times refer to the present and future patents, processes, designs, technical data, etc., relating to these two systems as the Scophony inventions.

A third system, the cathode-fluorescent system, was developed early in this century and is the principal method of television transmission and reception used in the United States today.

[5] An agreement of February 4, 1943, amended the original agreement so as to give two-thirds of the "A" shares to Scophony, the remainder to individuals.

such ownership those two corporations were entitled to name the remaining two directors and the secretary and assistant secretary of American Scophony. Levey was named in the agreement as the president and a director of the new corporation.

The master agreement set forth the general desire of the parties to promote the utilization of the Scophony inventions "particularly in the United States of America and generally in the Western Hemisphere." It then stated that American Scophony had been organized "as a means therefor." Scophony agreed to transfer all its television equipment then in the United States to American Scophony and to enter into the first supplemental agreement. Scophony, with the other parties, also undertook to cause American Scophony to enter into both supplemental agreements. For the "B" stock in American Scophony and other rights acquired, General Precision and Productions agreed to enter into the second supplemental agreement and to pay specified sums in cash to Scophony or for its benefit in liquidation of listed obligations.

Pursuant to the master agreement's terms, the first supplemental agreement was executed by Scophony, Elcock, as mortgagee of its assets, and American Scophony; the other, by American Scophony, General Precision, and Productions. For present purposes it is necessary to set forth only the general effect of the agreements taken together. Scophony transferred to American Scophony not only all of its equipment in the United States, but also all patents and other interests in the Scophony inventions within the Western Hemisphere. General Precision and Productions were granted exclusive licenses under American Scophony's patents. They agreed to pay royalties on the products produced under the licenses and American Scophony undertook to transmit fifty per cent of such royalties to Scophony. American Scophony gave Scophony an exclusive sublicense for the Eastern Hemisphere on a royalty basis under all patents licensed to American Scophony by General Precision and Productions. Provision was also made for the interchange of technical data and information respecting the Scophony inventions. Finally, it was agreed that Scophony would not market any product involving the Scophony inventions in the Western Hemisphere and that General Precision and Productions would not export any such product to the Eastern Hemisphere.[6]

This rather complex plan soon fell of its own weight. Starting in 1943, an impasse developed in the affairs of American Scophony. It stemmed from the failure and unwillingness of General Precision and Productions to exploit the Scophony inventions themselves and their refusal to modify the agreements to permit the licensing of other American firms under the inventions. Several manufacturers expressed an interest in obtaining licenses. But in each instance the directors representing the American interests holding the Class "B" shares were unwilling to approve the necessary modifications in the existing arrangements. In July, 1945, the directors representing the "B" interests resigned. This made it impossible for American Scophony to transact business, since charter and by-law provisions adopted pursuant to the master and supplemental agreements required the presence of at least one Class "B" director for a quorum. Adding to the difficulties were American Scophony's shortage of funds and the apparent reluctance of the American interests to cooperate in efforts to place American Scophony on firmer financial footing. American Scophony's affairs were further complicated by the institution of the present antitrust proceeding on December 18, 1945.

Levey kept Scophony advised of developments in the dispute between the "A" and "B" factions and otherwise made progress reports to Scophony on its interests in the United States. As the impasse heightened, other individuals were authorized by Scophony to act in its behalf in the United States.[7] Service of process as to Scophony

[6] The complaint alleged that the effects of the agreements and understandings were to create a territorial division of the manufacture and sale of television products, assigning the Eastern Hemisphere to Scophony and the Western Hemisphere to General Precision and Productions; to suppress and restrain competition in the manufacture and sale of television equipment, both in the domestic and in the export markets; and to give General Precision and Productions monopoly power over the Scophony inventions which enabled them to suppress their exploitation and deprive others of their use.

was made first on Levey in New York City on December 20, 1945.[8]

On April 5, 1946, a summons and a copy of the complaint directed to Scophony were also served on Elcock in New York City. He was a dominant figure in Scophony. He arrived in this country in March, 1946, with the mission of investigating and ending the impasse and disposing of Scophony's interest in American Scophony. Elcock not only was mortgagee of Scophony's assets by virtue of having made a large loan to the company. He was also its financial comptroller and a member of its board. At the time of service on him, he held a comprehensive power of attorney, irrevocable until March, 1947, giving him complete power to act with regard to Scophony's interests in the United States, including those in American Scophony.[9]

The District Court, in granting the motion to quash service and dismiss the complaint as to Scophony, held that it was not "found" in the Southern District of New York within the meaning of § 12. The Court rejected the contention that Scophony was within the jurisdiction by reason of the activities of its agents. It concluded that none of those activities related to Scophony's ordinary business of manufacturing, selling and licensing television apparatus, but all were confined to protecting Scophony's interest in American Scophony. It also found that the conduct of American Scophony did not serve to bring Scophony within the jurisdiction. 69 F. Supp. 666.

[Venue Under Act]

I.

Section 12 of the Clayton Act has two functions, first, to fix the venue for antitrust suits aganist corporations; second, to determine where process in such suits may be served. Venue may be had "not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business." And all process may be served "in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found." (Emphasis added.)

A plain and literal reading of the section's words gives it deceptively simple appearance. The source of trouble lies in the use of verbs descriptive of the behavior of human beings to describe that of entities characterized by Chief Justice Marshall as "artificial . . . , invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law." Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 636.[10]

The process of translating group or institutional relations in terms of individual ones, and so keeping them distinct from the nongroup relations of the people whose group rights are thus integrated, is perennial, not only because the law's norm is so much the individual man, but also because the continuing evolution of institutions more and more compels fitting them into individualistically conceived legal patterns. Perhaps in no other field have the vagaries of this process been exemplified more or more often than in the determination of matters of jurisdiction, venue and liability to service of process in our federal system.[11] It has

[8] Levey immediately informed Scophony in England of this action and advised it to designate appropriate counsel. On December 21, 1945, he sent a copy of the complaint to Scophony by airmail.

[9] The power of attorney set forth Scophony's desire to appoint Elcock to act "and bind the Company in all or any matters affecting the Company's interests in the United States . . . ." It then authorized Elcock to institute and prosecute all proceedings necessary to conserve Scophony's interests; to defend or compromise any suits brought against Scophony; to settle accounts; to engage or dismiss subagents; to borrow money; to dispose of any and all of Scophony's property and interests in the United States; and "generally to represent the Company in the United States of America in all matters in any way affecting or pertaining to the Company . . . ."

[10] More than once Marshall had difficulty in transferring to corporations or other institutions legal conceptions and relations shaped in nomenclature and in fact from normative evolution in relation to persons of flesh and blood.

See, e. g., Bank v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch 61, where he was unable to adapt the concept of corporate "inhabitancy," applied in decisions he cited, for fitting the corporation into the constitutional scheme of diversity jurisdiction. His individualistic solution brought difficulties which lasted for decades. See Henderson, The Position of Foreign Corporations in American Constitutional Law 50-76; Harris, A Corporation As a Citizen, 1 Va. L. Rev. 507. Cf. Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors, 4 Wheat. 1.

[11] See, e. g., Cahill, Jurisdiction over Foreign Corporations and Individuals Who Carry on Business within the Territory, 30 Harv. L. Rev. 676; Scott, Jurisdiction over Nonresidents Doing Business within a State, 32 Harv. L. Rev. 871; Bullington, Jurisdiction over Foreign Corporations, 6 N. C. L. gone on from Bank v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch 61, and Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors, 4 Wheat. 1, to International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310, and now this case.[12]

The translation, or rather the necessity for it, permeates every significant word of § 12, not wholly excluding "or transacts business." If the statutory slate were clean, one might readily conclude that the words "inhabitant" and "found" would have the same meaning for locating both venue and the proper place for serving process. But even so, each of those terms and indeed the term "transacts business" would have to be given specific content actually descriptive of corporate events taking place within specified areas. Because all corporate action must be vicarious, that content could be determined only by an act of judgment which selects and attributes to the corporation, from the mass of activity done or purporting to be done on its behalf, those acts of individuals which are relevant for the particular statutory purposes and policies in hand.

The statutory slate, however, is neither entirely new nor clean. Both legislative and judicial hands have written upon it. The writing is meandering, unclear in part, and partly erased. But it cannot be disregarded. What is legible must furnish guidance to decision. We deal here with a problem of statutory construction, not one of constitutional import.[13] Nor do we have any question of the exercise of Congress' power to its farthest limit. The issue is simply how far Congress meant to go, and specifically whether it intended to create venue and liability to service of process through the occurrence within a district of the kinds of acts done here on Scophony's behalf.

Section 12 of the Clayton Act is an enlargement of § 7 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359. The earlier statute provided for suit in the district in which the defendant "resides or is found." 26 Stat. 210. That wording controlled for both venue and fixing the places for service of process.

We do not stop to review the decisions construing § 7 and similar statutes, cf. Suttle v. Reich Bros., 333 U. S. 163; see International Shoe Co. v. Washington, supra, at 317-319, except to refer to People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79. There the foreign corporation was sued in a district in which it did not "reside." Because the Court found that the company had withdrawn from the state in which the district was located and had revoked the authority of its principal agents there, it held that the defendant was not "found" in the district, although certain corporate activities continued.

The conventional rationalization applied equated "found" in sequence to "presence," to "doing business by its agents there," to "of a character warranting inference of subjection to the local jurisdiction."[14] The facts that the company continued to advertise its goods in the state and district, to make interstate sales to jobbers there, to send in drummers who solicited retail orders to be turned over to the jobbers, and finally to own stock in local subsidiaries, were held not to constitute the sort of "doing business" warranting the inference of subjection to the local jurisdiction for the statute's purposes. International Harvester v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 579, was narrowly distinguished. 246 U. S. at 87.

The suit in the People's Tobacco case was begun in 1912, but the decision was not rendered until 1918. Meanwhile, in 1914, Congress had enacted the Clayton Act, including § 12. The following year the Eastman case, supra, was begun in the Northern District of Georgia. Process issued and was served

[12] The very federalism of our structure magnifies the problem, by multiplying state and other governmental boundaries across which corporate activity runs with the greatest freedom. The problem arises on constitutional as well as statutory and common-law levels. Cf. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310; Puerto Rico v. Russell & Co., 288 U. S. 476.

[13] Appellee makes no suggestion of a constitutional issue. The Government, however, suggests that, in view of our recent decision in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310, which was concerned with the jurisdiction of a state over a foreign corporation for purposes of suit and service of process, and in view of aspects of similarity between that problem and the one now presented, we extend to this case and to § 12 the criteria there formulated and applied. There is no necessity for doing so. The facts of the two cases are considerably different and, as we have said, we are not concerned here with finding the utmost reach of Congress' power.

[14] The Court said: "The general rule deducible from all our decisions is that the business must be of such nature and character as to warrant the inference that the corporation has subjected itself to the local jurisdiction, and is by its duly authorized officers or agents present within the State or district where service is attempted. Philadelphia & Reading Ry. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U. S. 264; St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Alexander, 227 U. S. 218, 226." 246 U. S. 79, 87.

under § 12 on the defendant, a New York corporation, at its principal place of business in Rochester. In 1927 this Court sustained both the venue and the service, as against objections that § 12 had not broadened § 7 of the Sherman Act, but merely made explicit what had been decided under it.[15]

The argument was certainly plausible, but for the fact that it made the addition of "or transacts business" to "inhabitant" and "found" in § 12 redundant and meaningless. The Court refused to accept the argument, because doing so would have defeated the plain remedial purpose of § 12.[16] That section was enacted, it held, to enlarge the jurisdiction given by § 7 of the Sherman Act over corporations by adding those words, "so as to establish the venue of such a suit not only, as theretofore, in a district in which the corporation resides or is 'found,' but also in any district in which it 'transacts business'—although neither residing nor 'found' therein—in which case the process may be issued to and served in a district in which the corporation either resides or is 'found.'" 273 U. S. at 372.[17]

This construction gave the words "transacts business" a much broader meaning for establishing venue than the concept of "carrying on business" denoted by "found" under the preexisting statute and decisions. The scope of the addition was indicated by the statement "that a corporation is engaged in transacting business in a district . . . if in fact, in the ordinary and usual sense, it 'transacts business' therein of any substantial character." Id. at 373. (Italics added.)

In other words, for venue purposes, the Court sloughed off the highly technical distinctions theretofore glossed upon "found" for filling that term with particularized meaning, or emptying it, under the translation of "carrying on business." In their stead it substituted the practical and broader business conception of engaging in any substantial business operations. Cf. Frene v. Louisville Cement Co., 134 F. 2d 511; International Shoe Co. v. Washington, supra. Refinements such as previously were made under the "mere solicitation" and "solicitation plus" criteria, cf. Frene v. Louisville Cement Co., supra, and like those drawn, e. g., between the People's Tobacco and International Harvester cases, supra, were no longer determinative. The practical, everyday business or commercial concept of doing or carrying on business "of any substantial character" became the test of venue.

Applying it, the Court stated that "manifestly" the Eastman Company was not "present" in the Georgia district under the earlier tests of § 7 of the Sherman Act, either for the purpose of venue or as being amenable to service of process. P. 371. It thus aligned the case under those tests with the People's Tobacco decision rather than the International Harvester one. But, under the broader room given by § 12, venue was held to have been established.[18]

Thus, by substituting practical, business conceptions for the previous hair-splitting legal technicalities encrusted upon the "found"-"present"-"carrying-on-business" sequence, the Court yielded to and made effective Congress' remedial purpose. Thereby it re-

[15] Counsel for the defendant equated the words "inhabitant" and "found" of § 12 to "resides or is found" of § 7 of the Sherman Act. They then went on to argue that the addition of "or transacts business" in the venue clause of § 12 did not broaden the section, but merely made explicit what the Court had already decided under the earlier statute. 273 U. S. at 361. This, because "or transacts business" was said to be nothing more than "carrying on business," which was the content the Court had given to "is found" in § 7, by the People's Tobacco case and others.

[16] Rather, the Court said, the section supplements "the remedial provision of the Anti-Trust Act for the redress of injuries resulting from illegal restraints upon interstate trade, by relieving the injured person from the necessity of resorting for the redress of wrongs committed by a non-resident corporation, to a district, however distant, in which it resides or may be 'found'—often an insuperable obstacle —and enabling him to institute the suit in a district, frequently that of his own residence, in which the corporation in fact transacts business, and bring it before the court by the service of process in a district in which it resides or may be 'found.'" 273 U. S. 359, 373. (Italics added.)

[17] See also note 16.

[18] The concrete facts held to sustain the venue were that the Eastman Company was engaged "not only in selling and shipping its goods to dealers within the Georgia district, but also in soliciting orders therein through its salesmen and promoting the demand for its goods through its demonstrators for the purpose of increasing its sales . . . ." 273 U. S. at 374.

The Court also expressly stated that, in contrast to prior limitations, the company was "none the less engaged in transacting business . . . because of the fact that such business may be entirely interstate in character and be transacted by agents who do not reside within the district," referring in this connection to International Harvester v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 579, 587, and Davis v. Farmers Co-operative Co., 262 U. S. 312, 316. 273 U. S. 359, 373.

lieved persons injured through corporate violations of the antitrust laws from the "often insuperable obstacle" of resorting to distant forums for redress of wrongs done in the places of their business or residence. A foreign corporation no longer could come to a district, perpetrate there the injuries outlawed, and then by retreating or even without retreating [19] to its headquarters defeat or delay the retribution due.

With venue established under the new and broader approach, the Eastman case presented no problem regarding the service of process, except possibly for the ruling that process might run to another district than the one in which suit was brought. 273 U. S. at 374. For by whatever test, whether of the old § 7 or the new § 12, the service was good. As we have noted, the process had been directed to and served in the district where the Eastman Company was an "inhabitant." [20] There was therefore no necessity for ruling upon the meaning of "found" as relating to any other district. Any such ruling necessarily could be no more than dictum, since no such issue was presented by the facts.

Nevertheless, for service of process § 12 had specified "the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found" without adding "or transacts business," as was done in the venue clause. Accordingly the Court took account of this difference and went on to indicate that for purposes of liability to service the section merely carried forward the preexisting law, so that in some situations service in a district would not be valid, even though venue were clearly established under § 12.[21]

But regardless of the pronouncement's effect, the decision, by resolving the venue problem, substantially removed the serious obstacles and practical immunities to suit which had grown up under § 7 of the Sherman Act, in by far the larger number of antitrust cases, i. e., for those not involving companies incorporated outside the United States. In them the fact that service may be dubious in the district of suit and can be assured only by causing process to run to another district, as in the Eastman case, presents no such obstacle to bringing and maintaining the suit as existed prior to § 12. The necessity, if it is that, for directing process to another district, creates at most some slight inconvenience and additional expense.

[Corporation's Activities]

II.

In this case, however, we deal with a company incorporated outside the United States. But there can be no question of the existence of "jurisdiction," in the sense of venue under § 12, over Scophony in the Southern District of New York. To say that on the facts presented Scophony transacted no business "of any substantial character" there during the period covered by institution of the suit and the times of serving process would be to disregard the practical, nontechnical, business standard supplied by "or transacts business" in the venue provision. It would be also to ignore the fact that Scophony then and there was carrying on largely, if not exclusively, the only business in which it could engage at the time.

Scophony's operations in New York were a continuous course of business before and throughout the period in question here. They consisted in strenuous efforts not simply to save an American "investment," as is urged, but to salvage and resuscitate Scophony's whole enterprise from the disasters brought upon it by the war. As with such efforts generally, changes in method and immediate objective took place as each one tried in turn failed to work out. But those changes brought none in ultimate objective, namely, to find a mode of saving and profitably exploiting the [19] I. e., by artful arrangement of agents' authority, or of their comings and goings, or of the geography of minute incidents in contracting. Cf. People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79. Such artifice saw its day end for creating substantive liability through a course of dealing contrary to the antitrust statutes, but without thereby also creating venue to enforce it, with the advent of § 12.

[20] As has been stated, the company was incorporated in New York and had its principal office and place of business in Rochester.

[21] Although difference of that sort may appear to be generally incongruous, since ordinarily it would seem that susceptibility to suit in a district should be accompanied by amenability to process there, such things of course are for Congress' determination as matters of policy relating to the scope and correlation, or lack of it, of venue and service provisions. There is certainly no constitutional requirement that the two be coextensive. And to support the dictum, if it were now necessary to rule on the matter, considerations beyond the verbal difference to which the Eastman opinion pointed might be stated.

Scophony inventions; and none in the intensity or continuity with which that object was pursued in New York.

First was the phase of attempting to set up in this country as manufacturer and seller of television equipment. When that failed, the company turned to licensing and exploiting its patents by other means. This was done through the complicated arrangements for what practically if not also technically was a joint adventure with other companies. That project was carried out not merely through corporate forms and arrangements but by contracts binding the participating companies to the common enterprise, as well as the special medium of executing it, American Scophony. In this each corporate participant had its special functions, controls and restrictions created in part by share ownership in American Scophony, but also in important respects by contract both beyond the stock controls and dictating their character.[22] Finally, as the affairs of the keystone of the structure, American Scophony, came to and continued in stalemate, the immediate objective shifted once more, to getting out of the trap. Again the shift was in direct and constant pursuit of Scophony's primary and continuing object, to find a way to save and to exploit its patents.

This is a story of business in trouble, even desperate. We may have sympathy for the company's plight. But it does not follow that such continuing, intensive activities to save the business and put it on a normal course, even though shifting as they did in the successive winds that blew, did not constitute "transacting business" of "any substantial character." Nor can we say that any of the major shifts in tacking toward the ultimate end stopped or interrupted the course of the company's business activity. At no time was the drive toward achieving its basic objects suspended.

Appellee would avoid this view and its consequences by taking an entirely different conception of what took place. It emphasizes that Scophony's corporate objects, as stated in its charter, were to manufacture and sell television equipment. Hence it concludes that when all New York activity directly pointing to that end ceased, and was followed by the phase of seeking to exploit the patents through the arrangements centering around American Scophony, the British company ceased to be engaged in promoting its corporate objects and thus in carrying on or doing business in New York for the relevant statutory purposes. From then on, it is claimed, Scophony became concerned solely with creating and protecting an "investment," namely, in American Scophony's shares. Nor did Scophony resume the doing of business when that effort also failed and the final stage of seeking to break the impasse arrived, because manufacturing and sale of equipment were not revived.

To this view of the sequence of events appellee then seeks to apply this Court's decisions interpreting "found" under § 7 and similar requirements in application to manufacturing and selling companies,[23] and also the like Eastman dictum concerning § 12. In doing this it seeks especially to invalidate the service by casting up from those decisions a check list of specific and often minor incidents of that sort of business done or not done as relevant to whether business is being carried on, and then matching against the list Scophony's New York activities as of the times of service.[24]

[22] E. g., the hemispheric division of territories between the British and American interests; the exclusive licensing agreements which prevented Scophony from granting licenses to interested American companies; and the arrangements for the interchange of technical information were contractual, not charter limitations on corporate powers. The particular corporate medium used, American Scophony, and the refinements in its charter and by-laws giving General Precision and Productions an effective veto power over its operations were themselves aspects of the contractual undertakings embodied in the master agreement and the two supplemental agreements. The master agreement also designated the persons to become officers and directors of American Scophony, as representatives of both the British and the American interests.

[23] E. g., Cannon Mfg. Co. v. Cudahy Co., 267 U. S. 333; Consolidated Textile Corp. v. Gregory, 289 U. S. 85; People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79.

[24] The catalogue emphasizes things not being done as of the dates of service, e. g., maintaining an office, warehouse or place of business; owning realty or other physical property; keeping a staff of employees; having agents "other than counsel in this case and . . . Elcock"; keeping a telephone or a listing; making sales; conducting research; soliciting orders. Correspondingly appellee atomizes the things then being done into separate, disconnected events, viz., stock ownership (in American Scophony); contracting with American Scophony and the other corporations for transfer and licensing of patents; activities to protect Scophony's American "interests" by resolving the impasse.

Obviously this view of the facts and of the determinative legal approach is at wide variance from the ones we have taken in dealing with the question of venue. But we do not find it necessary, in order to reject it for purposes of sustaining the service, to consider whether the process clause of § 12 should be given scope beyond that indicated by the Eastman dictum. For in any event we think that appellee and the District Court have misconceived the effects of the facts and of the decisions on which they rely, for determining the validity of the service in this case.

Certainly appellee's conclusionary premise cannot be accepted, that its sole authorized or actual business was manufacturing and selling equipment; or therefore the further one that no other activity on its behalf could constitute doing or engaging in business. Indeed it was authorized to take out, hold and exploit television patents, and doing this was certainly as much part of its business as manufacturing and selling the equipment they covered. There is nothing to show that Scophony was restricted by its charter or otherwise to exploiting its patents exclusively by direct manufacture and sale. When therefore, after that method had failed, the company chose another, it was not ceasing to do business. That consequence did not follow merely because it discontinued the activities incident to continuing the discarded method.

The alternative one chosen was not a matter simply of licensing patents to others, for active exploitation by them. Nor was it only a casual act or acts of contracting. The whole framework of this phase of the New York activities was dictated by the master and supplemental agreements. These were not mere licensing arrangements, nor did they make Scophony nothing more than a shareholder for investment purposes, with only such a shareholder's voting rights and control in American Scophony. The contracts created controls in Scophony, and in the American interests as well, which taken in conjunction with the stock controls called for continuing exercise of supervision over and intervention in American Scophony's affairs.[25] We need not decide whether, in view of the agreements' continuing and pervasive effects, they could be considered as sufficing in themselves to make Scophony "found" within the New York district.[26] Whether so or not, they set the pattern for a regular and continuing program of patent exploitation requiring, as we have said, Scophony's constant supervision and intervention.

That necessity was shown, among other ways, by the contractual provisions for interchange of data and information, and further by the fact that there was sustained interchange of correspondence between Levey and Scophony devoted to Scophony's affairs and interests in this country. Levey kept Scophony informed fully of all that went on here, and in turn received and carried out its instructions respecting American Scophony's affairs and its own.

In all this he was not acting merely as an officer of American Scophony. Rather he was also Scophony's director and representative, authorized to act in its behalf and interest. Indeed it was as Scophony's representative that he was named as president of American Scophony. His position was a dual one. He was not a mere shareholder's or investor's agent seeking information about that corporation's affairs for purposes of dealing with the stock. His functions and activities were much broader and related to Scophony's interests as much as to American Scophony's. Scophony's New York activities therefore were not confined to negotiation and execution of the agreements. Neither were they concerned only with mere stock ownership or "investment" as is urged, nor were they simply occasional acts of contracting, like those in the decisions appellee cites.

Moreover, other individuals carried on for Scophony in continuing efforts[27] to resolve the impasse. Apart from what was done by others, Elcock came to New York with unrestricted and irrevocable power to act on Scophony's behalf. Indeed it might almost be said, in view of his triple position as mortgagee, corporate officer and attorney-in-fact, that for all relevant purposes at this phase of Scophony's activity, he was the company. The stalemate put Scophony's affairs in this country at a standstill along with those of American Scophony. And Scophony's efforts to extricate itself were both strenuous and continuous.

[25] See note 22 supra. Indeed the contracts shaped the nature of the corporate distribution of powers and voting rights, so as to make them conform to the over-all character and objects of the larger common enterprise. The charter and by-law provisions of American Scophony therefore not only were governed by the contractual arrangements but carried them into execution.

[26] Especially in view of the fact that § 12 fixes venue and the places for serving process in antitrust suits, there would seem to be sound basis for differentiating the execution of agreements so all-pervasive and far-reaching in their effects upon the statutory policies from run-of-mine casual or intermittent sales of commodities by a manufacturing or selling company, for the section's purposes.

[27] See note 7.

Those efforts were not cessation of engaging in business. They were directed entirely to warding off that fate. Their object was not to liquidate, it was to resuscitate the business of Scophony and, as in all previous stages, put it on a normal course again. In doing all this, Scophony was engaging in business constantly and continuously, not retiring from it or interrupting it. Cf. Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Spratley, 172 U. S. 602; Pennsylvania Lumbermen's Insurance Co. v. Meyer, 197 U. S. 407; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Alexander, 227 U. S. 218. The interruptions were only in particular phases of its authorized adventure, not in the continuity, intensity or totality of the adventure itself.

In sum, we have no such situation as was presented in the manufacturing and selling cases on which appellee relies. They concerned entirely different facts and enterprises. In none was there a shifting from a course of business in pursuit of one corporate object or objects, viz., manufacturing and selling, to another continuing mode of achieving a basic corporate objective, namely, the exploiting of patents by complex working arrangements partaking practically of the character of a common enterprise with others and requiring constant supervision and intervention beyond normal exercise of shareholders' rights by the participating companies' representatives qua such.

We know of no decision which has held or indicated that on such facts the process clause of § 12 is not adequate to confer power to make valid service. Such a continuing and far-reaching enterprise is not to be governed in this respect by rules evolved with reference to the very different businesses and activities of manufacturing and selling. Nor, what comes to the same thing, is the determination to be made for such an enterprise by atomizing it into minute parts or events, in disregard of the actual unity and continuity of the whole course of conduct, by the process sometimes applied on borderline cases involving manufacturing and selling activities.

For present purposes those decisions may be left untouched for the facts and situations in which they have arisen and to which they have been applied. But there could be no valid object in expanding their pulverizing approach to situations as different and distinct as this one, comprehended within neither their rulings nor their effects. More especially would such an extension be inappropriate, when it is recalled that § 12 governs venue and service in antitrust suits against corporations. For, in cases against companies incorporated outside the United States, that extension would bring back all the obstacles to enforcement of antitrust policies and remedies which existed for domestic corporations before § 12 was enacted to give relief from those obstacles. Even though venue were clearly established, as here, the extension often would make valid service impossible, since process could not be issued to run for such corporations to the foreign countries of which they are "inhabitants." We are unwilling to construe § 12 in a manner to bring back the evils it abolished, for situations not foreclosed by prior decisions, and thus to defeat its policy together with that of the antitrust laws, so as to make another amendment necessary.

We think that Scophony not only was "transacting business" of a substantial character in the New York district at the times of service, so as to establish venue there, but also on the sum of the facts regarding its activities was "found" there within the meaning of the service-of-process clause of § 12. Of course such a ruling presents no conceivable element of offense to "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." See International Shoe Co. v. Washington, supra, at 316; cf. Hutchinson v. Chase & Gilbert, 45 F. 2d 139, 141.

It remains only to say that we do not stop to consider whether, as is argued, Levey's authority to act for Scophony had expired or been revoked at the time service was made by delivery of process to him. For when service was made by delivery to Elcock, he had unrevoked and irrevocable authority to act in Scophony's behalf in the New York district, and that service was valid to confer personal jurisdiction over Scophony.

Accordingly, the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON concurs in the result.

[Concurring Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring: I deem it appropriate to state why I concur merely in the Court's result.

The only question in this case is whether Scophony Limited, a British corporation, which has its offices and principal place of business in London, may be made a party defendant in a suit by the United States for violation of the Sherman Law pending in the Southern District of New York. The corporation may be brought into court in that District if its activities there satisfy the requirements of § 12 of the Clayton Act. According to this provision, Scophony Limited is properly a party defendant in this suit only if, by virtue of its activities, it is "found or transacts business" in the Southern District of New York, and it may be served in that District if it is "found" there.

Whether a corporation "transacts business" in a particular district is a question of fact in its ordinary untechnical meaning. The answer turns on an appraisal of the unique circumstances of a particular situation. And a corporation can be "found" anywhere, whenever the needs of law make it appropriate to attribute location to a corporation, only if activities on its behalf that are more than episodic are carried on by its agents in a particular place. This again presents a question of fact turning on the unique circumstances of a particular situation, to be ascertained as such questions of fact are every day decided by judges.

What was done in the Southern District of New York on behalf of Scophony Limited, as detailed in the Court's opinion, establishes that the corporation was there transacting business and was found there in the only sense in which a corporation ever "transacts business" or is "found." Accordingly, Scophony Limited was amenable to suit and service in the District within the requirements of § 12 of the Clayton Act.

To reach this result, however, I do not find it necessary to open up difficult and subtle problems regarding the law's attitude toward corporations. I abstain from joining the Court's opinion not because I am in disagreement with what is said but because I am not prepared to agree. And I am not prepared to agree because I do not wish to forecast, which agreement would entail, the bearing of the Court's discussion upon situations not now before us but as to which such theoretical discussion is bound to be influential. Law, no doubt, is concerned with "practical and substantial rights, not to maintain theories." Davis v. Mills, 194 U. S. 451, 457. But theories often determine rights. Since I do not know where the opinion in this case will take me in the future, I prefer to reach its destination by the much shorter route of recognizing that a corporation as such never transacts business and is never found anywhere, but does "transact business" and is "found" somewhere by attribution to the corporation of what human beings do for it. No doubt legal reasoning must be on its guard not to oversimplify. Dangers also lurk in overcomplicating.

From earliest times the law has enforced rights and exacted liabilities by utilizing a corporate concept—by recognizing, that is, juristic persons other than human beings. The theories by which this mode of legal operation has developed, has been justified, qualified, and defined are the subject-matter of a very sizable library. The historic roots of a particular society, economic pressures, philosophic notions, all have had their share in the law's response to the ways of men in carrying on their affairs through what is now the familiar device of the corporation. Law has also responded to religious needs in recognizing juristic persons other than human beings. Thus, in the Hindu law an idol has standing in court to enforce its rights. See, e. g., Pramatha Nath Mullick v. Pradyumna Kumar Mullick, 52 L. R. I. A. 245 (1925). Attribution of legal rights and duties to a juristic person other than man is necessarily a metaphorical process. And none the worse for it. No doubt, "metaphors in law are to be narrowly watched," Cardozo, J., in Berkey v. Third Avenue R. Co., 244 N. Y. 84, 94. But all instruments of thought should be narrowly watched lest they be abused and fail in their service to reason.

[¶ 62,239] State of Kansas on the Relation of Harold H. Malone, County Attorney of Sedgwick County v. The Fleming Company, Inc.

In the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. No. 37,113. April 10, 1948.

Appeal from Sedgwick District Court, Division No. 4.

Kansas Unfair Practices Act

Injunction—Proceeding Under Unfair Practices Act—Sufficiency of Petition.—A proceeding for injunction instituted under the provisions of the Kansas Unfair Practices Act is civil in character. Such a proceeding cannot be maintained except upon a petition which fairly apprises the defendant as to the alleged unlawful acts complained of, and which states facts which, if true, entitle the plaintiff to injunctive relief. The sufficiency of the allegations may be tested either by demurrer, or, where a temporary injunction has been granted, ex parte, by a motion to vacate or dissolve the injunction. Upon examination of the record it is held that the petition did not allege facts sufficient to state a cause of action for injunctive relief.

See the Kansas Unfair Practices Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8288.

For appellant: Robert R. Hasty, Wichita, Kansas.

For appellee: Emmett D. Foley, deputy county attorney, John H. Gerety, special prosecutor, both of Wichita, Kansas; Harold H. Malone, county attorney, Sidney L. Foulston, and Henry L. Butler, all of Wichita, Kansas, on the brief.

[Nature of Action]

HOCH, J.: The appellant company, defendant below, was enjoined from advertising, offering for sale, and selling cigarettes at less than cost, in violation of the Unfair Practices Act (G. S. 1947 Supp., 50-401 to 50-408, incl.). It appeals from orders overruling its motion to dissolve the temporary injunction, overruling its motion to strike part of the petition and to make the petition definite and certain, and overruling its demurrer to the petition.

The petition, unverified when filed on April 29, 1947, follows:

"Plaintiff for its cause of action against the Defendant states and alleges:

"FIRST: That HAROLD H. MALONE is the duly elected, qualified and acting County Attorney in and for Sedgwick County, State of Kansas.

"SECOND: That the Defendant is a Corporation existing under and by virtue of the Laws of the State of Kansas, and has its principal place of business at 125-127 N. Mosley Street, Wichita, Sedgwick County, Kansas.

"THIRD: That the Defendant herein on or about the 21st Day of April, 1947, advertised, offered to sell and sold cigarettes at less than cost as defined in the Laws of the State of Kansas, and that by so doing diverted trade from a competitor; that by said advertising, offering for sale and sale of said cigarettes the Defendant impaired and prevented fair competition and injured public welfare; and with the intent to deceive any purchaser or prospective purchasers or to substantially lessen competition or to unreasonably restrain trade.

"FOURTH: That by virtue of the violation of Section 50-401 and 50-402 of the laws of the State of Kansas, said Plaintiff is entitled to attorney's fees for the preparation and prosecution of said Plaintiff's cause of action herein.

"WHEREFORE, Plaintiff prays that all the acts of advertising, offering for sale and sale of cigarettes at less than cost be enjoined and restrained in the manner provided by Section 50-404 of the Statutes of the State of Kansas, and that the Defendant, its agent, servants, employers, successors, and assigns, and each of them, and all other persons for or on behalf of said Defendant, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from advertising, offering for sale or selling cigarettes at less than cost in or upon the premises herein before described at the usual place of business of the said Defendant, and within the State of Kansas, or at any place in Sedgwick County, Kansas.

"Plaintiff further prays that an injunction be granted at the commencement of this action, without notice, to be in effect until the final determination of this cause or further order of this Court, and that upon the final determination of this cause the said injunction be made permanent and perpetual.

"Said Plaintiff further prays that he have and receive judgment of a reasonable attorney's fee for the benefit of said Plaintiff's attorneys, together with the costs of this action and such other relief as he may be in justice and law entitled.

"State of Kansas,
"County of Sedgwick, ss."

On April 29, the same day, ex parte and without notice, a temporary injunction was issued in the district court of Sedgwick county. No bond was required or given. The temporary injunction reads:

"TO THE ABOVE NAMED DEFENDANTS:

"WHEREAS, a verified Petition and Application for Injunction was filed in this Court by the State of Kansas on the relation of HAROLD H. MALONE, County Attorney of Sedgwick County, Kansas, on the 29th Day of April, 1947, alleged: That the Defendants named in the above caption advertised, offered for sale and sold cigarettes at below cost for the purpose of eliminating competition and/or injuring a competitor with intent to injure public welfare; and that said acts all took place in Sedgwick County, Kansas; and that said acts are in violation of Section 50-402 and 50-403 of the Supplement of the General Statutes of 1945, and are in violation of the laws of the State of Kansas; and that said Defendants, their agents, servants, employees, successors, tenants and assigns and all other persons, and each of them should be perpetually enjoined from advertising, offering for sale or the selling of cigarettes at a price lower than cost.

"AND WHEREAS, the application for Injunction heretofore filed by the Plaintiff, and presented to the Court, has been given careful consideration and the Court has been duly advised in the premises.

"NOW THEREFORE, you the above named defendant and your agents, servants, employees, successors, tenants and assigns, and all other persons, and each of you are hereby enjoined and restrained until the final determination of this cause or further order of this Court from advertising, offering for sale or selling cigarettes at a price lower than cost.

"Judge.

"County Attorney.

(Italics supplied.)

It may be noted that the temporary injunction recited that "a verified petition and application for injunction, had been filed." This was a misstatement. The petition had not been verified. It was further recited in the temporary injunction "that said acts all took place in Sedgwick county, Kansas." There was no allegation in the petition upon which to base that statement and since no evidence was taken prior to the issuance of the temporary injunction, no justification appears for asserting therein that the alleged acts took place in Sedgwick county.

Following service of the injunction upon the defendant and on dates not shown by the record, the defendant filed a motion to dissolve the injunction for the reason that it was contrary to law and not based on allegations entitling the plaintiff to injunctive relief. Also a motion to strike paragraph 4 from the petition and to make the petition definite and certain in the following particulars:

> "Defendant moves the Court to require the plaintiff to make its petition more definite and certain by stating where defendant advertised, how it advertised, with whom it advertised, and if by printed matter, to attach a copy thereof to its petition.
> "That plaintiff be required to state where and to whom it offered to sell and the price at which it offered to sell.
> "That plaintiff be required to state to whom it sold cigarettes, the price at which it sold them, and if an invoice was issued therewith, to attach a copy of said invoice to the petition.
> "That plaintiff be required to state the cost price of cigarettes to the defendant as defined in the laws of the State of Kansas, and state the name of the competitor from whom defendant diverted trade.
> "That plaintiff be required to separately state and number its several causes of action.
> "That plaintiff be required to state whether the defendant advertised, offered to sell, or sold at wholesale or retail."

The motion to dissolve the injunction, together with the motion of defendant objecting to the appearance of Foulston, Gerety, and Butler, for the reason that said firm had not been employed by the county attorney or by the county commissioners, and therefore had no right to appear in the matter, were heard and overruled, and the temporary injunction previously granted was continued. At this hearing the trial court permitted the plaintiff to amend its petition by adding thereto a verification filed on May 20, three weeks after the temporary injunction had been issued. This verification was as follows:

> "The undersigned John H. Gerety, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, states:
> "That he is the Special Prosecutor in the above styled cause. That he has read the Petition and Application for Injunction filed herein on the 29th day of April, 1947. That he knows the contents thereof, and that the allegations, statements and averments contained therein are true and correct.
> "John Gerety"

On September 10, 1947, hearing was had on the motion to strike and to make definite and certain, at which time the motion to strike the fourth paragraph was sustained, and the motion to make definite and certain was overruled.

On September 19, 1947, defendant's demurrer to the petition and its objection to the authority of the firm of Foulston, Gerety and Butler, or any member thereof, to appear in the matter, were heard and overruled.

Motion to reconsider the ruling on demurrer was overruled and this appeal followed.

Appellant's principal contentions are that the private attorneys who conducted the case were without authority to represent the state or the county attorney and that the entire proceedings were, therefore, a nullity; that the temporary injunction was invalid because the petition was not verified and no bond was given; and that paragraph three, the heart of the petition, was so indefinite and framed in such general terms that it did not advise the defendant as to the acts complained of and did not state a cause of action.

[Purpose of Act]

The expressed purpose of the Unfair Practices Act is to prevent the sale—with certain specified exceptions—of merchandise at below cost, either by the retailer or wholesaler, where such sale or offer to sell is made with the intent and with the result stated in section 50-402, presently to be noted. Section 50-401 defines "cost" and other terms used in the act. The extended and rather complicated definitions need not be recited here. Section 50-402 is as follows:

> "It is hereby declared that any advertising, offer to sell, or sale of any merchandise, either by retailers or wholesalers, at less than cost as defined in this act, with the intent, of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor or otherwise injuring a competitor, impair and prevent fair competition, injure public welfare, are unfair competition and contrary to public policy and the policy of this act, where the result of such advertising, offer or sale is to tend to deceive any purchaser or prospective purchaser, or to substantially lessen competition, or to unreasonably restrain trade, or to tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

Section 50-403 provides that any retailer or wholesaler who sells or offers to sell merchandise in contravention of the act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $500.

Section 50-405 sets out certain exemptions, with the provision that any retailer or wholesaler claiming them shall have the burden of showing that he is entitled thereto.

The instant action was brought under section 50-404, which provides:

> "In addition to the penalties provided in this act, the courts of this state are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act, and it shall be the duty of the several county's attorneys, in the respective counties, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain violations." (Italics supplied.)

[Nature of Instant Proceeding]

We are met, at the outset, with the question whether the instant proceeding is civil or criminal. Appellee argues that it is criminal in character. In support of that view, our attention is called to section 50-403 of the Unfair Practices Act, which makes it a misdemeanor to sell or offer to sell merchandise in contravention of the act, and provides a penalty therefor, and also to the code definition of crimes and criminal offenses. (G. S. 1935, 21-128.) This argument misconceives the question. The question is not whether the Unfair Practices Act has provisions criminal in character, but whether an injunction proceeding under section 50-404 is civil or criminal.

Appellee calls attention, further, to the opening words of section 50-404: "In addition to the penalties provided in this act," etc., and from that argues that it was the legislative intent to make an injunction "an additional punishment" for violation of the act. In support of this construction, appellee contends that the words "in addition to" mean "by way of increase or accession to," citing In re Daggett's Estate, 9 N. Y. 652, 2 Conn. Surr. 230, and Washington Loan & Trust Co. v. Hammond, 51 App. D. C. 260, 278 Fed. 569, 571. We have examined the two cases cited, but do not find them helpful to appellee's contention. The Daggett case involved construction of a statute of descent and distribution, which provided that a widow whose husband had died intestate should be entitled to certain property rights "in addition to any interest" which she should receive under other sections of the act. In the Washington Loan case a testator had bequeathed to a legatee a share in the income of a trust and "in addition to the above" certain personal property. Construing those words in connection with other words in the will involved in the controversy, it was held that the bequests were independent of each other, the words meaning "the act or process of adding or uniting." We need not labor the point further. We think that appellee's construction is not only strained but not in line with the act as a whole.

It is noted that section 50-404 does not say that the provision for injunction is made as an "additional penalty," but says that the courts are invested with jurisdiction to enjoin violations of the act, "in addition to the penalties provided in the act." (Italics supplied.) Again, section 50-404 specifically refers to the injunction proceeding as one "in equity," and section 50-406 makes the code of civil procedure applicable to the Unfair Practices Act as to "the filing and use of affidavits," . . . "the authority and duty of officers as related to any of the above matters, and any and all further acts of civil procedure necessary to the filing and maintenance of any action as provided herein" (italics supplied) and as to other matters not pertinent here.

We find nothing in the Unfair Practices Act to justify taking its injunction provision out from under the rule that injunction is a civil suit. It is stated in 43 C. J. S. 779:

> "A suit for injunction is a civil suit, governed by rules of procedure applicable to other civil suits; more particularly it is an equitable remedy, and governed by the rules of procedure governing equity proceedings generally. . . ."

Conformably, the general statutory provisions as to injunctions were made a part of the civil code (G. S. 1935, 60-1101 to 60-1121, incl.) and not of the criminal code. A proceeding for injunction under section 50-404 being civil in nature, it follows that any statutes which deal only with criminal actions or proceedings are not applicable thereto.

We consider next, appellant's contention that the allegations of paragraph "third," supra, of the petition upon which injunction was sought, are general, indefinite, and assert no facts with sufficient particularity to apprise the defendant as to the acts complained of and, therefore, do not state a cause of action for injunctive relief.

A petition for an injunction, like any other petition, must state facts which, if true, will entitle the plaintiff to the relief sought. The general rule is that the petition must make a prima facie case for final relief by alleging facts upon which the injunction is sought. (43 C. J. S. 844-846.)

It is stated in 28 Am. Jur. 457, with supporting cases cited:

> "The well-established rule of equity pleading, as to certainty of averment, must be followed. This requires that the facts relied on for injunctive relief be stated in a direct and positive manner and with certainty and precision. In most cases, general certainty is all that is required, it being sufficient if the allegations distinctly apprise the defense of the precise case it is required to meet." (Italics supplied.)

We are cognizant of the rule that mere indefiniteness, uncertainty, or generality in the allegations of a petition do not ordinarily make it demurrable, the remedy being by motion to make definite and certain. (Kirwin v. McIntosh, 151 Kan. 289, and cases cited p. 292, 98 P. 2d 160; cases cited in West's Kansas Digest, Pleading, 122(2); Hatcher's Kansas Digest, Pleading, § 162.) This rule, however, does not protect, as against demurrer, a petition, the allegations of which are framed in general terms, unless the allegations cover facts material and essential to the statement of a cause of action.

Moreover, as heretofore noted, the appellee successfully resisted appellant's motion to make paragraph "third" definite and certain. It follows under the established rule that the petition is to be strictly construed as against the pleader as to matters covered by the motion. (Sanik v. Shryock Realty Co., 156 Kan. 641, 135 P. 2d 545; Leeka v. Yount, 145 Kan. 155, 156, 64 P. 2d 24; Lofland v. Croman, 152 Kan. 312, 316, 103 P. 2d 772, and cases there cited.)

Generally, the sufficiency of a bill or a complaint for an injunction may be tested by demurrer or, if the statute so provides, its sufficiency may be attacked by a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction. (43 C. J. S. 871.) Our statute provides for application to vacate or modify either upon the petition and affidavits, upon which the injunction was granted, or upon affidavits on the part of the party enjoined, and provides for orders allowing, dissolving or modifying the injunction. (G. S. 1935, 60-1118.) The appellant here presented the issue of sufficiency of the petition, both by demurrer and by motion to dissolve.

Paragraph "third" need not be repeated. Its allegations are in the most general terms. It does not allege whether defendant sold, or offered to sell below cost as a wholesaler or as a retailer; nor by what method or in what manner it advertised to sell below cost, and does not even set forth the county in which alleged unlawful acts took place. In fact, the paragraph does not even conform with the general language of the statute. Under section 50-402, the sales or offers to sell below cost which are declared to be "unfair competition and contrary to public policy, and the policy of this act" are such sales or offers to sell which are made (1) "with the intent of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor or otherwise injuring a competitor, impair and prevent fair competition, injure public welfare," and (2) "where the result of such advertising, offer, or sale, is to tend to deceive any purchaser or prospective purchaser or to substantially lessen competition, or to unreasonably restrain trade, or to tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." (Italics supplied.) The petition omits entirely the essential element of intent to unfairly divert trade from a competitor and to impair and prevent competition and injure public welfare.

In support of its contention that the allegations were sufficient to justify issuance of the temporary injunction, appellee cites Parkhurst v. Investors Syndicate, 138 Kan. 7, 23, P. 2d 589; Breweries Co. v. Kansas City, 96 Kan. 731, 153 Pac. 523; Wigton v. Donnelly, 122 Kan. 796, 253 Pac. 400; Du Bois v. City of Galena, 128 Kan. 253, 276 Pac. 802; K. P. Rly. Co. v. McCormick, 20 Kan. 107. These cases have been examined and are not found to be persuasive here. The Parkhurst case, supra, was an action to construe plaintiff's rights as holder of certain certificates and the liability of the defendant which had issued them. Referring to the code provision (Sec. 60-704) that a petition must contain "a statement of facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language and without repetition," the opinion recites that the petition did so state "the rather peculiar facts constituting the cause of action." It was noted in the opinion that the plaintiff alleged ownership of the certificates, and that they had been properly assigned to him; that he had tendered the required transfer fee; that the defendant had unlawfully refused to record the assignments, and other facts constituting cause of action, not necessary here to recite. Such definite allegations of fact are not comparable with those in the instant petition.

Similarly, in the Breweries Co. case, supra, the allegations of fact were far more definite than those we have here. Moreover, in that case there had been no motion to make definite and certain.

In the Wigton case, supra, it was held that an order of the trial court sustaining a motion to strike out certain letters attached to the petition, on the ground they were redundant and constituted the pleading of evidence, was not an appealable order. Although dismissing the appeal, this court said that the court did not err in striking the letters, the petition not conforming to the requirements of section 60-704, supra. The case has little, if any, pertinancy here.

In the Supreme Court of the State of New York, County of Bronx. Special Term, Part I. N. Y. L. J., March 25, 1948. Decision, April 2, 1948.

New York Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Act—Minimum Resale Price—Effect of Issuance of Trading Stamps.—The merchandising practice of issuing trading stamps with the sale of merchandise subject to minimum resale prices established under fair trade contracts, which stamps are redeemable in merchandise, constitutes the granting of a cash discount. Such a practice, when not done for the purpose of cutting the price of any merchandise in connection with the resale of which the stamps were offered, but for the purpose of inviting and rewarding purchases for cash, is not unfair competition and is not actionable under the provisions of the Fair Trade Act.

See the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.

Opinion

McGEEHAN, J.: The court views the evidence adduced at the trial as tending to establish two inconsistent and conflicting theories: one, urged by the plaintiff that the trading stamps in litigation were in fact a rebate on the retail selling price of restricted merchandise; and the second theory, the one urged by the defendant, that the trading stamps were in fact a cash discount allowed for cost sales which acted as an inducement for good-will for the business being conducted on the premises. It appears that the trading stamps were issued for all merchandise sold for cash, and they were not limited to those articles specified and restricted by the agreements set forth. The court finds that the plaintiff has not adduced sufficient proof to preponderate in the alleged cause of action set forth in the complaint. The court observes that cash discounts for cash sales in retail sales do not differ in essential respects from the discounts allowed for cash payments in wholesale transactions to which nobody attributes any illegality or impropriety. Accordingly, the court finds as a matter of fact that there is as much proof to establish the defendant's factual contention as there is to establish the plaintiffs' alleged cause of action, and since the plaintiff, as a matter of law, has the burden of proof as to all the issues of fact which he has failed to meet in this litigation, the defendant's motion, made at the end of the entire case, to dismiss the complaint is granted. Settle decision and judgment accordingly.

Decision of April 2, 1948

Findings of Fact

1. That plaintiffs are, respectively, owners of duly licensed pharmacies located in the Borough of Bronx, City and State of New York, where they sell at retail patent medicines, drugs, pharmaceuticals, cosmetics, and other medicinal and toilet products.

2. That the stores owned by the respective plaintiffs are located within a radius of three and one-half city blocks of the store of defendant.

3. That at the times herein mentioned, defendant owned, operated and maintained, and still operates and maintains, a retail drug store, known as "Webster Drug Store", at No. 1457 Unionport Road, in the Borough of Bronx, City and State of New York, where it sells at retail, among other things, patent medicines, drugs, pharmaceuticals and other medicinal and toilet products.

4. That plaintiffs are in free and open competition with defendant and with each other.

5. That prior to the acts of defendant hereinafter described, certain manufacturers, distributors and wholesalers of drugs, patent medicines, pharmaceuticals, cosmetics, and medicinal and toilet products, pursuant to Chapter 976 of the Laws of 1935 (commonly known as the "Fair Trade Law") entered into contracts with retailers in the State of New York, which said contracts provide, among other things, that said retailers would not advertise, offer for sale or sell the respective products of said manufacturers, distributors, and wholesalers at less than the minimum prices stipulated therein by and between said manufacturers, wholesalers and distributors, and the said retailers, respectively.

6. That all of said products with respect to which the aforesaid contracts were made are articles of standard quality, packaged in standard sizes, and which bear or the contents of which bear the trade-mark and trade-name of the manufacturer, distributor or owner thereof, and are sold in the State of New York in open and fair competition with products of the same general class produced and sold by others.

7. That all of the aforesaid products with respect to which such contracts were made are sold by plaintiffs and defendants in competition with each other.

8. That at the time the acts of defendant hereinafter described were performed and committed and at the time of the commencement of this action and at all times herein mentioned, the aforesaid contracts were and still are in force.

9. That prior to the acts of defendant hereinafter described, said defendant was notified of the existence and terms of the said contracts and of the minimum prices stipulated therein; and at the time of the said acts, defendant had knowledge of the existence and terms of said contracts and of the minimum prices stipulated therein.

10. That pursuant to written agreement entered into between defendant, named therein as "Webster Drug Store", and The Sperry and Hutchinson Company, defendant has ordered and received from said company from time to time pads of "S & H" discount stamps which it has offered and distributed to its customers who have purchased merchandise subject to the aforesaid contracts at the minimum resale prices stipulated therein, in consideration of their making cash payments, at the rate of one stamp for each ten cents paid, and has distributed among its customers "S & H" stamp books within which to paste and accumulate said stamps for redemption, and has redeemed, when presented, each filled stamp book of 1,200 stamps, representing total cash purchases of $120, by delivering in exchange therefor $2.00 worth of defendant's merchandise amounting in value to 1.66 per cent of the cash purchases so represented by each filled stamp book, which filled books have later been redeemed by The Sperry and Hutchinson Company paying to defendant $2.00 in cash for each.

11. That defendant has offered said stamps to its cash customers at said rates indiscriminately as respects the character of the merchandise purchased by them whether or not the merchandise be subject to any contract entered into under the Fair Trade Act.

12. That the said practice of allowing cash discounts in retail merchandising pursuant to the discount stamp system of The Sperry and Hutchinson Company has been long established and widely used in the State of New York and in thirty-eight of the United States.

13. That the offering and issuance of said stamps by defendant was not for the purpose of cutting the resale price of any merchandise in connection with the the resale of which said stamps were offered, nor did it operate to affect the good will or other value of any such merchandise or of any brand or trade-mark thereof in violation of the provisions and purposes of the Fair Trade Act.

14. That the actual purpose of the offering and issuance of said "S & H" stamps in the manner aforesaid was to invite and reward the payment of cash on purchases made in defendant's store.

Conclusions of Law

I. That the offering and issuance of "S & H" discount stamps in the manner aforesaid constitutes a discount in consideration of the payment of cash by defendant's customers.

II. That the evidence does not establish that the defendant has wilfully and knowingly advertised, or offered for sale or sold, any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of said Fair Trade Act.

III. That the merchandising practice, as established by the evidence, of offering stamps in the manner aforesaid is not unfair competition and is not actionable at the suit of the plaintiffs under the provisions and purposes of the Fair Trade Act.

IV. That the defendant is entitled to judgment dismissing plaintiffs' complaint on the merits with costs, and judgment is hereby directed accordingly.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Docket No. 20833. Decided April 8, 1948.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Preliminary Injunction—Radio Broadcasting Networks—Concert of Action.—An unaffiliated broadcasting station is not entitled, in a suit brought under the Sherman Act, to temporary injunctions requiring national radio networks to continue their existing relationships with the station whereby the latter fixed the advertising rates for the networks' programs and paid them commissions. The cancellation by the networks of the arrangements, when done pursuant to the terms of their agreements with the station, did not constitute a boycott. The simultaneous notice of termination of the agreements is an insufficient basis for the charge of concerted action where it is shown that both networks were in a position where time was of the essence in their competition with each other. A general uniformity in the form of the agreements which results merely from common business solutions to identical problems in a competitive industry is not persuasive evidence of conspiracy.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.525.

For appellant: William L. McGovern, Seymour Krieger; Courtney, Krieger and Jorgensen and David Greenbaum, of counsel.

For appellees: Hawkins, Delafield & Wood, for American Broadcasting Co., Inc.; Joseph A. McDonald, Clarence Fried and Franklin S. Wood, of counsel. Lauterstein, Spiller & Brown, for Mutual Broadcasting System, Inc.; Leon Lauterstein and Jacob L. Isaacs, of counsel.

[Nature of Action]

AUGUSTUS N. HAND, C. J.: This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying a motion for a preliminary injunction. Such orders are largely within the discretion of the judge hearing the motion and we have no reason to suppose that he abused his discretion in the present case.

The plaintiff is the owner of radio broadcasting station WSAY at Rochester, New York, and brought an action against the four chain broadcasting networks, National Broadcasting Company, Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., Mutual Broadcasting System, and American Broadcasting Company, Inc., and two of their officers. It sought treble damages and a permanent injunction against all of them for violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. It charged that by their concerted action these networks had unlawfully linked together all important broadcasting stations and national advertisers by a series of mutually exclusive contracts and had used their resulting powers to dictate arbitrarily the price at which all broadcasting facilities would be available, with the purpose and effect of excluding Station WSAY from the network advertising market. The plaintiff moved for a preliminary injunction against American and Mutual to prevent them from withdrawing their programs from its station pursuant to the above alleged conspiracy. This was in effect an application for a mandatory injunction pendente lite in order to compel American and Mutual to continue their existing relationships by providing plaintiff's station with programs. Judge Coxe, before whom the application for a preliminary injunction was heard, denied the motion, and granted an application by the Veterans Broadcasting Co., Inc., owner of Station WVET in Rochester, to intervene as a party defendant.

For some time prior to the present action all four networks furnished programs for the three broadcasting stations then existing in Rochester. NBC and CBS each had one of these stations as an exclusive affiliate; WSAY secured programs under special non-affiliate agreements with both American and Mutual. The arrangement with each of these two networks permitted the plaintiff to fix the price to be charged advertisers for the use of its facilities and gave the networks a fifteen per cent selling commission. The agreement with American network could be cancelled by either party on twenty-eight days notice. The one with Mutual was on an informal basis terminable at the will of either party. The two networks sought unsuccessfully to obtain a standard affiliation contract with the plaintiff on terms comparable to those they had with their other stations. Plaintiff refused these offers because they did not give to it the right to fix the rate to be charged an advertiser for the use of its station. The defendants contend that since WSAY was then the only available station in Rochester that was not bound to any network by an affiliation contract it could and did refuse any standard contract and instead demanded exorbitant rates for its facilities. In May and June 1947, the Federal Communications Commission granted licenses for two new stations in Rochester, WARC and WVET. Plaintiff still refused a standard contract with Mutual which was offered, demanding its stated station rate instead. Mutual then entered into an affiliation agreement with WVET, American entered into an affiliation agreement with WARC, and both cancelled their existing arrangements with the plaintiff.

[No Evidence of Conspiracy]

In the record now before us there is no persuasive evidence of a conspiracy to boycott or otherwise unlawfully exclude the plaintiff from obtaining defendants' programs, whatever may later be established at a trial. The principal ground urged in support of the charge of a boycott as a basis for the temporary injunction is that by concerted action the American and Mutual networks have cancelled their existing arrangements with the plaintiff. However, each did this pursuant to the terms of its agreement, and it is clear that if these defendants really acted individually and not jointly they were within their rights. A network is not a common carrier and each therefore had the right in the absence of concerted action to make such contracts for the distribution of its programs as it chose. Plaintiff had no inherent right to set its own rate to an advertiser and in all other respects to use the facilities of the radio network, nor does the court have power to compel defendants to deal with the plaintiff on such terms. Plaintiff misconceives the function of a network, which buys time from the stations and sells to the advertisers its facilities and the services of those stations as an aggregate. Not only are the networks not common carriers, but it would be cumbersome if not impractical for them to furnish programs if they did not have authority to deal independently with the advertising concerns instead of leaving the rates to be determined individually by the different stations which they serve. Such control by a network, operating as a single coordinating agency, would seem to be at least desirable in order that it might compete with other networks and advertising media and to assure a more reasonable distribution to every station of the income which the network as a whole may receive. We do not say that it would be impossible for a network to allow each station to set its own rate, but it would seem a less practical course of business and certainly one to which plaintiff can make no claims as of right.

[No Joint Action Shown]

The claim is made that defendants acted jointly because they gave notice of termination of their agreements with plaintiff on the same day. However, these cancellations resulted because plaintiff was unwilling to enter into affiliation agreements as each defendant desired and had a right to require as a condition of its contracting to furnish programs. The simultaneous aspect of their notices is an insufficient basis for the charge of concerted action when it is remembered that American and Mutual were both in a position where time was of the essence in their competition with each other to put into operation as soon as possible their new affiliation contracts with WVET and WARC.

[General Uniformity]

The further claim that certain business practices of the networks and terms of the affiliation agreements required by them as a condition for furnishing programs showed a conspiracy because of a general uniformity in form and practice is also unpersuasive. We cannot say that such similarity results from anything more than common business solutions to identical problems in a competitive industry, and the forms used may well merely indicate similar business practices or formulations such as we find in insurance policies, bills of lading, warehouse receipts and other commercial documents. Moreover, the similarity of many of the terms in these contracts might be explained by requirements of the Federal Communications Commission governing the stations.

[Contracts Sanctioned by FCC]

We think it improper to grant a preliminary injunction upon the charge that the networks have unlawful "exclusive" contracts with their stations where the Federal Communications Commission, after protracted hearings and consideration not only of the general public interest but of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, has specifically sanctioned many of the important terms of the affiliation contracts at present in use and the defendants have given reasonable grounds for denying their exclusiveness or illegality. See F. C. C. Report on Chain Broadcasting, Comm. Order No. 37, Docket No. 5061, May, 1941, p. 46; National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U. S. 190, 223.

[Maintenance of Existing Arrangements]

We cannot see any reason for requiring the defendants to maintain existing arrangements for providing programs for plaintiff when by the very terms of those agreements they might be cancelled and when a failure to recognize the cancellations as valid might jeopardize the new affiliation contracts made by these defendants with WVET and WARC.

[Order Affirmed]

For the foregoing reasons, the order denying a temporary injunction is affirmed.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 4525. Received by CCH in April, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Nature of the Contempt—Lack of Wilful Intent—Civil Contempt.—The fact that a petition requests criminal and civil relief is not sufficient to attach to a civil proceeding both civil and criminal characteristics. Failure to comply with the requirements of Rule 42 (b) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure requires that the proceeding be regarded as one of civil and not criminal contempt. It is further held that if a criminal contempt were charged, it was not proved because those violations of the decree which occurred did not involve the requisite wilfulness of intent.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1620.101.

Noncompliance with Decree—Absolute Prohibition of Clearance.—A decree enjoining defendant motion picture distributors and exhibitors from delaying the exhibition of any motion picture in the Chicago exchange territory by creating dead or waiting time between the conclusion of the first run of a picture in any theatre owned by any defendant and the next succeeding run of the same picture is violated by the granting of clearance by defendant distributors after first run exhibitions in the Chicago loop. The decree does not prohibit only uniform or unreasonable clearance, but is an absolute prohibition, reasonably adapted to breaking up a conspiracy which had been found to exist. When it is made clear that the absolute prohibition upon clearance is no longer necessary to preclude the revival of uniform systems of clearance or of arbitrary clearances, the decree may be modified upon appropriate application to the court.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2036.15.

Violations Not Proved by Evidence.—The evidence did not prove or tend to prove the following alleged violations of the decree: that the petitioners could only obtain motion pictures for exhibition in their theatre upon the payment of excessive or discriminatory film rentals; that any one zoning system was set up by three distributor defendants; that the respondents had maintained a uniform system of releasing motion pictures in Chicago; or that the respondents had boycotted producers who licensed their motion pictures for exhibition in petitioners' theatre.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Double Features—Purpose, Intent and Effect—Attempted Compliance with Decree.—The portion of the decree which prohibits the playing of double features for the purpose with the intent, or with the effect of preventing plaintiffs' theatre from obtaining films which have not been theretofore played by competing theatres owned or operated by defendants is not violated by the playing of double features after plaintiffs had been given an opportunity to negotiate for a first run.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Delaying Exhibition—Two-Week Period.—The prohibition against delaying the exhibition of any motion picture by permitting a run of such picture longer than two weeks in any theatre owned or operated by any defendant is not violated by the playing of a picture at a loop theatre for two weeks, after which duplicate prints thereof are released to outlying theatres, including plaintiffs' theatre, the loop theatre continuing to exhibit the film for a third week.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Failure to Release Pictures—Efforts to Establish Proper System of Release.—The failure of a defendant to release any pictures for first run in Chicago for several weeks after the effective date of the decree, where not shown to have been motivated by any desire to violate the decree, but where shown to be due to efforts to establish a proper system of release, does not violate the decree.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Road-Show Release—Removal from Exhibition—Violation of Decree.—The prohibition against dead or waiting time applies to the release of a motion picture on a road show basis, with subsequent removal from exhibition. The prohibition of clearances did not admit of any exceptions for road shows or any other unusual situations, without specific court authorization.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.278.

License Conditioned on Fixed Admission Price—Insufficiency of Evidence—No Contempt Involved.—The evidence fails to establish the charge that a distributor conditioned the licensing of a film upon the maintenance of a certain admission price. In any event, no contempt is involved, since the decree only prohibits the distributors from fixing minimum prices at which petitioners herein must exhibit films. Petitioners' theatre was not affected by the incident complained of.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Zoning—Individual Distributors May Create Zones for Competitive Bidding.—The evidence fails to establish that the defendant distributors have maintained a uniform system of zoning. Nothing in the decree prohibits individual distributors from creating zones for competitive bidding. If the distributors provide plantiffs' theatre an opportunty to bid for the exhibition of films in the established competitive areas and if these zones are devised reasonably and in good faith, the court will not interfere.

[Facts]

IGOE, D. J.: The litigation out of which this contempt proceeding grows has been previously reported. Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, Inc. et al., 27 U. S. 251, and 150 F. (2d) 520 (CCA-7). Following the opinion of the Supreme Court, this court, on October 16, 1947, entered a decree subjecting the defendant distributors and exhibitors to certain restraints. On appeal, the decree was substantially affirmed and became effective on the 19th day of November, 1947. See Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, et al., 162 F. (2d) 877 cert. den. 68 S. C. 216. Approximately two months later, a petition for a rule to show cause was filed, charging RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., Loew's, Incorporated, Paramount Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, Balaban & Katz Corporation, Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., and Warner Bros. Theatres, Inc., as well as several individuals, with being in contempt of this court because of their noncompliance with its decree. The respondents answered, alleging compliance.

[Nature of the Contempt]

I.

At the outset we are met with an inquiry as to whether these proceedings involve civil contempt, as contended by respondents, or both civil and criminal, as contended by the petitioners.

The petition for the rule to show cause bears the original equity case number, and was filed by the plaintiffs in the equity case. No reference is made in the first fourteen paragraphs of the petition to the criminal or civil character of the contempt, but in the fifteenth paragraph the court was requested to issue a rule requiring the respondents to show cause why each of them should not be adjudged in civil and criminal contempt and punished in a manner provided by the law applicable thereto.

After the filing of the petition and the issuance of the rule to show cause, the respondents filed answers, which in some instances were quite detailed in their discussion of the facts. Thereafter the cause came to hearing before this court without a jury. During the presentation of the petitioners' case, several respondents were called as witnesses by the petitioners. In the course of the arguments on the motions to dismiss, at the close of petitioners' case, counsel for respondents referred to the proceedings as civil in nature, while counsel for the petitioners referred to them as criminal.

[Distinction Between Civil and Criminal Contempt]

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt has been the subject of long and learned discussion. Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418; Lamb v. Cramer, 285 U. S. 217. The courts, however, did not agree upon an exact formula to be used in determining the character of a contempt proceeding. See McCann v. New York Stock Exchange, 80 F. (2d) 211 (CCA-2, 1935). The adoption of Rule 42 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure was intended to establish a simple test by which the character of such proceedings could be readily ascertained. Rule 42(b) in clear language provides that a criminal contempt not requiring summary disposition under Rule 42(a), shall be prosecuted on notice. The notice must state the essential facts constituting the criminal contempt and describe it as such. The notice must be given orally by the judge or on application of the United States Attorney or of an attorney appointed by the Court for that purpose. In such a proceeding, the defendant is entitled to a trial by jury, and to admission to bail. This summary of Rule 42(b) is enough to disclose that Rule 42(b) was not complied with in this case. The notice was not given by this court nor on application of the United States Attorney, nor by any attorney appointed by this court for that purpose. The cause was presented as part of the original equity case by the attorney who represented the plaintiffs in that case. The order issuing the rule to show cause was not intended to be, and was not, an authorization to such counsel to proceed under Rule 42(b). "This was not a proceeding in which the United States was a party and in which it was seeking to vindicate the public interest." Penfield Co. v. S. E. C., 330 U. S. 585.

In my opinion, the objectives of Rule 42(b) can only be achieved by faithful adherence to its requirements. The characteristic confusion concerning contempts which existed before Rule 42(b), would be revived if exception upon exception were to be read into the rule. The Supreme Court has, of course, made it clear that the failure to call a proceeding criminal will not in itself constitute a fatal departure from the rule. United States v. United Mine Workers of America, 330 U. S. 258. In that case, however, not only was the contempt prosecuted by the United States, but the defendants were fully aware that a criminal contempt was charged. Indeed, the rule to show cause ordered the accused to be tried "by the court with an advisory jury." See Penfield Co. v. S. E. C., supra.

In this case, neither the United States attorney nor any other governmental agent or agency was a party to these proceedings or had any interest therein. The respondents proceeded upon the assumption that the contempt was civil. At the request of counsel for petitioners, several respondents testified and were cross-examined by him without regard to the rules against self-incrimination. See Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range Co., supra, at p. 444. At one point in the trial, counsel for petitioners indicated that he would amend his petition to conform to the proof. See Rule 15(b), Rules of Civil Procedure. The United Mine Workers case (supra) made it clear that in a single proceeding, where the United States is the complainant, both criminal and civil contempt may be charged. See U. S. v. Aberbach, 165 F. (2d) 713 (CCA-2). But the fact that the petition requested criminal and civil relief is not sufficient to attach to a civil proceeding both civil and criminal characteristics. Norstrom v. Wahl, 41 F. (2d) 910 (CCA-7). If a criminal contempt is committed, no undue hardship is imposed by exacting compliance with Rule 42(b).

The proceeding not having been conducted in accordance with Rule 42(b), the petitioners having availed themselves of prerogatives foreign to criminal trials and the respondents having proceeded as in a civil contempt, this proceeding must be regarded as one of civil and not criminal contempt. It is also my view that if a criminal contempt were charged, it was not proved because those violations of the decree which occurred did not involve the requisite wilfulness of intent. See United States v. Kroger Grocery & Baking Co., 163 F. (2d) 168, 175 (CCA-7, 1947).

[Issues Raised by Allegations of Civil Contempt]

II.

Are these respondents then guilty of the civil contempts alleged in the petition? The basic issues presented by the evidence and petition involve the propriety of: (1) the action of distributors in granting clearance, that is, denying to outlying theatres an opportunity to exhibit motion pictures until a certain period of time has elapsed after their first exhibition in loop theatres, located in the downtown district of Chicago; (2) double featuring in theatres owned and operated by some of the respondents on the south side of Chicago; (3) permitting the exhibition of a motion picture. "Nightmare Alley" in a theatre owned and operated by Balaban & Katz Corporation for longer than two weeks; (4) the action of one distributor, Loew's Incorporated, in failing to release motion pictures for first run in the City of Chicago; (5) the action of Paramount Pictures, Inc., in withdrawing the motion picture "Unconquered" from exhibition in Chicago after it had played two weeks in the loop; (6) the action of Twentieth Century Fox Films Corporation in licensing "Forever Amber" for exhibition at an admission price of $1.25; and (7) the establishment of competitive bidding zones.

[Violations Not Proved]

The petition also charges numerous other violations of the decree. None of these alleged violations has been proved and it would serve no useful purpose to discuss them in detail. In particular, I find that the evidence did not prove or tend to prove (1) that the petitioners could only obtain motion pictures for exhibition in their Jackson Park theatre upon the payment of excessive or discriminatory film rentals; (2) that any one zoning system was set up by Twentieth Century-Fox Films Corporation, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc. and Loew's, Incorporated; (3) that the respondents had maintained a uniform system of releasing motion pictures in the City of Chicago; (4) or that the respondents had boycotted producers who licensed their motion pictures for exhibition in the Jackson Park theatre.

Clearance

The petition charged respondent distributors with violating the decree by granting clearances after first run exhibitions in the loop. Section VII of the decree enjoined the defendants from delaying the exhibition of any motion picture in the Chicago exchange territory by creating dead or waiting time between the conclusion of the first run of a picture in any theatre owned by any defendant and the next succeeding run of the same picture. Section X of the decree defines dead or waiting time as a period of time "uniformly imposed upon exhibitors during which no theatre can exhibit a motion picture which has concluded its first run in the Chicago exchange territory."

The language of Section VII, as defined in Section X, clearly prohibits any defendant distributor from granting clearance to any defendant exhibitor. The Circuit Court of Appeals so construed the section when it upheld this provision despite the complaint of one of the defendants that "the decree should not enjoin the defendants from a first run in the loop in excess of two weeks and a subsequent run in excess of one week without any waiting time." Bigelow v. RKO, 162 F. (2d) 520, 523.

Respondents in this proceeding vigorously urged that the decree prohibited only uniform or unreasonable clearance, and contended that if clearances granted by individual distributors upon a picture-by-picture basis, were not arbitrary, and did not follow any uniform plan, such clearances were proper.

The existing authorities undoubtedly establish that there is nothing illegal in clearances as such, and that "in the absence of an unconscionably long time or too extensive an area embraced by the clearance or of a conspiracy of distributors to fix clearances, there was nothing of itself illegal in their use." See U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, et al., 66 F. Supp. 323, 342. But the litigation which preceded the entry of this court's decree disclosed the prevalence of abuses. Consequently "the provisions of the decree complained of were reasonably adapted to breaking up the conspiracy, a part of which was the method of release . . ." Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 162 F. (2d) 520, 523.

I do not mean to say that lawful clearances are perpetually enjoined in Chicago. The decree, however, does presently deny to the defendant distributors and exhibitors privileges which are not denied to their competitors. When it is made clear that the absolute prohibition upon clearances is no longer necessary to preclude the revival of uniform systems of clearance or of arbitrary clearances, the decree may be modified upon appropriate application to the court. Those respondents who granted clearance therefore violated the terms of the decree.

Double Features

Section IX of the decree prohibits the respondents from playing "double features for the purpose, with the intent, or with the effect of preventing the Jackson Park Theatre, owned by the plaintiffs from obtaining motion pictures which have not been theretofore played by competing theatres owned or operated by the defendants."

Petitioners apparently assumed that this section prohibits all respondent exhibitors from double featuring any and all prior run pictures on the South Side of Chicago. This conclusion is not justified either by the language of the decree or the intention of this court. Double featuring in and of itself is not illegal. See Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, et al., 150 F. (2d) 877, 885. Theatres throughout the country, whether because of competitive conditions or custom, show double features. Only the use of double features with the intent, purpose and effect "of preventing the plaintiffs from obtaining pictures before the defendants have channeled them through the conspiratorial system" was enjoined. See Bigelow v. RKO, etc., 162 F. (2d) 520, 523.

The evidence convinces me that the respondents attempted to comply with Section IX of the decree. No motion pictures were double featured by any respondent exhibitors on the South Side of Chicago until petitioners' theatre had been given an opportunity to negotiate for a first run. Only after the Jackson Park Theatre refused to negotiate for, or declined to license, these pictures, did the respondents double feature them. The decree enjoined the playing of two feature pictures when the object or effect of the double featuring was to deny petitioners' theatre "clear product." The evidence indicates that "clear product" was available to the petitioners who, at no time during the entire period in question, were compelled to play a motion picture which had been previously exhibited at a South Side theatre owned by any respondent. So long as distributors afford the Jackson Park Theatre an opportunity to negotiate for first run pictures, respondent exhibitors may play two feature pictures on their programs, after the Jackson Park Theatre has refused or failed to license such pictures.

This court's reservation of jurisdiction to modify and enforce the decree will permit the correction of any abuses, if abuses develop, in the practice of double featuring.

"Nightmare Alley"

The picture "Nightmare Alley" was played at the State and Lake Theatre in Chicago for two weeks, and thereafter duplicate prints thereof were immediately released to outlying theatres, including the Jackson Park. The State and Lake continued to play "Nightmare Alley" for a third week, during which the same motion picture was being exhibited in the neighborhood theatres.

Section VII prohibits the defendants from delaying the exhibition of any motion picture by permitting a run of such picture longer than two weeks in any theatre owned or operated by any defendant.

It is clear from the sequence of events that the exhibition of "Nightmare Alley" was not delayed in the Chicago exchange territory and Section VII was not violated.

Failure to Release Pictures

For several weeks after the effective date of the decree, the respondent Loew's Incorporated failed to release any motion pictures for first run in the City of Chicago. Witnesses on behalf of Loew's admitted the charge that no pictures were immediately released following the decree, but asserted that no violation of this decree was intended and that the respondents were attempting to formulate a legal and proper system for the release of motion pictures in the City of Chicago.

The evidence established that before the issuance of the rule to show cause, Loew's Incorporated had begun the release of motion pictures in Chicago. Under these circumstances, Loew's failure to release pictures does not appear to have been motivated by any desire to violate the decree but was due to its efforts to establish a proper system of release. Its delay in so doing was not arbitrary and did not violate the decree.

Road Show

During the summer of 1947, before the effective date of this decree, Paramount Pictures, Inc. released the motion picture "Unconquered," an unusually costly production, throughout the country on what is called a "road show basis," the picture being exhibited in a single theatre in a selected number of cities for a limited time. After the initial showing in the selected theatres, "Unconquered" was removed from exhibition, and witnesses testified that the picture would be generally released some time in April or May of this year.

The road show is an infrequent but well-known occurrence in the industry. See U. S. v. Paramount, 66 F. Supp. 323, 333, footnote 1 for a definition. Nevertheless, the prohibition of clearances and dead or waiting time in the decree did not admit of any exceptions for road shows or any other unusual situations, without specific court authorization. This respondent adopted the paradoxical position of complying with that portion of the decree which prohibits first run theatres from exhibiting a picture for longer than two weeks, while departing from that portion of the decree which prohibits dead or waiting time.

In my opinion, the prohibition against dead or waiting time applied to "Unconquered" with the same clarity as the two week limitation. Paramount Pictures, Inc. consequently violated the decree by its conduct with reference to that motion picture.

Price Fixing

Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation was charged with having licensed the picture "Forever Amber" for exhibition in the Rialto Theatre upon condition that an admission price of $1.25 be charged. The evidence did not convincingly establish that the distributor conditioned the licensing of the film upon the maintenance of that admission price. In any event, however, no contempt is involved since Section V (e) of the decree only prohibits the distributors from fixing minimum admission prices at which petitioners herein must exhibit motion pictures. Cf. U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 70 Fed. Sup. 53, 73 (D. C. N. Y. 1946). The Jackson Park Theatre was not affected by the incident and no violation of the decree is involved. The general charge in paragraph 12 of the petition that Balaban & Katz and Warner Brothers Theatres maintained admission prices by tacit agreement, was not proved.

Zoning

The evidence failed to establish that the defendant distributors have maintained a uniform system of zoning. The evidence did establish that several distributors, including Paramount Pictures, Twentieth Century-Fox, RKO Radio Pictures, and Loew's Incorporated, devised plans whereby different sections of the City of Chicago, including the South Side, were zoned. The petitioners' theatre, the Jackson Park, was afforded an opportunity to bid against other theatres within the same zone in order to obtain motion pictures. The zones established by Twentieth Century-Fox differed from those of RKO, those of RKO differed from Loew's, Incorporated, and Paramount's differed from the others.

There is nothing in the decree which prohibits individual distributors from creating zones for competitive bidding. This court does not propose to interfere with the right of distributors to release their pictures pursuant to such plans unless it be shown that the zones are being used as a subterfuge to nullify the decree. The expediting court in United States v. Paramount Pictures recognized the propriety of competitive zone bidding when it required that, except with reference to their own theatres, distributors should offer licenses at a minimum price for any run desired by the operators of each theatre within a competitive area. The court stated: "The license desired shall in such case be granted to the highest responsible bidder having a theatre of a size and equipment adequate to show the picture upon the terms offered." 66 F. Supp. 323, 358. In the decree in that case, a competitive area was defined as "the territory occupied by more than one theatre in which it may fairly and reasonably be said that such theatres compete with each other for the exhibition of features in any run." 70 F. Supp. 53, 74.

The decree in this case attempted to ensure petitioners' theatre an equal opportunity with theatres operated by defendant exhibitors to compete for first run exhibitions. The Circuit Court of Appeals has already said that "the plaintiffs have a right to compete for any playing position, but they have no right to be awarded and protected by decree in any certain position." 162 F. (2d) 520, 524. It may be that petitioners disagree with the zones fixed by respondents and feel they should be larger in some instances and smaller in others. The determination of whether a zone is properly established involves numerous factors which depend on business judgment and which will not be reviewed by this court except under unusual circumstances. If the distributors provide the Jackson Park Theatre an opportunity to bid for the exhibition of motion pictures in the established competitive areas and if these zones are devised reasonably and in good faith, this court will not interfere with their commercial practices. There is nothing in the record before me to indicate that the respondents did not establish their zones in a manner consistent with these views.

Respondents

Of the corporate respondents, I find the following to have been in contempt: Balaban & Katz corporation, Paramount Pictures, Inc., RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation.

I further find that no contempt charge was sustained against Warner Bros. Theatres, Inc., Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., or Loew's, Incorporated. None of these corporations was charged with granting clearance and none of them violated the decree in any other respect. Although no specific charge of granting or accepting clearance was made in the petition for the rule to show cause against RKO or Balaban & Katz, these respondents were charged generally with maintaining an objectionable system of release and the issue was tried with their implied consent. See Rule 15(b), Rules of Civil Procedure.

The rule to show cause will be discharged as to all individual respondents.

The participation of their presidents, Spyros P. Skouras and Barney Balaban, in the contempts committed by Twentieth Century-Fox, Paramount Pictures, and Balaban & Katz, was not established. Modern business practice requires that officers of large corporations delegate duties to, and rely upon, other officers and employees. When there is no evidence of bad faith; where the responsibility for compliance has been reposed upon another official or employee without any attempt to evade the obligation of compliance; and if the president of the corporation was not derelict in performing his direct or supervisory duties, the occupancy of an official position is not enough to demonstrate contumacious participation. See U. S. v. Standard San. Mfg. Co., 191 F. 172, 194, affmd. 226 U. S. 20; Worden v. U. S., 204 F. 1 (CCA 6); U. S. v. Taystee Baking Co., 55 F. Supp. 490.

The Assistant General Counsel of Paramount Pictures was also cited for contempt. The charges against him were not proved. Indeed, no evidence whatsoever was presented to show his connection with any of the contemptuous acts. There is not even a suggestion in the record that his attitude towards this court or this decree was in any wise improper or incorrect. The evidence also failed to prove that the Branch Manager of the Chicago District for RKO Radio Pictures, the Branch Manager of Twentieth Century-Fox, or any of the other individual respondents, bore any responsibility for granting or accepting clearances, with but three exceptions; to-wit: William G. Gehring, General Sales Manager, and Jack Lorentz, Midwest Sales Manager, of Twentieth Century-Fox, and John Balaban, Secretary-Treasurer of Balaban & Katz. In every instance, however these officials were merely following the advice of their attorneys. While their attorneys may have acted imprudently in giving opinions without reference to the views of this court and while counsel may have arrived at erroneous conclusions in so doing, the reliance of these respondents upon counsel for the interpretation of a legal document was reasonable and natural. Although it is no doubt true that in a civil contempt proceeding neither advice of counsel nor good intentions can sterilize conduct otherwise contemptuous (Economist Furnace Co. v. Wrought-Iron Range Co., 86 F. 1010; Eustace v. Lynch, 80 F. (2d) 652 (CCA 9); In re Eskay, 122 F. (2d) 819 (CCA 3)), the circumstances attending the conduct of the individual respondents in this case persuade me to find that they were not in contempt. That these individuals acted in good faith and in the belief that they were right in following the advice of counsel, I have no doubt. The dignity of this court and the sanctity of the decree will be sufficiently protected by the findings against the corporate respondents. See Dinsmore v. Louisville, New Albany & Chicago R. R. Co., 3 F. 593, 608.

Penalty and Punishment

At the close of the entire proceedings, counsel for petitioners stated that his clients were not asserting any claim to damages, but suggested the imposition of a million dollar fine, to be paid to the clerk of this court and held by him until the lapse of a year. If during that time respondents complied with the decree, such amount was to be returned to them.

As I have already indicated, I regard this as a civil proceeding and hence one which does not permit me to take any punitive measures. In a civil contempt, the court may only impose remedial punishment to compensate a litigant who has suffered special injury or damages by reason of the contumacious conduct of the defendant. See Parker v. U. S., 126 F. (2d) 370, 380 (CCA 1, 1942), 153 F. (2d) 66, 70. Apparently, petitioners have not thus suffered. As partial reparation, however, all respondents who have been found guilty of contempt will be charged with the costs of this proceeding and with the expenses incurred by petitioners in presenting this matter to the court.

Petitioners may file an application for allowance of their attorneys' fees and expenses. The respondents will be given an opportunity to be heard on such application.

Findings and a form of decree should be proposed by the parties in accordance with the views herein expressed.

[¶ 62,243] United States v. Cotton Valley Operators Committee, The Ohio Oil Company, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, Shreveport Division. Civil Action No. 2209. Filed April 22, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion for More Definite Statement of Facts—Nature of Alleged Agreement.—In an action charging producers of hydrocarbons with conspiring to monopolize trade, in violation of the antitrust laws, a motion by defendants for a more definite statement of facts is granted in part, (1) to require some allegation of fact as to just what was done to bring about a monopoly and the exclusion of competitors other than the legal conclusions that the monopoly existed and caused the exclusions, and (2) to require a reasonable outline of the conditions in the field that made the products available to public participation in their commerce, and the available facilities and outlets making competition possible, such as refineries, pipelines, etc., which were excluded.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.251.

Motion to Produce Certain Documents—Relevancy of Testimony Sought.—The motion of a defendant oil company to require the production of certain documents is denied for the reasons that such testimony is irrelevant, and that the requirements of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were not complied with.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.345, and prior opinion, reported at ¶ 62,216.

Motion to Dismiss—Rights of Owners to Dispose of Interests—Nature of Substances.—A motion to dismiss the complaint on the grounds that in pooling their interests in the oil field, pursuant to the requirements of the state statute and orders of the Conservation authorities, the defendants became owners in indivisum of the production under their control, with the right to make agreements for handling it to their mutual profit or benefit, and that the nature of the substances produced and the only means for separating the constituent elements for marketing make impracticable a division in kind at any given point prior to realization, without consequent loss or added expense, is denied. It is held that where, as alleged here, eighty-five per cent of the producing area is leased to a number of lessees and they, together with the surface owners, are compelled by virtue of the said conservation requirements to pool that percentage of the field, a situation is created whereby it is made possible for such a group, if the product happens to be of premium quality, to monopolize the same and to demand high prices, so long as competition can be kept out. This appears to be what the complaint intends to charge, and that when complainant shall have complied with the ruling for a more definite statement of the cause of action, the issues of fact and law will appear sufficiently to warrant a trial on the merits.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.

For plaintiff: Tom C. Clark, Attorney General; John F. Sonnett, George B. Haddock, W. B. Watson Snyder, and James R. Browning, Special and Assistants Attorney General; Malcolm E. Lafargue, United States Attorney.

For defendants: John M. Madison; W. S. Wilkinson, Wilkinson, Lewis & Wilkinson; John T. Gayton; J. R. Goff; Sidney G. Meyers, all of Shreveport, Louisiana; Vernon Roberts, Ada, Oklahoma.

[Nature of Action]

DAWKINS, Judge: The general nature of the complaint in this case is described in the opinion filed herein on January 21, 1948. We now have for consideration three additional motions, to-wit: (1) By some 20 odd defendants for a more definite statement of facts upon which the demand is founded; (2) By the Ohio Oil Co., for the production of certain documents; and (3) a motion to dismiss.

Taking these motions up in the order named (1) requests further information with respect to Articles 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of the complaint.

The request as to paragraph 10 has been voluntarily answered by the complainant to the satisfaction of the defendants.

At the oral argument of this motion, after hearing both sides, the request as to Article 11 of the complaint consisting of paragraphs 2, 3, and 5, through 8, were denied from the Bench; while No. 4 had also been answered by complainant to the satisfaction of defendants.

As to Article 13 of the complaint referred to in paragraph 9 of the motion for particulars, the complainant is asked:

"What was the nature of any agreement (tacit or otherwise) between defendants herein (other than those agreements expressed and contained in the 'Cotton Valley Unitization and Pressure Maintenance Agreement') to which it is claimed that this defendant was a party and when and with whom such agreement or agreements made or by what acts or actions was such agreement or conspiracy made manifest?"

Article 13 of the complaint alleges that:

"Said combination and conspiracy (to monopolize and restrain trade in the products of the field, other than what was reinjected for conservation and to increase production) has consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action among defendants, the substance and terms of which were and are, defendants."

Then follows sub-paragraphs (a) through (d) charging that defendants did agree, while so engaged, "to exclude others" (a) from the business of extracting, processing, and refining various hydrocarbons; (b) from the business of distributing and selling said products; (c) to sell jointly through channels selected by themselves; and (d) to fix uniform prices, terms and conditions of sale, involving over 85 per cent of the "natural flow of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons produced from the field and not reinjected therein."

The motion, in paragraphs 9 through 15, both inclusive, requests that complainant (9) state the "nature of any agreements" with persons other than defendants, after unitization and pressure maintenance agreements, outside of and beyond the signed document approved by the Department of Conservation of the state, which it is claimed defendants entered into, giving the names of the parties thereto besides themselves; (10) "by what means and in what manner * * * defendants undertook to exclude others" from any of such activities; (11) the nature of the business in which the defendants agreed to engage other than extracting and reinjecting the substances into the field, "where the same was conducted; and at what point or in what manner or by what means could said operations be recognized or identified"; (12) the means and manner used to exclude others from the business of distributing and selling the products taken from the field; (13) nature of the agreement relating to sale and distribution, other than the sale of defendants' own products upon the open market, and with whom made; (14) through what channels did defendants agree to sell; with whom and how did such agreements arise, for how long did each continue, and how were such channels generally selected; (15) what were the prices, terms and conditions agreed upon and in what respects those prices did not conform to those established and available upon the open market, as well as the persons and dates on which said agreements were made, etc.

As to paragraph 9 (Art. 13 of the complaint) the nature of the alleged agreement is described in general terms in said paragraphs 13 (a) through 13 (d) of the complaint, as having been between the large number of defendants charged, sufficiently, it is believed, to apprise them that it was to permit them to control the residue of production remaining after extracting and reinjecting certain elements into the field for the purpose of greater recoveries, including refining, distributing and selling at uniform prices agreed on between them and by excluding all others from any of these activities.

The details as to which of the defendants refined, distributed, shipped, marketed or sold these products and fixed the prices therefor, including the choosing of the channels of operations, to the exclusion of others, whether carried on through third persons or agencies or by the defendants themselves, involved matters of evidence or proof, it is believed, which did not have to be alleged. Defendants may have recourse to interrogatories under No. 33 of the Rules of Federal Procedure for any additional information to which they may be properly entitled.

Paragraph 16 of the motion deals with Article 14 of the complaint. This article charges as follows:

> "14. The continuing agreements, understandings and concerted action of the defendants set out in paragraphs 11 and 12 of this complaint do not contribute to the conservation of the oil and gas resources of the Field or of the State of Louisiana, or prevent the waste and depletion thereof. Said agreements, understandings and concerted action are not necessary, and do not contribute, to the separation of any of the liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons taken from the Field, nor to the reinjection of a residue of liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons under pressure into the natural reservoirs of the Field. Said agreements, understandings and concerted action are not authorized by Act Number 225 of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana of 1936, Act Number 157 of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana of 1940, nor by Order Number 10-B, dated July 1, 1940, Order Number 10-C, dated January 28, 1941, nor any other order issued by the Commissioner of Conservation of the State of Louisiana."

Defendants asked "in what respects * * * it is claimed that * * * operations * * * by defendants did not contribute to conservation * * * or were not authorized by statute or order of the Commissioner of Conservation * * * and at what point in the course of such operations did defendants depart from conservation and administrative authority?"

It must be assumed, it would seem, that in the course of the investigation preceding the filing of the complaint, complainant determined the nature of the operation up to the point where permissible acts of conservation ended and the alleged illegal combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce began. In order to prevail, it will have to make proof of this sufficiently to enable the Court to draw the line and be able to say that "so far your conduct was proper, but beyond this, you began to violate the Sherman Act." The situation presented in this case is unique, in that the complaint as pointed out in the former opinion, set forth the background and history of operations in this field, which it says were proper acts of conservation, having the approval of the state agency, even though the defendants were acting in concert. It then proceeds to charge that certain other activities which were necessary to a realization of the profits or benefits in money from production were illegal. Extraction of the elements from the field production, by refining or otherwise, their transporting and marketing, were not illegal in themselves, but became so only when a point had been reached where the public or those desiring, could participate therein under the conditions which prevailed. Was it at the mouth of the well where the hydrocarbons were withdrawn, at the tanks if storage existed in the field, or at some other point, if the residue had to be transported by pipe lines. It can easily be conceived that a single extraction plant or a refinery existed in the field or vicinity, which was also operated by defendants, who conceived and put into effect the measures of conservation. If so, did any situation arise that compelled them to construct pipe lines or otherwise provide means of transportation for the use of competing refineries or operators, or can it be made to appear that there were already operating, facilities of competitors, who were denied the right to purchase those products at points available to the public? It is true that defendants must be familiar with conditions in the area, and no doubt have in their possession, records of whatever transactions took place; but charges such as those made in the complaint are quasi criminal, and as defendants' counsel say, if the Government prevails, may be taken advantage of by other private litigants to recover triple damages from these defendants. In fact, the Sherman Act is primarily criminal in its nature, but permits civil remedies, such as are sought here by the Government, to prevent its violation; and the character of the combination and conspiracy should be set forth with sufficient particularity to permit defense, if such exists. Facts should be furnished to show when and where the illegal activity began and by what means competitors were excluded.

If the defendants in this case were stockholders or officers in a single corporation, operating in the Cotton Valley Field, there would appear to be no reason why they could not acquire any part of the production, transport it in the crude state, by pipeline or otherwise, separate its consituent elements in the field, if facilities existed there, or carry it to refineries operated by themselves and then distribute and sell the finished product, as is done by most big companies throughout the country. On the other hand, if, because of the peculiar conditions, it was necessary that the owners of independent interests in the field should pool the same for the purpose of efficient and profitable recovery, under a system recognized and approved by proper authorities, a point might be reached where a continuation of that pooling of interest might become illegal, if it involved a substantial portion of production, to which the public had access before the necessity for conservation measures arose, and they were denied such rights through refusal of defendants to permit these competitors to participate, after the acts of conservation had been completed. There should be some allegation of fact as to just what was done to bring about a monopoly and the exclusion of competitors other than the legal conclusions that such monopoly existed and caused the exclusions.

Paragraph 16 (a) through 16 (d) of the complaint, under the heading "effects" alleges that the conduct of defendants "excluded other persons and companies from the business" (a) of extracting and processing the hydrocarbons, (b) from selling and marketing, (c) transporting and (d) refining and distributing the same.

Defendants asked that complainant be required to give the names and manner in which other persons were excluded from all the activities covered by these four subdivisions of the complaint.

Here again, the complaint should give a reasonable outline of the conditions in the field that (1) made the products available to public participation in their commerce, and (2) the available facilities and outlets making competition possible such as refineries, pipelines, etc., which were excluded. In all other respects the motion for particulars or further statement of facts will be denied.

The Motion of Ohio Oil Company to Produce Certain Documents

The issues presented by this motion are the same as were considered in an almost identical motion by the Magnolia Petroleum Co. in the opinion handed down on January 21, 1948. After further consideration the Court is of the view that this motion should likewise be denied for the reasons stated in that opinion.

Motion to Dismiss

The motion to dismiss is based on the contention that in pooling their interests in the Cotton Valley field, pursuant to the requirements of the state statute and orders of the Conservation authorities, the defendants became owners in indivisum of the production under their control, with the right to make agreements for handling it to their mutual profit or benefit; further, that the nature of the substances produced and the only means for separating the constituent elements for marketing made impracticable, though not impossible, a division in kind at any given point, prior to realization, without consequent loss or added expense. State decisions, as well as Federal cases are cited to the point, that there is no ownership in these fugacious minerals until brought to the surface and reduced to possession, but only a common right in the surface owners to explore therefor and bring about such possession; from which it follows that the state, under its police power, may regulate the same by requiring pooling and sharing in production, to prevent economic waste and to insure each surface owner his fair share.

There is no question that, in Louisiana, the nature of the right of surface owners in minerals is such that the state possesses and in recent years has exercised extensively its power of control and regulation by compelling landowners in many fields, where ownership was in small tracts, to pool their interests and to share in production through one or more wells for an entire block, according to acreage owned. In such situation, up to the point where the minerals pass into commerce, there exists a joint or common enterprise. Usually, the drilling or marketing is done by one or more lessees, who provide storage or access to pipelines, and the surface owners are paid in accordance with what are commonly called "division orders".

However, where, as alleged here, 85 per cent of the producing area is leased to a number of lessees and they, together with the surface owners, are compelled, by virtue of the said requirements of conservation to pool that percentage of a field of the size of Cotton Valley, a situation is created whereby it is made possible for such a group, if the product happens to be of premium quality, to monopolize the same and to demand high prices, so long as competition can be kept out. And the temptation to do so is increased by the extent of participation of the several interests in those profits; whereas, if competition in the purchase, refining and marketing were allowed to have free play, such premium production might be held to its fair value by those who were willing to take a reasonable profit instead of demanding all the traffic would stand.

In general terms this appears to be what the complaint intends to charge; although as stated in passing upon the motion for particulars or a more definite statement of facts, it has not been made clear just where the line of demarcation between conservation and the alleged monopolistic operations lies. Undoubtedly, if persons, such as are the defendants, according to the complaint, without compulsion for conservation, voluntarily entered into an agreement to pool 85 per cent of production in a field such as this, and to exclude from participation all others, through all steps to ultimate realization of the profits or benefits, which are the controlling reasons for all business enterprises, it could hardly be contended, that such a course was not within the purview of the anti-trust laws. If this were permissible as to one field, no reason can be seen why it could not be extended to others, and thus bring about a condition similar to that which precipitated dissolution of the original Standard Oil Company years ago.

It is believed that when complainant shall have complied with the ruling for a more definite statement of the cause of action, the issues of fact and law will appear sufficiently to warrant a trial on the merits.

The motion to dismiss will therefore be overruled.

Proper decree should be presented.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Exhibition of Motion Pictures—Restraint of Trade—Price Fixing.—The finding of the District Court that the fixing of minimum admission prices in licenses issued by motion picture distributors constituted a conspiracy in restraint of trade is affirmed. A vertical price-fixing conspiracy was established by proof of express agreements between each distributor-defendant and its licensees; a horizontal conspiracy was inferred from the pattern of price-fixing disclosed in the record. It is not necessary to find an express agreement to find a conspiracy. It is enough that a concert of action is contemplated and that the defendants conformed to the arrangement. The establishment of substantially uniform minimum admission prices in licenses between distributor-defendants and exhibitor-defendants, and in licenses to independent exhibitors, constituted a price-fixing combination in violation of the Sherman Act. The privilege of a copyright owner to fix the price at which his licensee may exhibit the copyrighted films cannot be used to deter competition between rivals in the exploitation of their licenses.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1240.101.

Exhibition of Motion Pictures—Restraint of Trade—Clearances and Runs.—Evidence to support the finding of the District Court that the defendants either participated in evolving a uniform system of clearances or acquiesced in it and so furthered its existence is held adequate to support a finding of a conspiracy to restrain trade by imposing unreasonable clearances. The provision of the decree enjoining defendants and their affiliates from agreeing with each other or with any exhibitors to maintain a system of clearances or from granting any clearance between theatres not in substantial competition, or from granting or enforcing any clearance against theatres in substantial competition with the theatre receiving the license for exhibition in excess of what is reasonably necessary to protect the licensee in the run granted, was plainly warranted by the findings. The Court refuses to construe the provision to allow licensors in granting clearances to take into consideration what is reasonably necessary for a fair return to the licensor. Such a construction would give the defendants power to retain the effects of the conspiracy. The provision of the decree placing the burden of proving the legality of clearance provisions upon the distributor is upheld.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Exhibition of Motion Pictures—Restraint of Trade—Pooling Agreements; Joint Ownership.—The conclusion of the District Court that the result of agreements between exhibitor-defendants, and between exhibitor-defendants and their affiliates by which theatres of two or more of them, normally competitive, were operated as a unit, the profits being shared according to prearranged percentages, was to eliminate competition pro tanto both in exhibition and distribution of features, and that the result of like agreements between exhibitor-defendants and certain independent exhibitors was to nullify competition between the allied theatres and to make more effective the competition of the group against theatres not members of the pool, is affirmed. The provision of the decree requiring dissolution of existing pooling agreements and enjoining future arrangements of that kind is upheld.

It is held that the District Court erred in ordering disaffiliation in instances of joint ownership by exhibitor-defendants and independents where the facts show that these instances are wholly devoid of any history of or relationship to restraints of trade or monopolistic practices. If in such cases the acquisition was not improperly used in furtherance of the conspiracy, its retention by defendants would be justified.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Restraint of Trade—Formula Deals, Master Agreements and Franchises.—The conclusion of the District Court that formula deals, which are licensing agreements with theatre circuits in which the fee of a given feature is measured by a specified percentage of the feature's national gross, and master agreements covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres, constitute restraint of trade is upheld. Such arrangements are unlawful in that they eliminate the possibility of bidding for films theatre by theatre, thus giving an advantage to the large circuit, and because the pooling of the purchasing power of an entire circuit in bidding for films is a misuse of monopoly power insofar as it combines the theatres in closed towns with competitive situations. The finding of the District Court that a franchise, which is a contract with an exhibitor which extends over a period of more than a motion picture season and covers the exhibition of features released by the distributor during the period of the agreement, constituted a restraint of trade is set aside so that the court may examine the problem in the light of the elimination from the decree of competitive bidding.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Restraint of Trade—Block-Booking.—The holding of the District Court that block-booking is illegal for the reasons that it prevents competitors from bidding for single features on their individual merits, and that it adds to the monopoly of a single copyrighted picture that of another copyrighted picture which must be taken and exhibited in order to secure the first, and the provision of the decree prohibiting defendants from entering into or performing any license in which the right to exhibit one feature is conditioned upon the licensee's taking one or more other features, is affirmed. The practice tends to equalize rather than differentiate the reward for the individual copyrights. The result is to add to the monopoly of the copyright in violation of the principle of the patent cases involving tying clauses.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.101.

Restraint of Trade—Discrimination.—The findings of the District Court that defendants had discriminated against small independent exhibitors and in favor of large affiliated and unaffiliated circuits through various kinds of contract provisions which gave to the large circuits great competitive advantages, and the conclusion that such discriminatory practices constitute restraints of trade condemned by the Sherman Act, are affirmed.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.192.

Provision of Decree—Competitive Bidding.—The provision of the decree requiring that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis is ordered eliminated. The proposed system of bidding affords little in the way of relief against the real evils of the conspiracy, and the task of supervising such a system would implicate the judiciary heavily in the details of business management if supervision is to be effective.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.391.

Monopoly—Expansion of Theatre Holdings—Divestiture.—The conclusions of the District Court that none of the defendants was organized or has been maintained for the purpose of achieving a national monopoly and that the five major defendants through their present theatre holdings alone do not collectively or individually have a monopoly of exhibition are based on insufficient inquiry. The failure of the District Court to consider the presence of monopoly in the first-run field, the inconclusiveness of its findings on the question of purpose or intent, and the failure of the court to consider other questions bearing on the monopoly issue require that the findings on monopoly and divestiture be set aside. The provision of the decree barring the five major defendants from further theatre expansion is likewise eliminated.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1022.27.

Consent Decree—Arbitration System.—The District Court has the power to authorize the maintenance of an arbitration system by those parties who consent, and to provide the rules and procedure under which it is to operate. Such a system would be an auxiliary procedure, barring no one from the use of other remedies for violation of the Sherman Act or of the decree. Whether such a system should be inaugurated is for the discretion of the District Court.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1580.30.

Denial of Leave to Intervene.—The orders of the District Court denying certain associations of exhibitors and a number of independent exhibitors leave to intervene are affirmed. The elimination from the decree of provisions for competitive bidding eliminates any basis for granting intervention.

[Nature of Action]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases are here on appeal[1] from a judgment of a three-judge District Court[2] holding that the defendants had violated § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, and granting an injunction and other relief. 66 F. Supp. 323; 70 F. Supp. 53.

The suit was instituted by the United States under § 4 of the Sherman Act to prevent and restrain violations of it. The defendants fall into three groups: (1) Paramount Pictures, Inc., Loew's, Incorporated, Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, which produce motion pictures, and their respective subsidiaries or affiliates which distribute and exhibit films. These are known as the five major defendants or exhibitor-defendants. (2) Columbia Pictures Corporations and Universal Corporation, which produce motion pictures, and their subsidiaries which distribute films. (3) United Artist Corporation, which is engaged only in the distribution of motion pictures. The five majors, through their subsidiaries or affiliates, own or control theatres; the other defendants do not.

The complaint charged that the producer-defendants had attempted to monopolize and had monopolized the production of motion pictures. The District Court found to the contrary and that finding is not challenged here. The complaint charged that all the defendants, as distributors, had conspired to restrain and monopolize and had restrained and monopolized interstate trade in the distribution and exhibition of films by specific practices which we will shortly relate. It also charged that the five major defendants had engaged in a conspiracy to restrain and monopolize, and had restrained and monopolized interstate trade in the exhibition of motion pictures in most of the larger cities of the country. It charged that the vertical combination of producing, distributing, and exhibiting motion pictures by each of the five major defendants violated § 1 and § 2 of the Act. It charged that each distributor-defendant had entered into various contracts with exhibitors which unreasonably restrained trade. Issue was joined; and a trial was had.[3]

First. Restraint of Trade—(1) Price Fixing

No film is sold to an exhibitor in the distribution of motion pictures. The right to exhibit under copyright is licensed. The District Court found that the defendants in the licenses they issued fixed minimum admission prices which the exhibitors agreed to charge, whether the rental of the film was a flat amount or a percentage of the receipts. It found that substantially uniform minimum prices had been established in the licenses of all defendants. Minimum prices were established in master agreements or franchises which were made between various defendants as distributors and various defendants as exhibitors and in joint operating agreements made by the five majors with each other and with independent theatre owners covering the operation of certain theatres.[4] By these later contracts minimum admission prices were often fixed for dozens of theatres owned by a particular defendant in a given area of the United States. Minimum prices were fixed in licenses of each of the five major defendants. The other three defendants made the same requirement in licenses granted to the exhibitor-defendants. We do not stop to elaborate on these findings. They are adequately detailed by the District Court in its opinion. See 66 F. Supp. 334-339.

The District Court found that two price-fixing conspiracies existed—a horizontal one between all the defendants; a vertical one between each distributor-defendant and its licensees. The latter was based on express agreements and was plainly established. The former was inferred from the pattern of price-fixing disclosed in the record. We think there was adequate foundation for it too. It is not necessary to find an express agreement in order to find a conspiracy. It is enough that a concert of action is contemplated and that the defendants conformed to the arrangement. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U. S. 208, 226-227; United States v. Masonite, 316 U. S. 265, 275. That was shown here.

On this phase of the case the main attack is on the decree which enjoins the defendants and their affiliates from granting any license, except to their own theatres, in which minimum prices for admission to a theatre are fixed in any manner or by any means. The argument runs as follows: United States v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, held that an owner of a patent could, without violating the Sherman Act, grant a license to manufacture and vend, and could fix the price at which the licensee could sell the patented article. It is pointed out that defendants do not sell the films to exhibitors, but only license them and that the Copyright Act (35 Stat. 1075, 1088, 17 U. S. C. § 1), like the patent statutes, grants the owner exclusive rights.[5] And it is argued that if the patentee can fix the price at which his licensee may sell the patented article, the owner of the copyright should be allowed the same privilege. It is maintained that such a privilege is essential to protect the value of the copyrighted films.

We start, of course, from the premise that so far as the Sherman Act is concerned, a price-fixing combination is illegal per se. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; United States v. Masonite Corporation, supra. We recently held in United States v. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. —, that even patentees could not regiment an entire industry by licenses containing price-fixing agreements. What was said there is adequate to bar defendants, through their horizontal conspiracy, from fixing prices for the exhibition of films in the movie industry.

[3] Before trial, negotiations for a settlement were undertaken. As a result, a consent decree against the five major defendants was entered November 20, 1940. The consent decree contained no admission of violation of law and adjudicated no issue of fact or law, except that the complaint stated a cause of action. The decree reserved to the United States the right at the end of a three-year trial period to seek the relief prayed for in the amended complaint. After the end of the three-year period the United States moved for trial against all the defendants.

[4] A master agreement is a licensing agreement or "blanket deal" covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres, usually comprising a circuit.

A franchise is a licensing agreement, or series of licensing agreements, entered into as part of the same transaction, in effect for more than one motion picture season and covering the exhibition of features released by one distributor during the entire period of the agreement.

An independent as used in these cases means a producer, distributor, or exhibitor, as the context requires, which is not a defendant in the action, or a subsidiary or affiliate of a defendant.

[5] See note 12, infra.

Certainly the rights of the copyright owner are no greater than those of the patentee.

Nor can the result be different when we come to the vertical conspiracy between each distributor-defendant and his licensees. The District Court stated in its findings:

> "In agreeing to maintain a stipulated minimum admission price, each exhibitor thereby consents to the minimum price level at which it will compete against other licensees of the same distributor whether they exhibit on the same run or not. The total effect is that through the separate contracts between the distributor and its licensees a price structure is erected which regulates the licensees' ability to compete against one another in admission prices."

That consequence seems to us to be incontestable. We stated in United States v. Gypsum Co., supra, p. —, that "The rewards which flow to the patentee and his licensees from the suppression of competition through the regulation of an industry are not reasonably and normally adapted to secure pecuniary reward for the patentee's monopoly." The same is true of the rewards of the copyright owners and their licensees in the present case. For here too the licenses are but a part of the general plan to suppress competition. The case where a distributor fixes admission prices to be charged by a single independent exhibitor, no other licensees or exhibitors being in contemplation, seems to be wholly academic, as the District Court pointed out. It is, therefore, plain that United States v. General Electric Co., supra, as applied in the patent cases, affords no haven to the defendants in this case. For a copyright may no more be used than a patent to deter competition between rivals in the exploitation of their licenses. See Interstate Circuit v. United States, supra, p. 230.

(2) Clearances and Runs

Clearances are designed to protect a particular run of a film against a subsequent run.[6] The District Court found that all of the distributor-defendants used clearance provisions and that they were stated in several different ways or in combinations: in terms of a given period between designated run; in terms of admission prices charged by competing theatres; in terms of a given period of clearance over specifically named theatres; in terms of so many days' clearance over specified areas or towns; or in terms of clearances as fixed by other distributors.

The Department of Justice maintained below that clearances are unlawful per se under the Sherman Act. But that is a question we need not consider, for the District Court ruled otherwise and that conclusion is not challenged here. In its view their justification was found in the assurance they give the exhibitor that the distributor will not license a competitor to show the film either at the same time or so soon thereafter that the exhibitor's expected income from the run will be greatly diminished. A clearance when used to protect that interest of the exhibitor was reasonable, in the view of the court, when not unduly extended as to area or duration. Thus the court concluded that although clearances might indirectly affect admission prices, they do not fix them and that they may be reasonable restraints of trade under the Sherman Act.

The District Court held that in determining whether a clearance is unreasonable, the following factors are relevant:

> (1) The admission prices of the theatres involved, as set by the exhibitors;
> (2) The character and location of the theatres involved, including size, type of entertainment, appointments, transit facilities, etc.;
> (3) The policy of operation of the theatres involved, such as the showing of double features, gift nights, give-aways, premiums, cut-rate tickets, lotteries, etc.;
> (4) The rental terms and license fees paid by the theatres involved and the revenues derived by the distributor-defendant from such theatres;
> (5) The extent to which the theatres involved compete with each other for patronage;
> (6) The fact that a theatre involved is affiliated with a defendant-distributor or with an independent circuit of theatres should be disregarded; and
> (7) There should be no clearance between theatres not in substantial competition.

[6] A clearance is the period of time, usually stipulated in license contracts, which must elapse between runs of the same feature within a particular area or in specified theatres.

Runs are successive exhibitions of a feature in a given area, first-run being the first exhibition in that area, second-run being the next subsequent, and so on, and include successive exhibitions in different theatres, even though such theatres may be under a common ownership or management.

It reviewed the evidence in light of these standards and concluded that many of the clearances granted by the defendants were unreasonable. We do not stop to retrace those steps. The evidence is ample to show, as the District Court plainly demonstrated, see 66 F. Supp. pp. 343-346, that many clearances had no relation to the competitive factors which alone could justify them.[7] The clearances which were in vogue had, indeed, acquired a fixed and uniform character and were made applicable to situations without regard to the special circumstances which are necessary to sustain them as reasonable restraints of trade. The evidence is ample to support the finding of the District Court that the defendants either participated in evolving this uniform system of clearances or acquiesced in it and so furthered its existence. That evidence, like the evidence on the price-fixing phase of the case, is therefore adequate to support the finding of a conspiracy to restrain trade by imposing unreasonable clearances.

The District Court enjoined defendants and their affiliates from agreeing with each other or with any exhibitors or distributors to maintain a system of clearances, or from granting any clearance between theatres not in substantial competition, or from granting or enforcing any clearance against theatres in substantial competition with the theatre receiving the license for exhibition in excess of what is reasonably necessary to protect the licensee in the run granted. In view of the findings this relief was plainly warranted.

Some of the defendants ask that this provision be construed (or, if necessary, modified) to allow licensors in granting clearances to take into consideration what is reasonably necessary for a fair return to the licensor. We reject that suggestion. If that were allowed, then the exhibitor-defendants would have an easy method of keeping alive at least some of the consequences of the effective conspiracy which they launched. For they could then justify clearances granted by other distributors in favor of their theatres in terms of the competitive requirements of those theatres, and at the same time justify the restrictions they impose upon independents in terms of the necessity of protecting their film rental as licensor. That is too potent a weapon to leave in the hands of those whose proclivity to unlawful conduct has been so marked. It plainly should not be allowed so long as the exhibitor-defendants own theatres. For in its baldest terms it is in the hands of the defendants no less than a power to restrict the competition of others in the way deemed most desirable by them. In the setting of this case the only measure of reasonableness of a clearance by Sherman Act standards is the special needs of the licensee for the competitive advantages it affords.

Whether the same restrictions would be applicable to a producer who had not been a party to such a conspiracy is a question we do not reach.

Objection is made to a further provision of this part of the decree stating that "Whenever any clearance provision is attacked as not legal under the provisions of this decree, the burden shall be upon the distributor to sustain the legality thereof." We think that provision was justified. Clearances have been used along with price fixing to suppress competition with the theatres of the exhibitor-defendants and with other favored exhibitors. The District Court could therefore have eliminated clearances completely for a substantial period of time, even though, as it thought, they were not illegal per se. For equity has the power to uproot all parts of an illegal scheme—the valid as well as the invalid—in order to rid the trade or commerce of all taint of the conspiracy. United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U. S. 707, 724. The court certainly then could take the lesser step of making them prima facie invalid. But we do not rest on that alone. As we have said, the only justification for clearances in the setting of this case is in terms of the special needs of the licensee for the competitive advantages they afford. To place on the distributor the burden of showing their reasonableness is to place it on the one party

[7] Thus the District Court found:

"Some licenses granted clearance to sell to all theatres which the exhibitor party to the contract might thereafter own, lease, control, manage, or operate against all theatres in the immediate vicinity of the exhibitor's theatre thereafter erected or opened. The purpose of this type of clearance agreements was to fix the run and clearance status of any theatre thereafter opened not on the basis of its appointments, size, location, and other competitive features normally entering into such determination, but rather upon the sole basis of whether it were operated by the exhibitor party to the agreement."

in the best position to evaluate their competitive effects. Those who have shown such a marked proclivity for unlawful conduct are in no position to complain that they carry the burden of showing that their future clearances come within the law. Cf. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173, 188.

(3) Pooling Agreements; Joint Ownership

The District Court found the exhibitor-defendants had agreements with each other and their affiliates by which theatres of two or more of them, normally competitive, were operated as a unit, or managed by a joint committee or by one of the exhibitors, the profits being shared according to prearranged percentages. Some of these agreements provided that the parties might not acquire other competitive theatres without first offering them for inclusion in the pool. The court concluded that the result of these agreements was to eliminate competition pro tanto both in exhibition and in distribution of features,[8] since the parties would naturally direct the films to the theatres in whose earnings they were interested.

The District Court also found that the exhibitor-defendants had like agreements with certain independent exhibitors. Those alliances had, in its view, the effect of nullifying competition between the allied theatres and of making more effective the competition of the group against theatres not members of the pool. The court found that in some cases the operating agreements were achieved through leases of theatres, the rentals being measured by a percentage of profits earned by the theatres in the pool. The District Court required the dissolution of existing pooling agreements and enjoined any future arrangement of that character.

These provisions of the decree will stand. The practices were bald efforts to substitute monopoly for competition and to strengthen the hold of the exhibitor-defendants on the industry by alignment of competitors on their side. Clearer restraints of trade are difficult to imagine.

There was another type of business arrangement that the District Court found to have the same effect as the pooling agreements just mentioned. Many theatres are owned jointly by two or more exhibitor-defendants or by an exhibitor-defendant and an independent.[9] The result is, according to the District Court, that the theatres are operated "collectively, rather than competitively." And where the joint owners are an exhibitor-defendant and an independent the effect is, according to the District Court, the elimination by the exhibitor-defendant of "putative competition between itself and the other joint owner, who otherwise would be in a position to operate theatres independently." The District Court found these joint ownerships of theatres to be unreasonable restraints of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Act.

The District Court ordered the exhibitor-defendants to disaffiliate by terminating their joint ownership of theatres; and it enjoined future acquisitions of such interests. One is authorized to buy out the other if it shows to the satisfaction of the District Court and that court first finds that such acquisition "will not unduly restrain competition in the exhibition of feature motion pictures." This dissolution and prohibition of joint ownership as between exhibitor-defendants was plainly warranted. To the extent that they have joint interests in the outlets for their films each in practical effect grants the other a priority for the exhibition of its films. For in this situation, as in the case where theatres are jointly managed, the natural gravitation of films is to the theatres in whose earnings the distributors have an interest. Joint ownership between exhibitor-defendants then becomes a device for strengthening their competitive position as exhibitors by forming an alliance as distributors. An express agreement to grant each other the preference would be a most effective weapon to stifle competition. A working arrangement or business device that has that necessary consequence gathers no immunity because of its subtlety. Each is a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman Act.

[8] A feature is any motion picture, regardless of topic, the length of film of which is in excess of 4,000 feet.

Of the 1287 jointly owned with independents, 209 would not be affected by the decree since one of the ownership interests is less than 5 per cent, an amount which the District Court treated as de minimis.

The District Court also ordered disaffiliation in those instances where theatres were jointly owned by an exhibitor-defendant and an independent, and where the interest of the exhibitor-defendant was "greater than five per cent unless such interest shall be ninety-five per cent or more," an independent being defined for this part of the decree as "any former, present or putative motion picture theatre operator which is not owned or controlled by the defendant holding the interest in question." The exhibitor-defendants are authorized to acquire existing interests of the independents in these theatres if they establish, and if the District Court first finds that the acquisition "will not unduly restrain competition in the exhibition of feature motion pictures." All other acquisitions of such joint interests were enjoined.

This phase of the decree is strenuously attacked. We are asked to eliminate it for lack of findings to support it. The argument is that the findings show no more than the existence of joint ownership of theatres by exhibitor-defendants and independents. The statement by the District Court that the joint ownership eliminates "putative competition" is said to be a mere conclusion without evidentiary support. For it is said that the facts of the record show that many of the instances of joint ownership with an independent interest are cases wholly devoid of any history of or relationship to restraints of trade or monopolistic practices. Some are said to be rather fortuitous results of bankruptcies; others are said to be the results of investments by outside interests who have no desire or capacity to operate theatres, and so on.

It is conceded that the District Court made no inquiry into the circumstances under which a particular interest had been acquired. It treated all relationships alike, insofar as the disaffiliation provision of the decree is concerned. In this we think it erred.

We have gone into the record far enough to be confident that at least some of these acquisitions by the exhibitor-defendants were the products of the unlawful practices which the defendants have inflicted on the industry. To the extent that these acquisitions were the fruits of monopolistic practices or restraints of trade, they should be divested. And no permission to buy out the other owner should be given a defendant. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 189; Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. —. Moreover, even if lawfully acquired, they may have been utilized as part of the conspiracy to eliminate or suppress competition in furtherance of the ends of the conspiracy. In that event divestiture would likewise be justified. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 189-190. In that situation permission to acquire the interest of the independent would have the unlawful effect of permitting the defendants to complete their plan to eliminate him.

Furthermore, if the joint ownership is an alliance with one who is or would be an operator but for the joint ownership, divorce should be decreed even though the affiliation was innocently acquired. For that joint ownership would afford opportunity to perpetuate the effects of the restraints of trade which the exhibitor-defendants have inflicted on the industry.

It seems, however, that some of the cases of joint ownership do not fall into any of the categories we have listed. Some apparently involve no more than innocent investments by those who are not actual or potential operators. If in such cases the acquisition was not improperly used in furtherance of the conspiracy, its retention by defendants would be justified absent a finding that no monopoly resulted. And in those instances permission might be given the defendants to acquire the interests of the independents on a showing by them and a finding by the court that neither monopoly nor unreasonable restraint of trade in the exhibition of films would result. In short, we see no reason to place a ban on this type of ownership, at least so long as theatre ownership by the five majors is not prohibited. The results of inquiry along the lines we have indicated must await further findings of the District Court on remand of the cause.

(4) Formula Deals, Master Agreements, and Franchises

A formula deal is a licensing agreement with a circuit of theatres in which the license fee of a given feature is measured, for the theatres covered by the agreement, by a specified percentage of the feature's national gross. The District Court found that Paramount and RKO had made formula deals with independent and affiliated circuits. The circuit was allowed to allocate playing time and film rentals among the various theatres as it saw fit. The inclusion of theatres of a circuit into a single agreement gives no oportunity for other theatre owners to bid for the feature in their respective areas and, in the view of the District Court, is therefore an unreasonable restraint of trade. The District Court found some master agreements[10] open to the same objection. Those are the master agreements that cover exhibition in two or more theatres in a particular circuit and allow the exhibitor to allocate the film rental paid among the theatres as it sees fit and to exhibit the features upon such playing time as it deems best, and leaves other terms to the discretion of the circuit. The District Court enjoined the making or further performance of any formula deal of the type described above. It also enjoined the making or further performance of any master agreement covering the exhibition of features in a number of theatres.

The findings of the District Court in these respects are supported by facts, its conclusion that the formula deals and master agreements constitute restraint of trade is valid, and the relief is proper. The formula deals and master agreements are unlawful restraints of trade in two respects. In the first place, they eliminate the possibility of bidding for films theatre by theatre. In that way they eliminate the opportunity for the small competitor to obtain the choice first runs, and put a premium on the size of the circuit. They are, therefore, devices for stifling competition and diverting the cream of the business to the large operators. In the second place, the pooling of the purchasing power of an entire circuit in bidding for films is a misuse of monopoly power insofar as it combines the theatres in closed towns with competitive situations. The reasons have been stated in United States v. Griffiths, ante, p. —, and Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. —, and need not be repeated here. It is hardly necessary to add that distributors who join in such arrangements by exhibitors are active participants in effectuating a restraint of trade and a monopolistic practice. See United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 183.

The District Court also enjoined the making or further performance of any franchise. A franchise is a contract with an exhibitor which extends over a period of more than a motion picture season and covers the exhibition of features released by the distributor during the period of the agreement. The District Court held that a franchise constituted a restraint of trade because a period of more than one season was too long and the inclusion of all features was disadvantageous to competitors. At least that is the way we read its findings.

Universal and United Artists object to the outlawry of franchise agreements. Universal points out that the charge of illegality of franchises in these cases was restricted to franchises with theatres owned by the major defendants and to franchises with circuits or theatres in a circuit, a circuit being defined in the complaint as a group of more than five theatres controlled by the same person or a group of more than five theatres which combine through a common agent in licensing films. It seems, therefore, that the legality of franchises to other exhibitors (except as to block-booking, a practice to which we will later advert) was not in issue in the litigation. Moreover, the findings on franchises are clouded by the statement of the District Court in the opinion that franchises "necessarily contravene the plan of licensing each picture, theatre by theatre, to the highest bidder." As will be seen hereafter, we eliminate from the decree the provision for competitive bidding. But for its inclusion of competitive bidding the District Court might well have treated the problem of franchises differently.

We can see how if franchises were allowed to be used between the exhibitor-defendants each might be able to strengthen its strategic position in the exhibition field and continue the ill effects of the conspiracy which the decree is designed to dissipate.

[10] See note 4, supra.

Franchise agreements may have been employed as devices to discriminate against some independents in favor of others. We know from the record that franchise agreements often contained discriminatory clauses operating in favor not only of theatres owned by the defendants but also of the large circuits. But we cannot say on this record that franchises are illegal per se when extended to any theatre or circuit no matter how small. The findings do not deal with the issue doubtlessly due to the fact that any system of franchises would necessarily conflict with the system of competitive bidding adopted by the District Court. Hence we set aside the findings of franchises so that the court may examine the problem in the light of the elimination from the decree of competitive bidding.

We do not take that course in the case of formula deals and master agreements, for the findings in these instances seem to stand on their own bottom and apparently have no necessary dependency on the provision for competitive bidding.

(5) Block-Booking

Block-booking is the practice of licensing, or offering for license, one feature or group of features on condition that the exhibitor will also license another feature or group of features released by the distributors during a given period. The films are licensed in blocks before they are actually produced. All the defendants, except United Artists, have engaged in the practice. Block-booking prevents competitors from bidding for single features on their individual merits. The District Court held it illegal for that reason and for the reason that it "adds to the monopoly of a single copyrighted picture that of another copyrighted picture which must be taken and exhibited in order to secure the first." That enlargement of the monopoly of the copyright was condemned below in reliance on the principle which forbids the owner of a patent to condition its use on the purchase or use of patented or unpatented materials. See Ethyl Gasoline Corporation v. United States, 309 U. S. 436, 459; Morton Salt Co. v. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488, 491; Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U. S. 661, 665. The court enjoined defendants from performing or entering into any license in which the right to exhibit one feature is conditioned upon the licensee's taking one or more other features.[11]

We approve that restriction. The copyright law, like the patent statutes, makes reward to the owner a secondary consideration. In Fox Film Corp. v. Doyal, 286 U. S. 123, 127, Chief Justice Hughes spoke as follows respecting the copyright monopoly granted by Congress, "The sole interest of the United States and the primary object in conferring the monopoly lie in the general benefits derived by the public from the labors of authors." It is said that reward to the author or artist serves to induce release to the public of the products of his creative genius. But the reward does not serve its public purpose if it is not related to the quality of the copyright. Where a high quality film greatly desired is licensed only if an inferior one is taken, the latter borrows quality from the former and strengthens its monopoly by drawing on the other. The practice tends to equalize rather than differentiate the reward for the individual copyrights. Even where all the films included in the package are of equal quality, the requirement that all be taken if one is desired increases the market for some. Each stands

[11] Blind-selling is a practice whereby a distributor licenses a feature before the exhibitor is afforded an opportunity to view it. To remedy the problems created by that practice the District Court included the following provision in its decree:

"To the extent that any of the features have not been trade shown prior to the granting of the license for more than a single feature, the licensee shall be given by the licensor the right to reject twenty per cent of such features not trade shown prior to the granting of the license, such right of rejection to be exercised in the order of release within ten days after there has been an opportunity afforded to the licensee to inspect the feature."

The court advanced the following as its reason for inclusion of this provision:

"Blind-selling does not appear to be as inherently restrictive of competition as block-booking, although it is capable of some abuse. By this practice a distributor could promise a picture of good quality or of a certain type which when produced might prove to be of poor quality or of another type—a competing distributor meanwhile being unable to market its product and in the end losing its outlets for future pictures. The evidence indicates that trade-shows, which are designated to prevent such blind-selling, are poorly attended by exhibitors. Accordingly, exhibitors who choose to obtain their films for exhibition in quantities, need to be protected against burdensome agreements by being given an option to reject a certain percentage of their blind-licensed pictures within a reasonable time after they shall have become available for inspection."

We approve this provision of the decree.

not on its own footing but in whole or in part on the appeal which another film may have. As the District Court said, the result is to add to the monopoly of the copyright in violation of the principle of the patent cases involving tying clauses.[12]

It is argued that Transparent-Wrap Machine Corp. v. Stokes & Smith Co., 329 U. S. 637, points to a contrary result. That case held that the inclusion in a patent license of a condition requiring the licensee to assign improvement patents was not per se illegal. But that decision, confined to improvement patents, was greatly influenced by the federal statute governing assignments of patents. It therefore has no controlling significance here.

Columbia Pictures makes an earnest argument that enforcement of the restriction as to block-booking will be very disadvantageous to it and will greatly impair its ability to operate profitably. But the policy of the anti-trust laws is not qualified or conditioned by the convenience of those whose conduct is regulated. Nor can a vested interest in a practice which contravenes the policy of the anti-trust laws receive judicial sanction.

We do not suggest that films may not be sold in blocks or groups, when there is no requirement, express or implied, for the purchase of more than one film. All we hold to be illegal is a refusal to license one or more copyrights unless another copyright is accepted.

(6) Discrimination

The District Court found that defendants had discriminated against small independent exhibitors and in favor of large affiliated and unaffiliated circuits through various kinds of contract provisions. These included suspension of the terms of a contract if a circuit theatre remained closed for more than eight weeks with reinstatement without liability on reopening; allowing large privileges in the selection and elimination of films; allowing deductions in film rentals if double bills are played; granting moveovers[13] and extended runs; granting road show privileges;[14] allowing overage and underage;[15] granting unlimited playing time; excluding foreign pictures and those of independent producers; and granting rights to question the classification of features for rental purposes. The District Court found that the competitive advantages of these provisions were so great that their inclusion in contracts with the larger circuits and their exclusion from contracts with the small independents constituted an unreasonable discrimination against the latter. Each discriminatory contract constituted a conspiracy between licensor and licensee. Hence the District Court deemed it unnecessary to decide whether the defendants had conspired among themselves to make these discriminations. No provision of the decree specifically enjoins these discriminatory practices because they were thought to be impossible under the system of competitive bidding adopted by the District Court.

These findings are amply supported by the evidence. We concur in the conclusion that these discriminatory practices are included among the restraints of trade which the Sherman Act condemns. See Interstate Circuit v. United States, supra, p. 231; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 182-183. It will be for the District Court on remand of these cases to provide effective relief against their continuance, as our elimination of the provision for competitive bidding leaves this phase of the cases unguarded.

There is some suggestion on this as well as on other phases of the cases that large exhibitors with whom defendants dealt fathered the illegal practices and forced them

[12] The exclusive right granted by the Copyright Act, 35 Stat. 1075, 17 U. S. C. § 1 includes no such privilege. It provides, so far as material here, as follows:

"That any person entitled thereto, upon complying with the provisions of this Act, shall have the exclusive right:

"(d) To perform or represent the copyrighted work publicly if it be a drama or, if it be a dramatic work and not reproduced in copies for sale, to vend any manuscript or any record whatsoever thereof; to make or to procure the making of any transcription or record thereof by or from which, in whole or in part, it may in any manner or by any method be exhibited, performed, represented, produced, or reproduced; and to exhibit, perform, represent, produce, or reproduce it in any manner or by any method whatsoever;"

[13] A moveover is the privilege given a licensee to move a picture from one theatre to another as a continuation of the run at the licensee's first theatre.

[14] A road show is a public exhibition of a feature in a limited number of theatres, in advance of its general release, at admission prices higher than those customarily charged in first-run theatres in those areas.

[15] Underage and overage refer to the practice of using excess film rental earned in one circuit theatre to fulfill a rental commitment defaulted by another.

onto the defendants. But as the District Court observed, that circumstance if true does not help the defendants. For acquiescence in an illegal scheme is as much a violation of the Sherman Act as the creation and promotion of one.

Second. Competitive Bidding

The District Court concluded that the only way competition could be introduced into the existing system of fixed prices, clearances and runs was to require that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis. Films are to be offered to all exhibitors in each competitive area.[16] The license for the desired run is to be granted to the highest responsible bidder, unless the distributor rejects all offers. The licenses are to be offered and taken theatre by theatre and picture by picture. Licenses to show films in theatres, in which the licensor owns directly or indirectly an interest of ninety-five per cent or more, are excluded from the requirement for competitive bidding.

Paramount is the only one of the five majors who opposes the competitive bidding system. Columbia Pictures, Universal, and United Artists oppose it. The intervenors representing certain independents oppose it. And the Department of Justice, which apparently proposed the system originally, speaks strongly against it here.

At first blush there is much to commend the system of competitive bidding. The trade victims of this conspiracy have in large measure been the small independent operators. They are the ones that have felt most keenly the discriminatory practices and predatory activities in which defendants have freely indulged. They have been the victims of the massed purchasing power of the larger units in the industry. It is largly out of the ruins of the small operators that the large empires of exhibitors have been built. Thus it would appear to be a great boon to them to substitute open bidding for the private deals and favors on which the large operators have thrived. But after reflection we have concluded that competitive bidding involves the judiciary so deeply in the daily operation of this nation-wide business and promises such dubious benefits that it should not be undertaken.

Each film is to be licensed on a particular run to "the highest responsible bidder, having a theatre of a size, location and equip ment adequate to yield a reasonable return to the licensor." The bid "shall state what run such exhibitor desires and what he is willing to pay for such feature, which statement may specify a flat rental, or a percentage of gross receipts, or both, or any other form of rental, and shall also specify what clearance such exhibitor is willing to accept, the time and days when such exhibitor desires to exhibit it, and any other offers which such exhibitor may care to make." We do not doubt that if a competitive bidding system is adopted all these provisions are necessary. For the licensing of films at auction is quite obviously a more complicated matter than the like sales for cash of tobacco, wheat, or other produce. Columbia puts these pertinent queries: "No two exhibitors are likely to make the same bid as to dates, clearance, method of fixing rental, etc. May bids containing such diverse factors be readily compared? May a flat rental bid be compared with a percentage bid? May the value of any percentage bid be determined unless the admission price is fixed by the license?"

The question as to who is the highest bidder involves the use of standards incapable of precise definition because the bids being compared contain different ingredients. Determining who is the most responsible bidder likewise cannot be reduced to a formula. The distributor's judgment of the character and integrity of a particular exhibitor might result in acceptance of a lower bid than others offered. Yet to prove that favoritism was shown would be well nigh impossible, unless perhaps all the exhibitors in the country were given classifications of responsibility. If, indeed, the choice between bidders is not to be entrusted to the uncontrolled discretion of the distributors, some effort to standardize the factors involved in determining "a reasonable return to the licensor" would seem necessary.

We mention these matters merely to indicate the character of the job of supervising such a competitive bidding system. It would involve the judiciary in the administration of intricate and detailed rules governing priority, period of clearance, length of run, competitive areas, reasonable return, and the like. The system would be apt to require as close a supervision as a continuous receivership, unless the defendants were to be entrusted with vast discretion. The judiciary is unsuited to affairs of business management; and control through the power of contempt is crude and clumsy and lacking in the flexibility necessary to make continuous and detailed supervision effective. Yet delegation of the management of the system to the discretion of those who had the genius to conceive the present conspiracy and to execute it with the subtlety which this record reveals, could be done only with the greatest reluctance. At least such choices should not be faced unless the need for the system is great and its benefits plain.

[16] Competitive bidding is required only in a "competitive area" where it is "desired by the exhibitors." As the District Court said, "the decree provides an opportunity to bid for any exhibitor in a competitive area who may desire to do so."

The details of the competitive bidding system will be found in 70 F. Supp. pp. 73-74.

The system uproots business arrangements and established relationships with no apparent overall benefit to the small independent exhibitor. If each feature must go to the highest responsible bidder, those with the greatest purchasing power would seem to be in a favored position. Those with the longest purse—the exhibitor-defendants and the large circuits—would seem to stand in a preferred position. If in fact they were enabled through the competitive bidding system to take the cream of the business, eliminate the smaller independents, and thus increase their own strategic hold on the industry, they would have the cloak of the court's decree around them for protection. Hence the natural advantage which the larger and financially stronger exhibitors would seem to have in the bidding gives us pause. If a premium is placed on purchasing power, the court-created system may be a powerful factor towards increasing the concentration of economic power in the industry rather than cleansing the competitive system of unwholesome practices. For where the system in operation promises the advantage to the exhibitor who is in the strongest financial position, the injunction against discrimination [17] is apt to hold an empty promise. In this connection it should be noted that even though the independents in a given competitive area do not want competitive bidding, the exhibitor-defendants can invoke the system.

Our doubts concerning the competitive bidding system are increased by the fact that defendants who own theatres are allowed to pre-empt their own features. They thus start with an inventory which all other exhibitors lack. The latter have no prospect of assured runs except what they get by competitive bidding. The proposed system does not offset in any way the advantages which the exhibitor-defendants have by way of theatre ownership. It would seem in fact to increase them. For the independents are deprived of the stability which flows from established business relationships. Under the proposed system they can get features only if they are the highest responsible bidders. They can no longer depend on their private sources of supply which their ingenuity has created. Those sources, built perhaps on private relationships and representing important items of good will, are banned, even though they are free of any taint of illegality.

The system was designed, as some of the defendants put it, to remedy the difficulty of any theatre to break into or change the existing system of runs and clearances. But we do not see how, in practical operation, the proposed system of competitive bidding is likely to open up to competition the markets which defendants' unlawful restraints have dominated. Rather real danger seems to us to lie in the opportunities the system affords the exhibitor-defendants and the other large operators to strengthen their hold in the industry. We are reluctant to alter decrees in these cases where there is agreement with the District Court on the nature of the violations. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 185; International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 400. But the provisions for competitive bidding in these cases promise little in the way of relief against the real evils of the conspiracy. They implicate the judiciary heavily in the details of business management if supervision is to be effective. They vest powerful control in the exhibitor-defendants over their competitors if close supervision by the court is not undertaken. In light of these considerations we conclude that the competitive bidding provisions of the decree should be eliminated so that a more effective decree may be fashioned.

We have already indicated in preceding parts of this opinion that this alteration in the decree leaves a hiatus or two which will have to be filled on remand of the cases.

[17] The competitive bidding part of the decree provides: "Each license shall be granted solely upon the merits and without discrimination in favor of affiliates, old customers or others."

We will indicate hereafter another phase of the problem which the District Court should also reconsider in view of this alteration in the decree. But out of an abundance of caution we add this additional word. The competitive bidding system was perhaps the central arch of the decree designed by the District Court. Its elimination may affect the cases in ways other than those which we expressly mention. Hence on remand of the cases the freedom of the District Court to reconsider the adequacy of decree is not limited to those parts we have specifically indicated.

Third. Monopoly, Expansion of Theatre Holdings, Divestiture

There is a suggestion that the hold the defendants have on the industry is so great that a problem under the First Amendment is raised. Cf. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1. We have no doubt that moving pictures, like newspapers and radio, are included in the press whose freedom is guaranteed by the First Amendment. That issue would be focused here if we had any question concerning monopoly in the production of moving pictures. But monopoly in production was eliminated as an issue in these cases, as we have noted. The chief argument at the bar is phrased in terms of monopoly of exhibition, restraints on exhibition, and the like. Actually, the issue is even narrower than that. The main contest is over the cream of the exhibition business—that of the first-run theatres. By defining the issue so narrowly we do not intend to belittle its importance. It shows, however, that the question here is not what the public will see or if the public will be permitted to see certain features. It is clear that under the existing system the public will be denied access to none. If the public cannot see the features on the first-run, it may do so on the second, third, fourth, or later run. The central problem presented by these cases is which exhibitors get the highly profitable first-run business. That problem has important aspects under the Sherman Act. But it bears only remotely, if at all, on any question of freedom of the press, save only as timeliness of release may be a factor of importance in specific situations.

The controversy over monopoly relates to monopoly in exhibition and more particularly monopoly in the first-run phase of the exhibition business.

The five majors in 1945 had interests in somewhat over 17 per cent of the theatres in the United States—3,137 out of 18,076.[18] Those theatres paid 45 per cent of the total domestic film rental received by all eight defendants.

In the 92 cities of the country with populations over 100,000 at least 70 per cent of all the first-run theatres are affiliated with one or more of the five majors. In four of those cities the five majors have no theatres. In 38 of those cities there are no independent first-run theatres. In none of the remaining 50 cities did less than three of the distributor-defendants license their product on first run to theatres of the five majors. In 19 of the 50 cities less than three of the distributor-defendants licensed their product on first run to independent theatres. In a majority of the 50 cities the greater share of all of the features of defendants were licensed for first-run exhibition in the theatres of the five majors.

In about 60 per cent of the 92 cities having populations of over 100,000, independent theatres compete with those of the five majors in first-run exhibition. In about 91 per cent of the 92 cities there is competition between independent theatres and the theatres of the five majors or between theatres of the five majors themselves for first-run exhibition. In all of the 92 cities there is always competition in some run even where there is no competition in first runs.

In cities between 25,000 and 100,000 populations the five majors have interests in 577 of a total of 978 first-run theatres or about 60 per cent. In about 300 additional towns, mostly under 25,000, an operator affiliated with one of the five majors has all of the theatres in the town.

[18] The theatres which each of the five majors owned independently of the others were: Paramount 1,395 or 7.72 per cent; Warner 501 or 2.77 per cent; Loew's 135 or .74 per cent; Fox 636 or 3.52 per cent; RKO 109 or .60 per cent. There were in addition 361 theatres or about 2 per cent in which two or more of the five majors had joint interests. These figures exclude connections through film-buying or management contracts or through corporations in which a defendant owns an indirect minority stock interest.

These theatres are located in 922 towns in 48 States and the District of Columbia. For further description of the distribution of theatres see Bertrand, Evans, and Blanchard, The Motion Picture Industry—A Pattern of Control 15-16 (TNEC Monograph 43, 1941).

The District Court held that the five majors could not be treated collectively so as to establish claims of general monopolization in exhibition. It found that none of them was organized or had been maintained "for the purpose of achieving a national monopoly" in exhibition. It found that the five majors by their present theatre holdings "alone" (which aggregate a little more than one-sixth of all the theatres in the United States), "do not and cannot collectively or individually, have a monopoly of exhibition." The District Court also found that where a single defendant owns all of the first-run theatres in a town, there is no sufficient proof that the acquisition was for the purpose of creating a monopoly. It found rather that such consequence resulted from the inertness of competitors, their lack of financial ability to build theatres comparable to those of the five majors, or the preference of the public for the best equipped theatres. And the percentage of features on the market which any of the five majors could play in its own theatres was found to be relatively small and in nowise to approximate a monopoly of film exhibition.[19]

Even in respect of the theatres jointly owned or jointly operated by the defendants with each other or with independents the District Court found no monopoly or attempt to monopolize. Those joint agreements or ownership were found only to be unreasonable restraints of trade. The District Court, indeed, found no monopoly on any phase of the cases, although it did find an attempt to monopolize in the fixing of prices, the granting of unreasonable clearances, block-booking and the other unlawful restraints of trade we have already discussed. The "root of the difficulties," according to the District Court, lay not in theatre ownership but in those unlawful practices.

The District Court did, however, enjoin the five majors from expanding their present theatre holdings in any manner.[20] It refused to grant the request of the Department of Justice for total divestiture by the five majors of their theatre holdings. It found that total divestiture would be injurious to the five majors and damaging to the public. Its thought on the latter score was that the new set of theatre owners who would take the place of the five majors would be unlikely for some years to give the public as good service as those they supplanted "in view of the latter's demonstrated experience and skill in operating what must be regarded as in general the largest and best equipped theatres." Divestiture was, it thought, too harsh a remedy where there was available the alternative of competitive bidding. It accordingly concluded that divestiture was unnecessary "at least until the efficiency of that system has been tried and found wanting."

It is clear, so far as the five majors are concerned, that the aim of the conspiracy was exclusionary, i. e. it was designed to strengthen their hold on the exhibition field. In other words, the conspiracy had monopoly in exhibition for one of its goals, as the District Court held. Price, clearance, and run are interdependent. The clearance and run provisions of the licenses fixed the relative playing positions of all theatres in a certain area; the minimum price provisions were based on playing position—the first-run theatres being required to charge the highest prices, the second-run theatres the next highest, and so on. As the District Court found, "In effect, the distributor, by the fixing of minimum admission prices, attempts to give the prior-run exhibitors as near a monopoly of the patronage as possible."

It is, therefore, not enough in determining the need for divestiture to conclude with the District Court that none of the defendants was organized or has been maintained for the purpose of achieving a "national monopoly," nor that the five majors through their present theatre holdings "alone" do not and cannot collectively or individually have a monopoly of exhibition. For when the starting point is a conspiracy to effect a monopoly through restraints of trade, it is relevant to determine what the results of the conspiracy were even if they fell short of monopoly.

An example will illustrate the problem. In the popular sense there is a monopoly if one person owns the only theatre in town. That usually does not, however, constitute a violation of the Sherman Act. But as we noted in United States v. Griffith, ante, p .—, and see Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. —, even such an ownership is vulnerable in a suit by the United States under the Sherman Act if the property was acquired, or its strategic position maintained, as a result of practices which constitute unreasonable restraints of trade. Otherwise, there would be reward from the conspiracy through retention of its fruits. Hence the problem of the District Court does not end with enjoining continuance of the unlawful restraints nor with dissolving the combination which launched the conspiracy. Its function includes undoing what the conspiracy achieved. As we have discussed in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. —, the requirement that the defendants restore what they unlawfully obtained is no more punishment than the familiar remedy of restitution. What findings would be warranted after such an inquiry in the present cases, we do not know. For the findings of the District Court do not cover this point beyond stating that monopoly was an objective of the several restraints of trade that stand condemned.

Moreover, the problem under the Sherman Act is not solved merely by measuring monopoly in terms of size or extent of holdings or by concluding that single ownerships were not obtained "for the purpose of achieving a national monopoly." It is the relationship of the unreasonable restraints of trade to the position of the defendants in the exhibition field (and more particularly in the first-run phase of that business) that is of first importance on the divestiture phase of these cases. That is the position we have taken in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, ante, p. —, in dealing with a projection of the same conspiracy through certain large circuits. Parity of treatment of the unaffiliated and the affiliated circuits requires the same approach here. For the fruits of the conspiracy which are denied the independents must also be denied the five majors. In this connection there is a suggestion that one result of the conspiracy was a geographical division of territory among the five majors. We mention it not to intimate that it is true but only to indicate the appropriate extent of the inquiry concerning the effect of the conspiracy in theatre ownership by the five majors.

The findings of the District Court are deficient on that score and obscure on another. The District Court in its findings speaks of the absence of a "purpose" on the part of any of the five majors to achieve a "national monopoly" in the exhibition of motion pictures. First, there is no finding as to the presence or absence of monopoly on the part of the five majors in the first-run field for the entire country, in the first-run field in the 92 largest cities of the country, or in the first-run field in separate localities. Yet the first-run field, which constitutes the cream of the exhibition business, is the core of the present cases. Section 1 of the Sherman Act outlaws unreasonable restraints irrespective of the amount of trade or commerce involved (United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 224, 225, n. 59), and § 2 condemns monopoly of "any part" of trade or commerce. "Any part" is construed to mean an appreciable part of interstate or foreign trade or commerce. United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 225. Second, we pointed out in United States v. Griffith, ante p. —, that "specific intent" is not necessary to establish a "purpose or intent" to create a monopoly but that the requisite "purpose or intent" is present if monopoly results as a necessary consequence of what was done. The findings of the District Court on this phase of the cases are not clear, though we take them to mean by the absence of "purpose" the absence of a specific intent. So construed they are inconclusive. In any event they are ambiguous and must be recast on remand of the cases. Third, monopoly power, whether lawfully or unlawfully acquired, may violate § 2 of the Sherman Act though it remains unexercised (United States v. Griffith, ante p. —), for as we stated in American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 809, 811, the existence of power "to exclude competition when it is desired to do so" is itself a violation of § 2, provided it is coupled with the purpose or intent to exercise that power. The District Court, being primarily concerned with the number and extent of the theatre holdings of defendants, did not address itself to this phase of the monopoly problem. Here also, parity of treatment as between independents and the five majors as theatre owners, who were tied into the same general conspiracy, necessitates consideration of this question.

Exploration of these phases of the cases would not be necessary if, as the Department of Justice argues, vertical integration of producing, distributing and exhibiting motion pictures is illegal per se. But the majority of the Court does not take that view. In the opinion of the majority the legality of vertical integration under the Sherman Act turns on (1) the purpose or intent with which it was conceived, or (2) the power it creates and the attendant purpose or intent. First, it runs afoul of the Sherman Act if it was a calculated scheme to gain control over an appreciable segment of the market and to restrain or suppress competition, rather than an expansion to meet legitimate business needs. United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 57; United States v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 254 U. S. 255, 269-270. Second, a vertically integrated enterprise, like other aggregations of business units (United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416), will constitute monopoly which, though unexercised, violates the Sherman Act provided a power to exclude competition is coupled with a purpose or intent to do so. As we pointed out in United States v. Griffith, ante, p. —, n. 10, size is itself an earmark of monopoly power. For size carries with it an opportunity for abuse. And the fact that the power created by size was utilized in the past to crush or prevent competition is potent evidence that the requisite purpose or intent attends the presence of monopoly power. See United States v. Swift & Co., 286 U. S. 106, 116; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, p. 430. Likewise bearing on the question whether monopoly power is created by the vertical integration, is the nature of the market to be served (United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, p. 430), and the leverage on the market which the particular vertical integration creates or makes possible.

These matters were not considered by the District Court. For that reason, as well as the others we have mentioned, the findings on monopoly and divestiture which we have discussed in this part of the opinion will be set aside. There is an independent reason for doing that. As we have seen, the District Court considered competitive bidding as an alternative to divestiture in the sense that it concluded that further consideration of divestiture should not be had until competitive bidding had been tried and found wanting. Since we eliminate from the decree the provisions for competitive bidding, it is necessary to set aside the findings on divestiture so that a new start on this phase of the cases may be made on their remand.

It follows that the provision of the decree barring the five majors from further theatre expansion should likewise be eliminated. For it too is related to the monopoly question; and the District Court should be allowed to make an entirely fresh start on the whole of the problem. We in no way intimate, however, that the District Court erred in prohibiting further theatre expansion by the five majors.

The Department of Justice maintains that if total divestiture is denied, licensing of films among the five majors should be barred. As a permanent requirement it would seem to be only an indirect way of forcing divestiture. For the findings reveal that the theatres of the five majors could not operate their theatres full time on their own films.[21] Whether that step would, in absence of competitive bidding, serve as a short range remedy in certain situations to dissipate the effects of the conspiracy (United States v. Univis Lens Co., 316 U. S. 241, 254; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., supra, p. 724; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 188) is a question for the District Court.

[21] The District Court found, "Except for a very limited number of theatres in the very largest cities, the 18,000 and more theatres in the United States exhibit the product of more than one distributor. Such theatres could not be operated on the product of only one distributor."

Fourth. [Arbitration System]

The consent decree created an arbitration system which had, in the view of the District Court, proved useful in its operation. The court indeed thought that the arbitration system had dealt with the problems of clearances and runs "with rare efficiency." But it did not think it had the power to continue an arbitration system which would be binding on the parties, since the consent decree did not bind the defendants who had not consented to it and since the government, acting pursuant to the powers reserved under the consent decree, moved for trial of the issues charged in the complaint. The District Court recommended, however, that some such system be continued. But it included no such provision in its decree.

We agree that the government did not consent to a permanent system of arbitration under the consent decree and that the District Court has no power to force or require parties to submit to arbitration in lieu of the remedies afforded by Congress for enforcing the anti-trust laws. But the District Court has the power to authorize the maintenance of such a sysem by those parties who consent and to provide the rules and procedure under which it is to operate. The use of the system would not, of course, be mandatory. It would be merely an auxiliary enforcement procedure, barring no one from the use of other remedies the law affords for violations either of the Sherman Act or of the decree of the court. Whether such a system of arbitration should be inaugurated is for the discretion of the District Court.

Fifth. Intervention

Certain associations of exhibitors and a number of independent exhibitors, appellant-intervenors in Nos. 85 and 86, were denied leave to intervene in the District Court. They appeal from those orders. They also filed original motions for leave to intervene in this Court. We postponed consideration of the original motions and of our jurisdiction to hear the appeals until a hearing on the merits of the cases.

Rule 24 (a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides for intervention as of right, reads in part as follows: "Upon timely application anyone shall be permitted to intervene in an action: . . . (2) when the representation of the applicant's interest by existing parties is or may be inadequate and the applicant is or may be bound by a judgment in the action."

The complaint of the intervenors was directed towards the system of competitive bidding. The Department of Justice is the representative of the public in these anti-trust suits. So far as the protection of the public interest in free competition is concerned, the interests of those intervenors was adequately represented. The intervenors, however, claim that the system of competitive bidding would have operated prejudicially to their rights. Cf. United States v. St. Louis Terminal, 236 U. S. 194, 199. Their argument is that the plan of competitive bidding under the control of the defendants would be a concert of action that would be illegal but for the decree. If pursuant to the decree defendants acted under that plan, they would gain immunity from any liability under the anti-trust laws which otherwise they might have to the intervenors. Thus, it is argued, the decree would affect their legal rights and be binding on them. The representation of their interests by the Department of Justice on that score was said to be inadequate since that agency proposed the idea of competitive bidding in the District Court.

We need not consider the merits of that argument. Even if we assume that the intervenors are correct in their position, intervention should be denied here and the orders of the District Court denying leave to intervene must be affirmed. Now that the provisions for competitive bidding have been eliminated from the decree there is no basis for saying that the decree affects their legal rights. Whatever may have been the situation below, no other reason appears why at this stage their intervention is warranted. Any justification for making them parties has disappeared.

The judgment in these cases is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the cases are remanded to the District Court for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

So ordered.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, dissenting in part.

"The framing of decrees should take place in the District rather than in Appellate Courts. They are invested with large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." On this guiding consideration, the Court earlier this Term sustained a Sherman Law decree, which was not the outcome of a long trial involving complicated and contested facts and their significance, but the formulation of a summary judgment on the bare bones of pleadings. International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 400-401. The record in this case bespeaks more compelling respect for the decree fashioned by the District Court of three judges to put an end to violations of the Sherman Law and to prevent the recurrence, than that which led this Court not to find abuse of discretion in the decree by a single district judge in the International Salt case.

This Court has both the authority and duty to consider whether a decree is well calculated to undo, as far as is possible, the result of transactions forbidden by the Sherman Law and to guard against their repetition. But it is not the function of this Court, and it would ill discharge it, to displace the district courts and write decrees de novo. We are, after all, an appellate tribunal even in Sherman Law cases. It could not be fairly claimed that this Court possesses greater experience, understanding and prophetic insight in relation to the movie industry, and is therefore better equipped to formulate a decree for the movie industry than was the District Court in this case, presided over as it was by one of the wisest of judges.

The terms of the decree in this litigation amount, in effect, to the formulation of a regime for the future conduct of the movie industry. The terms of such a regime, within the scope of judicial oversight, are not to be derived from precedents in the law reports, nor, for that matter, from any other available repository of knowledge. Inescapably the terms must be derived from an assessment of conflicting interests, not quantitatively measureable, and a prophecy regarding the workings of untried remedies for dealing with disclosed evils so as to advance most the comprehensive public interest.

The crucial legal question before us is not whether we would have drawn the decree as the District Court drew it, but whether, on the basis of what came before the District Court, we can say that in fashioning remedies it did not fairly respond to disclosed violations and therefore abused a discretion, the fair exercise of which we should respect and not treat as an abuse. Discretion means a choice of available remedies. As bearing upon this question, it is most relevant to consider whether the District Court showed a sympathetic or mere niggling awareness of the proper scope of the Sherman Law and the range of its condemnation. Adequate remedies are not likely to be fashioned by those who are not hostile to evils to be remedied. The District Court's opinion manifests a stout purpose on the part of that court to enforce its thoroughgoing understanding of the requirements of the Sherman Law as elucidated by this Court. And so we have before us the decree of a district court thoroughly aware of the demands of the Sherman Law and manifestly determined to enforce it in all its rigors.

How did the District Court go about working out the terms of the decree some of which this Court now displaces? The case was before that court from October 8, 1945, to January 22, 1947. A vast body of the evidence which had to be considered below, and must be considered here in overturning the lower court's decree, consisted of documents. A mere enumeration of these documents, not printed in the record before us, required a pamphlet of 42 pages. It took 460 pages for a selection of exhibits deemed appropriate for printing by the Government. The printed record in this Court consists of 3,841 pages. It is on the basis of this vast mass of evidence that the District Court, on June 11, 1946, filed its careful opinion, approved here, as to the substantive issues. Thereafter, it heard argument for three days as to the terms of the judgment. The parties then submitted their proposals for findings of fact and conclusions of law by the District Court. After a long trial, an elaborate opinion on the merits, full discussion as to the terms of the decree, more than two months for the gestation of the decree, the terms were finally promulgated.

I cannot bring myself to conclude that the product of such a painstaking process of adjudication as to a decree appropriate for such a complicated situation as this record discloses was an abuse of discretion, arrived at as it was after due absorption of all the light that could be shed upon remedies appropriate for the future. After all, as to such remedies there is no test, ultimately, except the wisdom of men judged by events.

Accordingly, I would affirm the decree except as to one particular, that regarding an arbitration system for controversies that may arise under the decree. This raises a pure question of law and not a judgment based upon facts and their significance, as are those features of the decree which the Court sets aside. The District Court indicated that "in view of its demonstrated usefulness" such an arbitration system was desirable to aid in the enforcement of the decree. The District Court, however, deemed itself powerless to continue an arbitration system without the consent of the parties. I do not find such want of power in the District Court to select this means of enforcing the decree most effectively, with the least friction and by the most fruitful methods. A decree as detailed and as complicated as is necessary to fit a situation like the one before us is bound, even under the best of circumstances, to raise controversies involving conflicting claims as to facts and their meaning. A court could certainly appoint a master to deal with questions arising under the decree. I do not appreciate why a proved system of arbitration, appropriate as experience has found it to be appropriate for adjudicating numberless questions that arise under such a decree, is not to be treated in effect as a standing master for purposes of this decree. See Ex parte Peterson, 253 U. S. 300. I would therefore leave it to the discretion of the District Court to determine whether such a system is not available as an instrument of auxiliary enforcement. With this exception I would affirm the decree of the District Court.

[¶ 62,245] Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. et al. v. United States.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 10. October Term, 1947. May 3, 1948.

On Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of New York.

Monopoly—Restraint of Trade—Combining of Open and Closed Towns.—The combining of open and closed towns to increase buying power for the negotiation of films for the defendant theatre circuit was a restraint of trade and the use of monopoly power in violation of the Sherman Act. The concerted action of the parent company, its subsidiaries, and its officers and directors in that endeavor was a conspiracy which was not immunized by reason of the fact that the members were closely affiliated rather than independent. The execution of master agreements between distributors and exhibitors brought the distributors into unlawful combination with the defendant theatre circuit.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Conspiracy—Admissibility of Evidence.—Since a conspiracy between defendant theatre circuit and each of the distributors was established by independent evidence, interoffice communications between officials of the distributors with whom the defendant theatre circuit dealt were admissible against all conspirators as declarations of some of the associates so far as they were in furtherance of the unlawful project.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.301.

Findings of Fact—Evidence to Support.—The findings of fact that the defendant arbitrarily deprived independents of first- and second-run pictures, through the use of combined buying power, is supported by substantial evidence. The finding that the use of long-term film-rental agreements, or franchises, is an unreasonable restraint of trade is affirmed. The findings that defendant threatened to build theatres or to open closed ones to force sales of theatres or to prevent entry by an independent operator, and that defendant exacted agreements not to compete from competitors whom it bought out, are supported by the evidence. A finding that the defendant obtained film-rental concessions not made available to independent operators is set aside to be clarified on remand of the cause. The bare finding that the defendant cut admission prices is held not adequate to support an injunction against price cutting. Price cutting without more is not a violation of Sherman Act. The findings as to clearances are set aside for insufficiency on the issue of reasonableness.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.601.

Provisions of Decree—Terms Not Specific.—The injunction against monopolizing first- and second-run films is held to be too general. The public interest requires that a more specific decree be entered on this phase of the case. The precise practices found to have violated the Act should be specifically enjoined.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.411.

Divestiture—Dissolution of Pooling Agreements.—The case is remanded so that the District Court may make appropriate findings as to the rewards of the conspiracy, so that the Court may consider the preferable method of causing defendants to surrender them. Divestiture or dissolution must take account of the present and future conditions in the industry as well as past violations. The divestiture provisions are set aside so that the District Court can make the findings necessary for an appropriate decree. The dissolution of the pooling agreements, the prohibition against buying or booking films for theatres in which the defendant has no financial interest, and the restriction on future acquisitions of theatres, are affirmed.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.450.

Affirming in part and reversing in part, and remanding the decision of the District Court.

For appellants: Willard S. McKay, Attorney for appellants; Bruce Bromley; Alfred McCormack; Richard T. Davis, of counsel.

For respondents: Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General; John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; Robert L. Wright, Stanley M. Silverberg, Philip Marcus, Special Assistants to Attorney General.

Mr. Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a companion case to No. 64, United States v. Griffith, ante, p. —, and is here by way of appeal from the District Court. The appellants, who were defendants below, are a parent company, three of its officers and directors, and five of its wholly owned subsidiaries—to whom we refer collectively as Schine. As of May 19, 1942, Schine owned or had a financial interest in a chain of approximately 148 motion picture theatres[1] located in 76 towns in 6 states,[2] the greater portion being 78 theatres in 41 towns in New York and 36 theatres in 17 towns in Ohio. Of the 76 towns, 60 were closed towns, i. e., places where Schine had the only theatre or all the theatres in town.[3] This chain was acquired beginning in 1920 and is the largest independent theatre circuit in the country. Since 1931 Schine acquired 118 theatres. Since 1928 the closed towns increased by 56. In 1941 there were only three towns in which Schine's competitors were playing major film products.

The United States sued to prevent and restrain appellants from violating §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2. The complaint charged that the Schine interests by pooling their entire circuit buying power in the negotiation of films from the distributors so as to combine its closed and open towns got advantages for itself and imposed restrictions on its competitors which otherwise would not have been possible. It charged that the distributors granted certain favors to Schine which were withheld from Schine's competitors, e. g., giving Schine the first run, refusing at times second runs to Schine's competitors, charging Schine with lower

[1] These figures do not include 18 which were closed and had been or were being converted to other uses.

[2] New York (78), Ohio (36), Kentucky (18), Maryland (12), Delaware (2), Virginia (2).

[3] Schine had the only theatre in each of 21 towns, both theatres in 21 towns that had two each, all theatres in 16 towns that had three each, and all theatres in one town that had six theatres and in another that had four theatres.

Of these theatres approximately 87 per cent are located in cities or villages with populations under 25,000 and 60 per cent in cities or villages with populations under 10,000.

rentals than it charged others, licensing to Schine films in excess of Schine's reasonable requirements.

The complaint also charged that Schine had forced or attempted to force competitors out of business and where competitors would not sell out to Schine had threatened to build or had built an opposition theatre, had threatened to deprive or had deprived competitors of a desirable film or run, had cut admission prices, and had engaged in other unfair practices. In these and other ways it was charged that Schine had used its circuit buying power to maintain its monopoly and to restrain trade. The conspiracy charged was between the Schine defendants themselves and between them and the distributors.

The District Court found that the appellants had conspired with each other and with the eight major film distributors[4] to violate § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act. Its findings may be summarized as follows:

The entire circuit buying power was utilized to negotiate films for all the theatres from the distributors, the negotiations ending in master agreements between a distributor and the exhibitor. This large buying power[5] gave Schine the "opportunity to exert pressure on the distributors to obtain preferences." Moreover, Schine by combining its closed and open towns in its negotiations for films was able "to dictate terms to the distributors." Schine bought films for some theatres in which it had no financial interest (but as respects most of which it had an option to purchase). It also performed the service (under so-called pooling agreements) fcr groups of theatres in which it and others were interested. Through the use of such buying power Schine arbitrarily deprived competitors of first- and second-run pictures, was able in many towns to secure unreasonable clearances[6] year after year of from 90 to 180 days, obtained long-term agreements for rental of film (franchises) which gave it preferences not given independent operators,[7] and received more advantageous concessions from the distributors respecting admission prices than competitors were able to get. Schine made threats to build or to open closed theatres in order to force sales of theatres in various towns or to prevent entry by an independent operator. Schine cut admission prices. Schine obtained from competitors whom it bought out agreements not to compete for long terms of years which agreements at times extended to other towns as well. Schine obtained film-rental concessions not made available to independents. The District Court entered a decree enjoining these practices and requiring a divestiture by Schine of various of its theatres. 63 F. Supp. 229.

[Combining of Open and Closed Towns]

First. For the reasons stated in United States v. Griffiths, ante, p. —, the combining of the open and closed towns for the negotiation of films for the circuit was a restraint of trade and the use of monopoly power in violation of § 1 and § 2 of the Act. The concerted action of the parent company, its subsidiaries, and the named officers and directors in that endeavor was a conspiracy which was not immunized by reason of the fact that the members were closely affiliated rather than independent. See United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 227; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173. The negotiations which Schine had with the distributors resulted in the execution of master agreements between the distributors and exhibitors. This brought the distributors into unlawful combinations with the Schine defendants. See United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., post, p. —. The course of business makes plain that the commerce affected was interstate. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 180, 183-184.

[Evidence]

Second. Appellants object to admission in evidence of numerous inter-office communications between officials of the distributors with whom Schine dealt. The District Court placed considerable reliance on them in making its findings. We will advert

[4] Fox, Loew, Paramount, RKO, Warner, Columbia, Universal, and United Artists.

[5] In the 1939-1940 season Schine paid $1,647,000 to six distributors in film rental.

[6] By clearance is meant the period of time agreed upon which must elapse between runs of the same feature within a particular area or in specified theatres.

[7] The District Court used "independents" or "independent operators" to mean competitors other than the exhibitor-distributors. Schine, of course, is an independent circuit, as that term is used in the industry.

later to the use of these documents to prove the unreasonableness of clearances. It is sufficient at this point to say that since a conspiracy between Schine and each of the named distributors was established by independent evidence, these inter-office letters and memoranda were admissible against all conspirators as declarations of some of the associates so far as they were in furtherance of the unlawful project. Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, 249; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 184; United States v. Gypsum Co., 333 U. S. —.

[Findings of Fact Challenged]

Third. Appellants make detailed challenges to many of the other findings of the District Court on which it based its holdings that appellants violated the Act.

(1) They vigorously attack the findings that Schine arbitrarily deprived independents of first- and second-run pictures. Their chief contention is that there is no support for the finding of arbitrary action on the part of Schine, that Schine did not buy pictures beyond its needs in order to keep them away from its competitors, that any successful purchaser of a first- or second-run picture has an exclusive privilege that necessarily deprives competitors of the film for the period of the run, and that any advantage which Schine obtained in this regard was the result of the operation of forces of competition.

As we read the evidence underlying this finding, it was the use of Schine's monopoly power—represented by combining the buying power of the open and closed towns—which enabled it to obtain that which its competitors could not obtain. Deprivation of competitors of first- and second-run pictures in that way was indeed arbitrary in the sense that it was the product of monopoly power, not of competitive forces. That is the construction we give the finding of the District Court; and as so construed it is supported by substantial evidence. There may be exceptions in the case of some subsidiary findings. But we do not stop to relate them. For even if we lay them aside as clearly erroneous for lack of support in the evidence, the conclusion is irresistible that Schine so used its monopoly power to gain advantages and preferences which, on a purely competitive basis, it could not have achieved.

(2) Defense of the long-term film-rental agreements—the franchises—is made on the ground that they were accepted methods of doing business in the industry,[8] that they were favored by distributors as devices to stabilize their end of the business and to save expense, and that they were not chosen by Schine as instruments to suppress competition. But it seems to us apparent that their use served to intensify the impact of Schine's monopoly power on its competitors. For when Schine's buying power was used to acquire films produced by a distributor for two or three years rather than for one year alone, it plainly strengthened through the exercise of monopoly power such dominant position as Schine had over each of its competitors.

Appellants also challenge the finding that Schine obtained preferences through the franchises, in addition to long-term supplies of pictures, which were not granted independent operators. One of these preferences was found to be the unfair and inequitable clearance provisions; another, special film-rental concessions. We will consider these later. The other aspects of the findings we do not stop to analyze. For the franchise agreements as employed by Schine are unreasonable restraints of trade for the reasons stated; and they must be permanently enjoined, even though we assume their collateral aspects are not accurately described by the District Court and so may not be condemned.

(3) Appellants challenge the finding that Schine made threats to build theatres or to open closed ones in order to force sales of theatres in various towns or to prevent entry by an independent operator. There are inaccuracies in some of the subsidiary findings. There are episodes which are susceptible of two interpretations, one wholly innocent and the other unlawful. There are still other episodes which have the unmistakable earmarks of the use of monopoly power with intent to expand an empire and to restrain competition. On the whole we think the District Court was justified in drawing the inference of unlawful purpose from the ambiguous episodes and that those coupled with the others are adequate to support these findings of the District Court.

[8] A consent order was entered in the present case on May 19, 1942, which provided, inter alia, that appellants would not enter into any agreement licensing films released by any distributor during a period of more than one year and that all agreements in existence having a longer term should be void as to all films released after the thirtieth day following the date of the consent order.

(4) We reach the same result as respects the agreements not to compete which Schine exacted from competitors whom it bought out. It is not enough that the agreements may be valid under local law. Even an otherwise lawful device may be used as a weapon in restraint of trade or in an effort to monopolize a part of trade or commerce. Agreements not to compete have at times been used for that unlawful purpose. See United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 174; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, p. 181. If we had here only agreements not to compete, the inferences drawn by the District Court might not be warranted. But in the setting of this record, and against the background of Schine's other monopolistic practices, it seems to us that the District Court might infer that the requisite purpose was present and that these agreements were additional weapons in Schine's arsenal of power through the use of which its monopoly was sought to be extended.

(5) The finding that Schine obtained film-rental concessions not made available to independent operators is not intelligible to us. For the District Court went on to state that "These provisions were also in contracts with independents." How those concessions constitute a restraint of trade is therefore not apparent. We set aside this finding so that it may be clarified on remand of the cause.

(6) There is challenge to the findings that Schine's rental agreements contained minimum admission prices, or minimum admission prices lower than those to be charged by the independent operators for subsequent runs, or relieved Schine of requirements for minimum admission prices though imposing them on its competitors. There is evidence to support the findings that minimum prices were fixed. It is well settled that the fixing of minimum prices like other types of price-fixing, is unlawful per se. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150. The findings that Schine was either granted minimum admission prices more favorable than those required of its competitors, or that Schine, unlike its competitors, was relieved of all requirements for minimum prices, are also supported by evidence. It is said that these provisions of the agreements were not adhered to. But since they did exist, it is not for us to speculate as to what force or sanction they may have had.

(7) There is also challenge to the finding that Schine cut admission prices. This seems uncontroverted. But price cutting without more is not a violation of the Sherman Act. It is indeed a competitive practice which this record shows to have been common in the industry. It may be used in violation of the Act. Thus it may be the instrument of monopoly power to eliminate competitors or to bring them to their knees. But since it is not unlawful per se, facts and circumstances must be adduced to show that it was in purpose or effect employed as an instrument of monopoly power. Here there is nothing except a bare finding that at times Schine cut admission prices. That finding is not sufficiently discriminating to withstand analysis and is not adequate to support an injunction against price cutting.

(8) The finding as to unreasonable clearances presents rather large issues. We have elaborated the point in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., post, —, and need not repeat what is said there. Clearance is an agreement by a distributor not to exhibit a film nor to license others to do so within a given area and for a stated period after the last date of the showing of the film by the licensee with whom the agreement is made.[9] It is, in other words, an agreement by a distributor to license films only for specified successive dates. It is in part designed to protect the value of the license which is granted. While it thus protects the income of the first exhibitor, there is no contention that clearance agreements are per se unlawful restraints on competition by reason of the effect they may have on admission prices or otherwise. All the District Court purported to condemn, and all the appellee maintains is unlawful, are "unreasonable clearances." If reasonableness is the test, the factors which bear on it would appear to be numerous.[10] The findings and opinion of the District Court, however, do not greatly illuminate the problem. What standards or criteria of unreasonableness were applied does not clearly appear. There are, however, in some of the subsidiary findings in this case a few clues as to the basis used by the District Court in classifying clearances as unreasonable. Thus it said that Schine got some clearances "over towns in which Schine did not operate." But that is irrelevant to the problem of reasonableness of clearances, since by definition clearances run to both theatres and towns not owned by him who has the clearance.

The District Court also found that clearances "were given over towns over which there had been no previous clearance." But that without more would not make a clearance "unreasonable." The District Court found that Schine got clearances over "some towns distant from 10 to upwards of 20 miles" and that clearances were also obtained over "outside towns of comparably small population, distant so far that no clearance is justified." If the basis for these findings is that the towns were in different competitive areas, it would come closest to revealing the standard used by the District Court in determining whether the clearances were or were not reasonable, unless possibly it be the finding that in a few instances Schine got clearances over towns where there were no theatres.

The District Court cites instances of clearances which in its view were illegal because unreasonable as to time. But some of these turn out to be situations where clearances were granted over towns where Schine had the only theatre in town. So perhaps the District Court used as a basis for some of its findings of unreasonable clearances the absence of any competition between the theatres in question. But as to that we can only guess in each case and then wonder whether our guess was correct, because appellee suggests that one vice of Schine's clearances was that they ran not to specified theatres but to specified towns. We are, however, left somewhat in the dark whether the District Court followed that theory or made the reasonableness of clearances turn on whether or not the theatres affected were in different competitive areas.

Appellee also suggests that proof of the unreasonableness of Schine's clearances is that their periods were almost uniformly the same even though there were wide variations in the condition and size of theatres and of the type of pictures played in the various theatres. But we are given no clue in the findings whether that was the view of the District Court. On its face it seems more like an attempt of the appellee to show what findings could have been made on the basis of the record had some discrimination been made in appraising the evidence.

Appellee seems to argue that standards of reasonableness can be dispensed with by reason of statements in the inter-office memoranda of the distributors that many of Schine's clearances were "unreasonable." On the matter of clearances, however, the interests of distributors and exhibitors are not necessarily identical. For the self-interest of exhibitors which would call for long clearances would militate against the best interests of distributors.[11] So it is not clear that these declarations can properly be said to fall within the scope of the unlaw-

[10] See Bertrand, Evans & Blanchard, The Motion Picture Industry—A Pattern of Control 40-41 (TNEC Monograph No. 43, 1941):

"The establishment of clearance schedules is an intricate procedure. It involves a complex bargaining process and the balance of a variety of opposing economic interests. It may be stated initially that the primary objective of the distributor is, of course, to maximize his total revenue from each picture. This aim gives him a very direct interest in clearance periods. The higher rental fees paid by the prior-run exhibitor are directly conditioned on the extent of the protection which he is granted, and in general the longer the clearance period before subsequent showing, the higher the rental fee the prior-run exhibitor will pay.

"On the other hand, the distributor's revenue from subsequent-run exhibition is also important to him; this income may mean the difference between black or red ink on his ledgers. But the longer the clearance period, the smaller will be these returns—not only because more customers will have attended the prior showing rather than wait for subsequent exhibition, but also because the effects of the advertising and exploitation efforts made when the picture was released will have been vitiated over this time. In general, the greater the total box-office return earned by a film in all showings, the greater will be the distributor's revenue.

"The relation between run, clearance and zoning, admission price, seating capacity, and rental fees is indeed a complex one. The range covered by these factors is indicated by this fact: a license fee amounting to many thousands of dollars may be paid for the first showing of a film in a large metropolitan theater, and within a year the same film may be exhibited in some small theater in the same city for a fee of less than $20."

[11] See note 10, supra.

ful project which the two groups were sponsoring. Cf. Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U. S. 640, 647-648. But however that may be, these statements do not advance us very far with the problem because they too fail to give specific content to the concept of unreasonable as applied to clearances.

As a last resort appellee seeks to sustain these findings on the ground that Schine got at least some of its clearances by refusing to make any deal for the circuit unless its terms were met. But any clearance so obtained, though otherwise reasonable, would be unlawful, for it would be the product of the exercise of monopoly power. It is evident, however, that that was not the theory adopted by the District Court for it did not look to see what clearances had been obtained in that manner.

The short of the matter is that since we do not know for certain what the findings of the District Court on clearances mean, they must be set aside. In doing so we of course do not intimate here, any more than we do in case of the other findings we have set aside in the case, that the record would not sustain findings adverse to Schine. We only hold that before we can pass on the questions tendered, findings on clearances must be made which reflect an appraisal of the complex of factors bearing on this question of reasonableness. That is a function of the District Court.

[Provisions of Decree]

Fourth. The decree entered by the District Court enjoins appellants from specified acts or practices.[12] To the extent that these provisions are directed to practices reflected in findings which we set aside, they must be re-examined by the District Court on remand of the case.

Appellants object to the generality of the injunction against "monopolizing" first- and second-run films.[13] The statutory requirement is that these injunctions "shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained." 38 Stat. 738, 28 U. S. C. § 383. And see Fed. R. Civ. P., 65 (d). We need not determine whether the provision in question if read, as it must be, in light of the other paragraphs of the decree (Swift & Co. v. United States, 274 U. S. 311, 328) would pass muster. For we think the public interest requires that a more specific decree be entered on this phase of the case. The precise practices found to have violated the act should be specifically enjoined.

We have considered the objections to the other parts of the injunction (apart from provisions as to divestiture which we discuss later) and find them without merit.

[Divestiture, Pooling Agreements]

Fifth. The District Court included in its decree a divestiture provision adjudging that appellant companies be "dissolved, realigned, or reorganized in their ownership and control so that fair competition between them and other theatres may be restored and thereafter maintained." The parties subsequently submitted various plans and after hearings the one submitted by the Department of Justice was approved with modifications. The plan does not provide for the [12] This part of the decree provides:

"Each of the defendants is hereby enjoined and restrained:

"1. From monopolizing the supply of major first run films in any situation where there is a competing theatre suitable for first run exhibition thereof and from monopolizing the supply of second run film in any situation where there is a suitable theatre for second run exhibition thereof.

"2. From demanding or receiving clearance over theatres operated by others which unreasonably restricts their ability to compete with a theatre owned or operated by a defendant corporation controlled by it and from attempting to control the admission prices charged by others by agreement with distributors, demands made upon distributors, or by any means whatsoever.

"3. From conditioning the licensing of films in any competitive situation outside of Buffalo, New York, upon the licensing of films in any other situation and from entering into any film franchise.

"5. From enforcing any existing agreements heretofore entered into (1) not to compete or (2) to restrict the use of any real estate to non-theatrical purposes.

"6. From using any threats or deception as a means whereby a competitor is induced to sell.

"7. From continuing any contract, conspiracy or combination with each other or with any other person which has the purpose or effect of maintaining the exhibition or theatre monopolies of the defendants or of preventing any other theatre or exhibitor from competing with the defendants or any of them, and from entering into any similar contract, conspiracy, or combination for the purpose or with the effect of restraining or monopolizing trade and commerce between the States."

[13] See note 12, supra, paragraph 1.

dissolution of the Schine circuit through the separation of the several affiliated corporations as was done in United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 188-189. It keeps the circuit intact in that sense but requires Schine to sell certain theatres. The plan requires Schine to sell its interest in all but one theatre of its selection in each of 33 towns, all but two in each of four larger towns, and two of four theatres in Rochester, New York.[14] Schine is to be divested of more than 50 of its theatres. The towns affected are over 40 out of the 70-odd in which Schine is operating.[15] The one-theatre towns of Schine are unaffected.

The decree also dissolves the pooling agreements. A trustee is appointed to make the sales which are ordered. Schine is prohibited from acquiring any financial interest in additional theatres "except after an affirmative showing that such acquisition will not unreasonably restrain competition." Schine is ordered not to buy or book films for any theatre other than those in which it owns a financial interest. The District Court concluded that this program of divestiture was necessary in order to restore "free enterprise and open competition amongst all branches of the motion picture industry."

As we have noted, the District Court did not follow the procedure of United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, and order the dissolution of the combination of the affiliated corporations. Schine presented such a plan and it was rejected. That plan contemplated the divisions of the Schine theatres among three separate corporations, with members of the Schine family owning each corporation. The District Court rejected that plan because it did not furnish such separation of ownership as would assure discontinuance of the practices which had constituted violations of the Act. The District Court did not pursue further the prospect of dismemberment of the Schine circuit through separation of the theatres into geographical groupings under separate and unaffiliated ownerships. Nor do the findings reflect an inquiry to determine what theatres had been acquired by Schine through methods which violate the Act. So far as the findings reveal, the theatres which are ordered divested may be properties which in whole or in part were lawfully acquired; and theatres which Schine is permitted to retain may, so far as the findings reveal, be ones which it obtained as the result of tactics violating the Act.

In this type of case we start from the premise that an injunction against future violations is not adequate to protect the public interest. If all that was done was to forbid a repetition of the illegal conduct, those who had unlawfully built their empires could preserve them intact. They could retain the full dividends of their monopolistic practices and profit from the unlawful restraints of trade which they had inflicted on competitors. Such a course would make enforcement of the Act a futile thing unless perchance the United States moved in at the incipient stages of the unlawful project. For these reasons divestiture or dissolution is an essential feature of these decrees. See United States v. Cresent Amusement Co., supra, p. 189, and cases cited.

To require divestiture of theatres unlawfully acquired is not to add to the penalties that Congress has provided in the antitrust laws. Like restitution it merely deprives a defendant of the gains from his wrongful conduct. It is an equitable remedy designed in the public interest to undo what could have been prevented had the defendants not outdistanced the government in their unlawful project. Nor is United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319, 351-353, opposed to this view. For in that case there was no showing that the plants sought to be divested were either unlawfully acquired or used in a manner violative of the antitrust laws.

Divestiture or dissolution must take account of the present and future conditions in the particular industry as well as past violations. It serves several functions: (1) It puts an end to the combination or conspiracy when that is itself the violation. (2) It deprives the antitrust defendants of the benefits of their conspiracy. (3) It is designed to break up or render impotent the monopoly power which violates the Act. See United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 188-190; United States v. Griffith, ante, p. —.

The last two phases of this problem are the ones presented in this case. But the District Court purported to deal with only one of them. It did not determine what dividends Schine had obtained from the conspiracy. In United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 181, 189, some of the affiliated corporations through which that empire was built were products of the conspiracy. Hence that fact without more justified the direction in the decree to unscramble them. There are no findings which would warrant such a course in this case. But an even more direct method of causing appellants to surrender the gains from their conspiracy is to require them to dispose of theatres obtained by practices which violate the antitrust acts. We do not know what findings on that score would be supported by the record, for the District Court did not address itself to the problem. The upshot of the matter is that the findings do not reveal what the rewards of the conspiracy were; and consequently the court did not consider what would be the preferable way of causing appellants to surrender them. The case must therefore be remanded so that the District Court may make appropriate findings on this phase of the case.

[14] It also requires Schine to sell specific theatres remaining unsold under the consent decree of May 19, 1942.

[15] Schine had withdrawn from five towns pursuant to the consent order of May 19, 1942.

While such an inquiry is the starting point for determining to what extent divestiture should be ordered, the matter does not end there. For it may be that even after appellants are deprived of the fruits of their conspiracy, the Schine circuit might still constitute a monopoly power of the kind which the Act condemns (see American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 809, 811), in spite of the restrictive provisions of the decree. Monopoly power is not condemned by the Act only when it was unlawfully obtained. The mere existence of the power to monopolize, together with the purpose or intent to do so, constitutes an evil at which the Act is aimed. United States v. Griffith, ante, p. —; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 432. But whether that condition will obtain in this case must await the findings on the other phase of the case.

We accordingly set aside the divestiture provisions of the decree so that the District Court can make the findings necessary for an appropriate decree. We approve the dissolution of the pooling agreements, the prohibition against buying or booking films for theatres in which Schine has no financial interest, and the restriction on future acquisitions of theatres. See United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 185-187. We do not reach the question of the appointment of a trustee to sell theatres as that merely implements the divestiture provisions which must be reconsidered by the District Court.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed in part and reversed in part and the cause is remanded to it for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

So ordered.

[¶ 62,246] United States v. Griffith et al.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 64. October Term, 1947. May 3, 1948.

On Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Oklahoma.

Circuit Buying Power—Master Agreements—Restraint of Trade.—The pooling of buying power and the negotiation of master agreements granting exclusive privileges such as preemption in the selection of films and the receipt of clearances over competing theatres, by a group of affiliated exhibitors, is held to result in monopoly and restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act. It is not always necessary to find a specific intent to restrain trade or to build a monopoly to find that the antitrust laws have been violated. It is sufficient that a restraint or monopoly results as the consequence of a defendant's conduct or business arrangements. When the buying power of an entire circuit is used to negotiate films for theatres in competitive as well as in closed towns, it results in the licensing of films on a non-competitive basis in what would otherwise be competitive situations, and constitutes a misuse of monopoly power under the Sherman Act. The case is remanded to the District Court for the determination of the question of the effect of the monopoly power of the defendants on their competitors and on the growth of defendants' circuit, and for the fashioning of a decree to remedy the wrongs and prevent their recurrence.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.273.

Reversing and remanding the decision of the District Court, 68 Fed. Supp. 180, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,564.

For appellant: Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General; John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; Robert L. Wright, Milton A. Kallis, Robert W. Ginnane, Special Assistants to Attorney General.

For appellees: Charles B. Cochran, Henry S. Guffing, and John B. Dudley of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

[Facts]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a suit brought by the United States in the District Court to prevent and restrain appellees from violating §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 50 Stat. 693, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2. The District Court, finding there was no violation of the Act in any of the respects charged in the complaint, dismissed the complaint on the merits. 68 F. Supp. 180. The case is here by appeal under § 2 of the Expediting Act of February 11, 1903, 32 Stat. 823, as amended, 15 U. S. C. § 29, and § 238 of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925, 43 Stat. 936, 938, 28 U. S. C. § 345.

The appellees are four affiliated corporations and two individuals who are associated with them as stockholders and officers.[1] The corporations operate (or own stock in corporations which operate) moving picture theatres in Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico. With minor exceptions, the theatres which each corporation owns do not compete with those of its affiliates but are in separate towns. In April, 1939, when the complaint was filed, the corporate appellees had interests in theatres in 85 towns. In 32 of those towns there were competing theatres. Fifty-three of the towns (62 per cent) were closed towns, i. e. towns in which there were no competing theatres. Five years earlier the corporate appellees had theatres in approximately 37 towns, 18 of which were competitive and 19 of which (51 per cent) were closed. It was during that five-year period that the acts and practices occurred which, according to the allegations of the complaint, constitute violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

Prior to the 1938-1939 season these exhibitors used a common agent to negotiate with the distributors for films for the entire circuit.[2] Beginning with the 1938-1939 season one agent negotiated for the circuit represented by two of the corporate appellees, and another agent negotiated for the circuit represented by the other two corporate appellees. A master agreement was usually executed with each distributor covering films to be released by the distributor during an entire season.[3] There were variations among the master agreements. But in the main they provided as follows: (a) They lumped together towns in which the appellees had no competition and towns in which there were competing theatres. (b) They generally licensed the first-run exhibition in practically all of the theatres in which appellees had a substantial interest of substantially all of the films to be released by the distributor during the period of a year.[4] (c) They specified the towns for which second runs were licensed for exhibition by appellees, the second-run rental sometimes being included in the first-run rental. (d) The rental specified often was the total minimum required to be paid (in

[1] Griffith Amusement Co., Consolidated Theatres, Inc., R. E. Griffith Theatres, Inc., Westex Theatres, Inc., H. J. Griffith, and L. C. Griffith. R. E. Griffith, a brother of H. J. and L. C. Griffith, was a defendant, but died while the suit was pending in the District Court and the action was not revived against his estate or personal representative.

[2] The circuit includes the four corporate appellees and their affiliated exhibitors. When less than the full ownership of a theatre was acquired, the contract would provide that the buying and booking of films was exclusively in the hands of the Griffith interests.

[3] The agreement negotiated by the common agent would be executed between a distributor and each of the corporate appellees or between a distributor and an individual exhibitor.

[4] There were a few franchise agreements covering films to be released by a distributor during a term of years, usually for three years and in one instance for five years.

The theatres of appellees in Oklahoma City were second, not first, run theatres.

equal weekly or quarterly installments) by the circuit as a whole for use of the films throughout the circuit, the appellees subsequently allocating the rental among the theatres where the films were exhibited. (e) Films could be played out of the order of their release, so that a specified film need not be played in a particular theatre at any specified time.[5]

[Restraint of Competition]

The complaint charged that certain exclusive privileges which these agreements granted the appellee exhibitors over their competitors unreasonably restrained competition by preventing their competitors from obtaining enough first- or second-run films from the distributors[6] to operate successfully. The exclusive privileges charged as violations were preemption in the selection of films and the receipt of clearances over competing theatres. It also charged that the use of the buying power of the entire circuit in acquiring those exclusive privileges violated the Act.

The District Court found no conspiracy between the appellee exhibitors or between them and the distributors, which violated the Act. It found that the agreements under which films were distributed were not in restraint of trade; that the appellees did not monopolize or attempt to monopolize the licensing or supply of film for first run or for any subsequent run; that the appellees did not conspire to compel the distributors to grant them the exclusive privilege of selecting films before the films were made available to any competing exhibitor; that there was no agreement between defendants and distributors granting defendants unreasonable clearances; that the appellees did not compel or attempt to compel distributors to grant them privileges not granted their competitors or which gave them any substantial advantage over their competitors; and that appellees did not condition the licensing of films in any competitive situation on the licensing of such films in a noncompetitive situation, or vice versa.

The appellant introduced evidence designed to show the effect of the master agreements in some twenty-odd competitive situations. The District Court made detailed findings on this phase of the case to the effect that difficulties which competitors had in getting desirable films after appellee exhibitors entered their towns, the inroads appellees made on the business of competitors, and the purchases by appellees of their competitors were not the result of threats or coercion nor the result of an unlawful conspiracy, but solely the consequence of lawful competitive practices.

In United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173, a group of affiliated exhibitors, such as we have in the present case, were found to have violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by the pooling of their buying power and the negotiation of master agreements similar to those we have here. A difference between that case and the present one, which the District Court deemed to be vital, was that in the former the buying power was used for the avowed purpose of eliminating competition and of acquiring a monopoly of theatres in the several towns, while no such purpose was found to exist here. To be more specific, the defendants in the former case through the pooling of their buying power increased their leverage over their competitive situations by insisting that they be given monopoly rights in towns where they had competition, else they would give a distributor no business in their closed towns.

[Specific Intent]

It is, however, not always necessary to find a specific intent to restrain trade or to build a monopoly in order to find that the anti-trust laws have been violated. It is sufficient that a restraint of trade or monopoly results as the consequence of a defendant's conduct or business arrangements. United States v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525, 543; United States v. Masonite Corp., 316 U. S. 265, 275. To require a greater showing would cripple the Act. As stated in United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 432, "no monopolist monopolizes unconscious of what he is doing." Specific intent in the sense in which the common law used the term is necessary only where the acts fall short of the results condemned by the Act.

[5] The privilege was frequently conditioned on the playing of, or paying for, a designated quantity of the film obligation during stated portions of the season.

[6] Those are the eight major film distributors who originally were defendants. The charge that these distributors conspired with each other was eliminated from the complaint and they were dismissed as defendants by stipulation or on motion of appellant. But the charge that each of the distributors had conspired with the appellee exhibitors was retained.

The classical statement is that of Mr. Justice Holmes speaking for the Court in Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 396:

> "Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent—for instance, the monopoly—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. Commonwealth v. Peaslee, 177 Massachusetts, 267, 272. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, this statute, like many others and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result."

And see United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra, pp. 431-432. And so, even if we accept the District Court's findings that appellees had no intent or purpose unreasonably to restrain trade or to monopolize, we are left with the question whether a necessary and direct result of the master agreements was the restraining or monopolizing of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Act.

Anyone who owns and operates the single theatre in a town, or who acquires the exclusive right to exhibit a film, has a monopoly in the popular sense. But he usually does not violate § 2 of the Sherman Act unless he has acquired or maintained his strategic position, or sought to expand his monopoly, or expanded it by means of those restraints of trade which are cognizable under § 1. For those things which are condemned by § 2 are in large measure merely the end products of conduct which violates § 1. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 61. But that is not always true. Section 1 covers contracts, combinations, or conspiracies in restraint of trade.[7] Section 2 is not restricted to conspiracies or combinations to monopolize[8] but also makes it a crime for any person to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize any part of interstate or foreign trade or commerce. So it is that monopoly power, whether lawfully or unlawfully acquired, may itself constitute an evil and stand condemned under § 2 even though it remains unexercised.[9] For § 2 of the Act is aimed, inter alia, at the acquisition or retention of effective market control. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 428, 429. Hence the existence of power "to exclude competition when it is desired to do so" is itself a violation of § 2, provided it is coupled with the purpose or intent to exercise that power. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 809, 811, 814. It is indeed "unreasonable, per se, to foreclose competitors from any substantial market." International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 396. The anti-trust laws are as much violated by the prevention of competition as by its destruction. United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra. It follows a fortiori that the use of monopoly power, however lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful.

[Use of Monopoly Power]

A man with a monopoly of theatres in any one town commands the entrance for all films into that area. If he uses that strategic position to acquire exclusive privileges in a city where he has competitors, he is employing his monopoly power as a trade weapon against his competitors. It may be a feeble, ineffective weapon where he has only one closed or monopoly town. But as those towns increase in number throughout a region, his monopoly power in them may be used with crushing effect on competitors in other places.[10] He need not be as crass as the exhibitors in United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, in order to make his monopoly power effective in his competitive situations. Though he makes no threat to withhold the business of his closed or monopoly towns unless the distributors give him the exclusive film rights in the towns

[7] Section 1 provides: "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. . . ."

[8] Section 2 provides: "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ."

[9] So also a conspiracy to monopolize violates § 2 even though monopoly power was never acquired. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 789.

[10] It was said in United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417, 451, that mere size is not outlawed by § 2. But size is of course an earmark of monopoly power. Moreover, as stated by Justice Cardozo, speaking for the Court in United States v. Swift & Co., 286 U. S. 106, 116, "size carries with it an opportunity for abuse that is not to be ignored when the opportunity is proved to have been utilized in the past."

where he has competitors, the effect is likely to be the same where the two are joined. When the buying power of the entire circuit is used to negotiate films for his competitive as well as his closed towns, he is using monopoly power to expand his empire. And even if we assume that a specific intent to accomplish that result is absent, he is chargeable in legal contemplation with that purpose since the end result is the necessary and direct consequence of what he did. United States v. Patten, supra, p. 543.

The consequence of such a use of monopoly power is that films are licensed on a non-competitive basis in what would otherwise be competitive situations. That is the effect whether one exhibitor makes the bargain with the distributor or whether two or more exhibitors lump together their buying power, as appellees did here. It is in either case a misuse of monopoly power under the Sherman Act. If monopoly power can be used to begat monopoly, the Act becomes a feeble instrument indeed. Large-scale buying is not, of course, unlawful per se. It may yield price or other lawful advantages to the buyer. It may not, however, be used to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize interstate trade or commerce. Nor, as we hold in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., post p. —, may it be used to stifle competition by denying competitors less favorably situated access to the market.

Appellees were concededly using their circuit buying power to obtain films. Their closed towns were linked with their competitive towns. No effort of concealment was made as evidenced by the fact that the rental specified was at times the total minimum amount required to be paid by the circuit as a whole. Monopoly rights in the form of certain exclusive privileges were bargained for and obtained. These exclusive privileges, being acquired by the use of monopoly power, were unlawfully acquired. The appellees, having combined with each other and with the distributors to obtain those monopoly rights, formed a conspiracy in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Act. It is plain from the course of business that the commerce affected was interstate. United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., supra, pp. 180, 183-184.

[Effect of Practices Not Determined]

What effect these practices actually had on the competitors of appellee exhibitors or on the growth of the Griffith circuit we do not know. The District Court, having started with the assumption that the use of circuit buying power was wholly lawful, naturally attributed no evil to it and thus treated the master agreements as legitimate weapons of competition. Since it found that no competitors were driven out of business, or acquired by appellees, or impeded in their business by threats or coercion, it concluded that appellees had not violated the Sherman Act in any of the ways charged in the complaint. These findings are plainly inadequate if we start, as we must, from the premise that the circuit buying power was unlawfully employed. On the record as we read it, it cannot be doubted that the monopoly power of appellees had some effect on their competitors and on the growth of the Griffith circuit. Its extent must be determined on a remand of the cause. We remit to the District Court not only that problem but also the fashioning of a decree which will undo as near as may be the wrongs that were done and prevent their recurrence in the future. [¶ 62,247] Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Company.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 404. October Term, 1947. May 3, 1948.

On writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Quantity Discounts—Standard Discounts May Be Discriminatory.—Standard quantity discounts, available to all purchasers on equal terms, are nevertheless discriminatory within the meaning of the Robinson-Patman Act and are prohibited by it whenever their effect may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. Standard prices of $1.60 per case of salt in less-than-carload purchases, $1.50 in carload purchases, $1.40 in 5,000-case purchases in any consecutive 12 months, and $1.35 in 50,000-case purchases in any consecutive 12 months, theoretically are equally available to all purchasers, but functionally they are not when the record indicates that no single independent retailer, and probably no single wholesaler, bought as many as 50,000 cases of table salt in one year, and some made purchases in such small quantities that they could not qualify for any of these discounts, even those based on carload shipments. "The legislative history of the Robinson-Patman Act makes it abundantly clear that Congress considered it to be an evil that a large buyer could secure a competitive advantage over a small buyer solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability. The Robinson-Patman Act was passed to deprive a large buyer of such advantages except to the extent that a lower price could be justified by reason of a seller's diminished costs due to quantity manufacture, delivery or sale, or by reason of the seller's good faith effort to meet a competitor's equally low price."

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.305, 2212.5338, 2212.5355, 2212.5467, 2212.5477.

Price Discrimination—Quantity Discounts—Burden of Proof of Justification on Respondent.—In order to establish "discrimination in price" under the Robinson-Patman Act, the Federal Trade Commission need prove only that a seller charged one purchaser a higher price for like goods than he charged one or more of the purchaser's competitors, in a case involving competitive injury between a seller's customers. The burden does not rest on the Commission to prove that respondent's quantity discount differentials were not justified by its cost savings. "The general rule of statutory construction that the burden of proving justification or exemption under a special exception to the prohibitions of a statute generally rests on one who claims its benefits, requires that respondent undertake this proof under the proviso of Section 2(a)." Further, "the Senate committee report on the bill explained that the provisos of Section 2(a) throw 'upon any who claims the benefit of those exceptions the burden of showing that their case falls within them.' "

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.300.

Price Discrimination—Injury to Competition—Proof.—The Robinson-Patman Act does not require the Federal Trade Commission to find that the discriminations in fact harmed competition, but only that there is a "reasonable possibility" that they "may" have such an effect. (Two justices, in a dissenting opinion, hold that the record should show a reasonable "probability" instead of "possibility" of such an effect.) Evidence that respondent's quantity discounts resulted in price differentials between competing purchasers sufficient to influence their resale price of salt is adequate to support the Commission's findings that the effect may be substantially to lessen competition and to injure, destroy and prevent competition. The fact that respondent's less-than carload sales are very small in comparison with the total volume of its business is no reason for rejecting the Commission's findings that the effect of a carload discrimination may substantially lessen competition. "In enacting the Robinson-Patman Act Congress was especially concerned with protecting small businesses which were unable to buy in quantities, such as the merchants here who purchased in less-than-carload lots." The fact that salt is a small item in most wholesale and retail businesses is no reason for rejecting the Commission's findings that the effect of the discrimination may substantially lessen competition. "Congress intended to protect a merchant from competitive injury attributable to discriminatory prices on any or all goods sold in interstate commerce, whether the particular goods constituted a major or minor portion of his stock."

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2212.603.

Price Discrimination—Form of Federal Trade Commission Order.—The form of a Federal Trade Commission order is upheld insofar as it prohibited price discrimination by selling products to some wholesalers (and to some retailers) at prices different from the prices charged other wholesalers (and other retailers) who in fact compete in the sale and distribution of such products. A proviso "that this shall not prevent price differences of less than five cents per case which do not tend to lessen, injure or destroy competition among such wholesalers [retailers]" is objectionable because the qualifying clause shifts to the courts in subsequent contempt proceedings for violation of the order the very questions of injury to competition, etc., which the Act requires the Commission to determine as the basis for its order.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Facts of Case]

The Federal Trade Commission, after a hearing, found that the respondent, which manufactures and sells table salt in interstate commerce, had discriminated in price between different purchasers of like grades and qualities, and concluded that such discriminations were in violation of § 2 of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C. § 13.[1] It accordingly issued a cease and desist order. 39 F. T. C. 35.[2] Upon petition of the respondent the Circuit Court of Appeals, with one judge dissenting, set aside the Commission's findings and order, directed the Commission to dismiss its complaint against respondent, and denied a cross petition of the Commission for enforcement of its order. 162 F. 2d 949. The Court's judgment rested on its construction of the Act, its holding that crucial findings of the Commission were either not supported by evidence or were contrary to the evidence, and its conclusion that the Commission's order was too broad. Since questions of importance in the construction and administration of the Act were presented, we granted certiorari. 332 U. S. 850. Disposition of these questions requires only a brief narration of the facts.

Respondent manufactures several different brands of table salt[3] and sells them directly to (1) wholesalers or jobbers, who in turn resell to the retail trade, and (2) large retailers, including chain store retailers. Respondent sells its finest brand of table salt, known as Blue Label, on what it terms a standard quantity discount system, available to all customers. Under this system the purchasers pay a delivered price and the cost to both wholesale and retail purchasers of this brand differs according to the quantities bought. These prices are as follows, after making allowance for rebates and discounts:

	Per case
Less-than-carload purchases	$1.60
Carload purchases	1.50
5,000-case purchases in any consecutive 12 months	1.40
50,000-case purchases in any consecutive 12 months	1.35

Only five companies have ever bought sufficient quantities of respondent's salt to obtain the $1.35 per case price. These companies could buy in such quantities because they operate large chains of retail stores in various parts of the country.[4] As a result of this low price these five companies have been able to sell Blue Label salt at retail cheaper

[1] Section 2(a) provides in part "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them . . . ."

[2] The original findings and order were modified by the Commission on its own motion. The controversy here deals only with the findings and order as modified.

[3] Respondent also produces and sells other kinds of salt, but the trade practices here involved only relate to table salt.

[4] These chain stores are American Stores Company, National Tea Company, Kroger Grocery Co., Safeway Stores, Inc., and Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company.

than wholesale purchasers from respondent could reasonably sell the same brand of salt to independently operated retail stores, many of whom competed with the local outlets of the five chain stores.

Respondent's table salts, other than Blue Label, are also sold under a quantity discount system differing slightly from that used in selling Blue Label. Sales of these other brands in less-than-carload lots are made at list price plus freight from plant to destination. Carload purchasers are granted approximately a 5 per cent discount; approximately a 10 per cent discount is granted to purchasers who buy as much as $50,000 worth of all brands of salt in any consecutive twelve-month period. Respondent's quantity discounts on Blue Label and on other table salts were enjoyed by certain wholesalers and retailers who competed with other wholesalers and retailers to whom these discounts were refused.

In addition to these standard quantity discounts, special allowances were granted certain favored customers who competed with other customers to whom they were denied.[5]

[Standard Quantity Discounts Held Discriminatory]

First. Respondent's basic contention, which it argues this case hinges upon, is that its "standard quantity discounts, available to all on equal terms, as contrasted, for example, to hidden or special rebates, allowances, prices or discounts, are not discriminatory within the meaning of the Robinson-Patman Act." Theoretically, these discounts are equally available to all, but functionally they are not. For as the record indicates (if reference to it on this point were necessary) no single independent retail grocery store, and probably no single wholesaler, bought as many as 50,000 cases or as much as $50,000 worth of table salt in one year. Furthermore, the record shows that, while certain purchasers were enjoying one or more of respondent's standard quantity discounts, some of their competitors made purchases in such small quantities that they could not qualify for any of respondent's discounts, even those based on carload shipments. The legislative history of the Robinson-Patman Act makes it abundantly clear that Congress considered it to be an evil that a large buyer could secure a competitive advantage over a small buyer solely because of the large buyer's quantity purchasing ability. The Robinson-Patman Act was passed to deprive a large buyer of such advantages except to the extent that a lower price could be justified by reason of a seller's diminished costs due to quantity manufacture, delivery or sale, or by reason of the seller's good faith effort to meet a competitor's equally low price.

Section 2 of the original Clayton Act had included a proviso that nothing contained in it should prevent "discrimination in price . . . on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation. . . ." That section has been construed as permitting quantity discounts, such as those here, without regard to the amount of the seller's actual savings in cost attributable to quantity sales or quantity deliveries. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 101 F. 2d 620. The House Committee Report on the Robinson-Patman Act considered that the Clayton Act's proviso allowing quantity discounts so weakened § 2 "as to render it inadequate, if not almost a nullity."[6] The Committee considered the present Robinson-Patman amendment to § 2 "of great importance." Its purpose was to limit "the use of quantity price differentials to the sphere of actual cost differences. Otherwise," the report continued, "such differentials would become instruments of favor and privilege and weapons of competitive oppression."[7] The Senate Committee reporting the bill emphasized the same purpose,[8] as did the Congressman in charge of the Conference Report when explaining it to the House just before final passage.[9] And it was in furtherance of this avowed purpose—to protect competition from all price differentials except those based in full on cost savings—that § 2 (a) of the amendment provided "That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered."

[5] One such customer, a wholesaler, received a special discount of 7½ cents per case on purchases of carload lots of Blue Label Salt. Respondent sold to this wholesaler at $1.42½ per case, although competing wholesalers were required to pay $1.50 per case on carload lots. The Circuit Court of Appeals held that findings of the Commission on these special allowances were supported by substantial evidence, that they were not maintained to meet lower prices of respondent's competitors, and that the allowances were discriminatory. It nevertheless set the findings aside on the ground that the Commission's finding of injury to competition from the discriminations engaged in by respondent was too general and had little evidence to support it. We think the finding and supporting evidence of injury to competition on account of these special allowances are similar to the finding and evidence with reference to the quantity discount system and need not be separately treated.

[7] Id. at 9.

The foregoing references, without regard to others which could be mentioned, establish that respondent's standard quantity discounts are discriminatory within the meaning of the Act, and are prohibited by it whenever they have the defined effect on competition. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Staley Co., 324 U. S. 746, 751.

[Burden of Proof of Justification of Price Rests on Respondent]

Second. The Government interprets the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals as having held that in order to establish "discrimination in price" under the Act the burden rested on the Commission to prove that respondent's quantity discount differentials were not justified by its cost savings.[10] Respondent does not so understand the Court of Appeals decision, and furthermore admits that no such burden rests on the Commission. We agree that it does not. First, the general rule of statutory construction that the burden of proving justification or exemption under a special exception to the prohibitions of a statute generally rests on one who claims its benefits,[11] requires that respondent undertake this proof under the proviso of § 2 (a). Secondly, § 2 (b) of the Act specifically imposes the burden of showing justification upon one who is shown to have discriminated in prices. And the Senate committee report on the bill explained that the provisos of § 2 (a) throw "upon any who claim the benefit of those exceptions the burden of showing that their case falls within them."[12] We think that the language of the Act, and the legislative history just cited, show that Congress meant by using the words "discrimination in price" in § 2 that in a case involving competitive injury between a seller's customers the Commission need only prove that a seller had charged one purchaser a higher price for like goods than he had charged one or more of the purchaser's competitors.[13] This construction is consistent with the first sentence of § 2 (a) in which it is made unlawful "to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce . . . and where the effect of such discrimination may be . . . to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: . . ."

[Actual Injury to Competition Not Essential Factor of Discrimination]

Third. It is argued that the findings fail to show that respondent's discriminatory discounts had in fact caused injury to competition. There are specific findings that such injuries had resulted from respondent's discounts although the statute does not require the Commission to find that injury has actually resulted. The statute requires no more than that the effect of the prohibited price discriminations "may be substantially to lessen competition . . . or to injure, destroy or prevent competition." After a careful consideration of this provision of the Robinson-Patman Act, we have said that "the statute does not require that the discriminations must in fact have harmed competition, but only that there is a reasonable possibility that they 'may' have such an effect." Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 324 U. S. 726, 742.[14] Here the [14] This language is to be read also in the light of the following statement in the same case, discussing the meaning of § 2 (a), as contained in the Robinson-Patman Act, in relation to § 3 of the Clayton Act:

"It is to be observed that § 2 (a) does not require a finding that the discriminations in Commission found what would appear to be obvious, that the competitive opportunities of certain merchants were injured when they had to pay respondent substantially more for their goods than their competitors had to pay. The findings are adequate.

[Commission's Findings of Injury to Competition Supported by Evidence]

Fourth. It is urged that the evidence is inadequate to support the Commission's findings of injury to competition.[15] As we have pointed out, however, the Commission is authorized by the Act to bar discriminatory prices upon the "reasonable possibility" that different prices for like goods to competing purchasers may have the defined effect on competition.[16] That respondent's quantity discounts did result in price differentials between competing purchasers sufficient in amount to influence their resale prices of salt was shown by evidence. This showing in itself is adequate to support the Commission's appropriate findings that the effect of such price discriminations "may be substantially to lessen competition . . . and to injure, destroy and prevent competition."

The adequacy of the evidence to support the Commission's findings of reasonably possible injury to competition from respondent's price differentials between competing carload and less-than-carload purchasers is singled out for special attacks here. It is suggested that in considering the adequacy of the evidence to show injury to competition respondent's carload discounts and its other quantity discounts should not be treated alike. The argument is that there is an obvious saving to a seller who delivers goods in carload lots. Assuming this to be true, that fact would not tend to disprove injury to the merchant compelled to pay the less-than-carload price. For a ten-cent carload price differential against a merchant would injure him competitively just as much as a ten-cent differential under any other name. However relevant the separate carload argument might be to the question of justifying a differential by cost savings, it has no relevancy in determining whether the differential works an injury to a competitor. Since Congress has not seen fit to give carload discounts any favored classification we cannot do so. Such discounts, like all others, can be justified by a seller who proves that the full amount of the discount is based on his actual savings in cost. The trouble with this phase of respondent's case is that it has thus far failed to make such proof.

It is also argued that respondent's less-than-carload sales are very small in comparison with the total volume of its business[17] and for that reason we should reject the Commission's finding that the effect of the carload discrimination may substantially lessen competition and may injure competition between purchasers who are granted and those who are denied this discriminatory discount. To support this argument, reference is made to the fact that salt is a small price have in fact had an adverse effect on competition. The statute is designed to reach such discriminations 'in their incipiency,' before the harm to competition is effected. It is enough that they 'may' have the prescribed effect. Cf. Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 356-357. But as was held in the Standard Fashion case, supra, with respect to the like provisions of § 3 of the Clayton Act, prohibiting tying clause agreements, the effect of which 'may be to substantially lessen competition,' the use of the word 'may' was not to prohibit discriminations having 'the mere possibility' of those consequences, but to reach those which would probably have the defined effect on competition." 324 U. S. at 738; see also United States v. Lexington Mill Co., 232 U. S. 399, 411.

The Committee Reports and Congressional debates on this provision of the Robinson-Patman Act indicate that it was intended to have a broader scope than the corresponding provision of the old Clayton Act. See note 18 infra.

[15] After discussing all of respondent's discriminations, the Commission stated: "The Commission finds that the effect of the discriminations in price, including discounts, rebates, and allowances, generally and specifically described herein may be substantially to lesson competition in the line of commerce in which the purchaser receiving the benefit of said discriminatory price is engaged and to injure, destroy, and prevent competition between those purchasers receiving the benefit of said discriminatory prices, discounts, rebates, and allowances and those to whom they are denied."

[16] The statute outlaws any discrimination the effect of which "may be substantially to lessen competition . . . or to injure . . . competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: . . ."

[17] Respondent introduced testimony and exhibits intended to show that only one-tenth of one per cent of its sales were made at less-than-carload prices. It appears that this figure relates only to a single one-year period and was obtained by lumping together statistics on respondent's sales of table salt along with those on sales of its other products, such as salt tablets, coarse rock salt, and sal soda. Since this proceeding is concerned only with discounts on table salts, these figures are of dubious value. Furthermore, they are limited to sales in respondent's Chicago area, whereas respondent carried on a nation-wide business.

item in most wholesale and retail businesses and in consumers' budgets. For several reasons we cannot accept this contention.

There are many articles in a grocery store that, considered separately, are comparatively small parts of a merchant's stock. Congress intended to protect a merchant from competitive injury attributable to discriminatory prices on any or all goods sold in interstate commerce, whether the particular goods constituted a major or minor portion of his stock. Since a grocery store consists of many comparatively small articles, there is no possible way effectively to protect a grocer from discriminatory prices except by applying the prohibitions of the Act to each individual article in the store.

Furthermore, in enacting the Robinson-Patman Act Congress was especially concerned with protecting small businesses which were unable to buy in quantities, such as the merchants here who purchased in less-than-carload lots. To this end it undertook to strengthen this very phase of the old Clayton Act. The committee reports on the Robinson-Patman Act emphasized a belief that § 2 of the Clayton Act had "been too restrictive in requiring a showing of general injury to competitive conditions. . . ." The new provision, here controlling, was intended to justify a finding of injury to competition by a showing of "injury to the competitor victimized by the discrimination".[18] Since there was evidence sufficient to show that the less-than-carload purchasers might have been handicapped in competing with the more favored carload purchasers by the differential in price established by respondent, the Commission was justified in finding that competition might have thereby been substantially lessened or have been injured within the meaning of the Act.

Apprehension is expressed in this Court that enforcement of the Commission's order against respondent's continued violations of the Robinson-Patman Act might lead respondent to raise table salt prices to its carload purchasers. Such a conceivable, though, we think, highly improbable contingency, could afford us no reason for upsetting the Commission's findings and declining to direct compliance with a statute passed by Congress.

The Commission here went much further in receiving evidence than the statute requires. It heard testimony from many witnesses in various parts of the country to show that they had suffered actual financial losses on account of respondent's discriminatory prices. Experts were offered to prove the tendency of injury from such prices. The evidence covers about two thousand pages, largely devoted to this single issue —injury to competition. It would greatly handicap effective enforcement of the Act to require testimony to show that which we believe to be self-evident, namely, that there is a "reasonable possibility" that competition may be adversely affected by a practice under which manufacturers and producers sell their goods to some customers substantially cheaper than they sell like goods to the competitors of these customers. This showing in itself is sufficient to justify our conclusion that the Commission's findings of injury to competition were adequately supported by evidence.

[Order Properly Prohibits Unlawful Practices Similar to Those Committed]

Fifth. The Circuit Court of Appeals held, and respondent here contends, that the order was too sweeping, that it required the respondent to "conduct its business generally at its peril," and that the Commission had exceeded its jurisdiction in entering such an order.[19] Reliance for this contention [18] In explaining this clause of the proposed Robinson-Patman Act, the Senate Judiciary Committee said:

"This clause represents a recommended addition to the bill as referred to your committee. It tends to exclude from the bill otherwise harmless violations of its letter, but accomplishes a substantial broadening of a similar clause now contained in section 2 of the Clayton Act. The latter has in practice been too restrictive, in requiring a showing of general injury to competitive conditions in the line of commerce concerned; whereas the more immediately important concern is in injury to the competitor victimized by the discrimination. Only through such injuries, in fact, can the larger general injury result, and to catch the weed in the seed will keep it from coming to flower." S. Rep. No. 1502, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 4. See also H. R. Rep. No. 2287, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 8; 80 Cong. Rec. 9417.

[19] The prohibiting paragraphs of the order were:

"(a) By selling such products to some wholesalers thereof at prices different from the prices charged other wholesalers who in fact compete in the sale and distribution of such products; provided, however, that this shall not prevent price differences of less than five cents per case which do not tend to lessen, injure, or destroy competition among such wholesalers.

"(b) By selling such products to some retailers thereof at prices different from the prices charged other retailers who in fact compete in chiefly rests on Labor Board v. Express Publishing Co., 312 U. S. 426. That case held that the Labor Board could not broadly enjoin violations of all the provisions of the statute merely because a single violation of one of the Act's many provisions had been found. Id. at 435-436. But it also pointed out that the Labor Board, "Having found the acts which constitute the unfair labor practice . . . is free to restrain the practice and other like or related unlawful acts." It there pointed out that this Court had applied a similar rule to a Federal Trade Commission order in Federal Trade Comm'n v. Beech-Nut Co., 257 U. S. 441, 455. In the latter case the Court not only approved restraint of the unlawful price-fixing practices found, but "any other equivalent cooperative means of accomplishing the maintenance of prices fixed by the company." See also May Dep't Stores Co. v. Labor Board, 326 U. S. 376, 392-393. We think the Commission's order here, save for the provisos in (a) and (b) later considered, is specifically aimed at the pricing practices found unlawful, and therefore does not run counter to the holding in the Express Publishing Co. case. Certainly the order in its relation to the circumstances of this case is only designed "to prevent violations, the threat of which in the future is indicated because of their similarity or relation to those unlawful acts which the Board [Commission] has found to have been committed by the . . . [respondent] in the past." Labor Board v. Express Publishing Co., supra, 436-437.

[Order Improper Insofar as it Permits Differential if it Does Not Lessen Competition]

The specific restraints of paragraphs (a) and (b) of the order are identical, except that one applies to prices respondent charges wholesalers and the other to prices charged retailers. It is seen that the first part of these paragraphs, preceding the provisos, would absolutely bar respondent from selling its table salt, regardless of quantities, to some wholesalers and retailers at a price different from that which it charged competing wholesalers and retailers for the same grade of salt. The Commission had found that respondents had been continuously engaged in such discriminations through the use of discounts, rebates and allowances. It had further found that respondent had failed to show justification for these differences by reason of a corresponding difference in its costs. Thus the restraints imposed by the Commission upon respondent are concerned with the precise unlawful practices in which it was found to have engaged for a number of years. True, the Commission did not merely prohibit future discounts, rebates, and allowances in the exact mathematical percentages previously utilized by respondent. Had the order done no more than that, respondent could have continued substantially the same unlawful practices despite the order by simply altering the discount percentages and the quantities of salt to which the percentages applied. Paragraphs (a) and (b) up to the language of the provisos are approved.

The provisos in (a) and (b) present a more difficult problem. They read: "Provided, however, that this shall not prevent price differences of less than five cents per case which do not tend to lessen, injure, or destroy competition among such wholesalers [retailers]." The first clause of the provisos, but for the second qualifying clause, would unequivocally permit respondent to maintain price differentials of less than five cents as between competing wholesalers and as between competing retailers.[20] This clause would appear to benefit respondent, and no challenge to it, standing alone, is here raised. But respondent seriously objects to the second clause of the proviso which qualifies the permissive less-than-five-cent differentials provided in the first clause. That qualification permits such differentials only if they do "not tend to lessen, injure, or destroy the sale and distribution of such products; provided, however, that this shall not prevent price differences of less than five cents per case which do not tend to lessen, injure, or destroy competition among such retailers.

"(c) By selling such products to any retailer at prices lower than prices charged wholesalers whose customers compete with such retailer.

"For the purposes of comparison, the term 'price' as used in this order takes into account discounts, rebates, allowances, and other terms and conditions of sale."

[20] The only finding of the Commission specifically relating to five-cent differentials was: "Salt is a staple commodity with a medium turnover and is generally sold by wholesalers to their retail customers on a lower margin of profit than that received on other commodities. Consequently, the price at which the wholesaler offers his table salt is usually controlling, and a difference of five cents per case may result in the loss of a sale to a customer, not only of the salt involved but of other commodities as well, the order for which might be placed with the salt purchase."

competition." Respondent points out that where a differential tends in no way to injure competition, the Act permits it. "The Commission," so respondent urges, "must either find and rule that a given differential injures competition, and then prohibit it, or it must leave that differential entirely alone." Whether, and under what circumstances, if any, the Commission might prohibit differentials which do not of themselves tend to injure competition, we need not decide, for the Commission has not in either (a) or (b) taken action which forbids such noninjurious differentials. But other objections raised to the qualifying clauses require consideration.

One of the reasons for entrusting enforcement of this Act primarily to the Commission, a body of experts, was to authorize it to hear evidence as to given differential practices and to make findings concerning possible injury to competition. Such findings are to form the basis for cease and desist orders definitely restraining the particular discriminatory practices which tend to injure competition without justification. The effective administration of the Act, insofar as the Act entrusts administration to the Commission, would be greatly impaired if, without compelling reasons not here present, the Commission's cease and desist orders did no more than shift to the courts in subsequent contempt proceedings for their violation the very fact questions of injury to competition, etc., which the Act requires the Commission to determine as the basis for its order. The enforcement responsibility of the courts, once a Commission order has become final either by lapse of time or by court approval, 15 U. S. C. §§ 21, 45, is to adjudicate questions concerning the order's violation, not questions of fact which support that valid order.

Whether on this record the Commission was compelled to exempt certain differentials of less than five cents we do not decide. But once the Commission exempted the differentials in question from its order, we are constrained to hold that as to those differentials it could not then shift to the courts a responsibility in enforcement proceedings of trying issues of possible injury to competition, issues which Congress has primarily entrusted to the Commission.

[Paragraph (c) of Commission's Order Upheld]

This leaves for consideration the objection to paragraph (c) of the order which reads: "By selling such products to any retailer at prices lower than prices charged wholesalers whose customers compete with such retailer." The only criticism here urged to (c) is that it bars respondent from selling to a retailer at a price lower than that charged a wholesaler whose customers compete with the retailer. Section 2 (a) of the Act specifically authorizes the Commission to bar discriminatory prices which tend to lessen or injure competition with "any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them." This provision plainly supports paragraph (c) of the order.

[Commission To Reconsider Provisos]

We sustain the Commission's order with the exception of the provisos in paragraphs (a) and (b) previously set out. Since the qualifying clauses constitute an important limitation to the provisos, we think the Commission should have an opportunity to reconsider the entire provisos in light of our rejection of the qualifying clauses, and to refashion these provisos as may be deemed necessary. This the Commission may do upon the present evidence and findings or it may hear other evidence and make other findings on this phase of the case, should it conclude to do so. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Royal Milling Co., 228 U. S. 212, 218.

[Judgment Reversed and Proceedings Remanded]

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed and the proceedings are remanded to that court to be disposed of in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, with whom MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting in part.

While I agree with much of the Court's opinion, I cannot accept its most significant feature, which is a new interpretation of the Robinson-Patman Act that will sanction prohibition of any discounts if "there is a reasonable possibility that they 'may' have the effect to wit: to lessen, injure, destroy" or prevent competition. [Italics supplied.] I think the law as written by the Congress and as always interpreted by this Court requires that the record show a reasonable probability of that effect. The difference, as every lawyer knows, is not unimportant and in many cases would be decisive.

The law rarely authorizes judgments on proof of mere possibilities. After careful consideration this Court has, at least three times and as late as 1945, refused to interpret these laws as doing so. In 1922, in Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, at 356, a unanimous Court, construing like language in § 3 of the Clayton Act, said: "But we do not think that the purpose in using the word 'may' was to prohibit the mere possibility of the consequences described. It was intended to prevent such agreements as would under the circumstances disclosed probably lessen competition, or create an actual tendency to monopoly."

In 1930, in International Shoe Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291, the Court said (at p. 298) with respect to identical language in § 7 of the Clayton Act: ". . . the Act deals only with such acquisitions as probably will result in lessening competition to a substantial degree, Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 357 . . ." And MR. JUSTICE STONE wrote for the dissenting justices (280 U. S. 306):

> "Nor am I able to say that the McElwain Company . . . was then in such financial straits as to preclude the reasonable inference by the Commission that its business . . . would probably continue to compete with that of petitioner. See Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 356-357."

With these interpretations on our books the Robinson-Patman Act was passed.

When the latter Act came before this Court in 1945, this same question was carefully considered and Chief Justice Stone, with the concurrence of all but two members of the Court and with no disagreement noted on this point, wrote:

> "It is to be observed that § 2 (a) does not require a finding that the discriminations in price have in fact had an adverse effect on competition. The statute is designed to reach such discriminations 'in their incipiency,' before the harm to competition is effected. It is enough that they 'may' have the prescribed effect. Cf. Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 356-357. But as was held in the Standard Fashion case, supra, with respect to the like provisions of § 3 of the Clayton Act, prohibiting tying clause agreements, the effect of which 'may be to substantially lessen competition.' the use of the word 'may' was not to prohibit discriminations having 'the mere possibility' of these consequences, but to reach those which would probably have the defined effect on competition."

Corn Products Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 324 U. S. 726, 738.

It is true that later (324 U. S. at 742) the opinion uses the language as to possibility of injury now quoted in part[1] by the Court as the holding of that case. But the phrase appears in such form and context and is so irreconcilable with the earlier careful and complete statement, set out above, that the inconsistency must appear to a fair reader as one of those inadvertencies into which the most careful judges sometimes fall. It is the only authority for making a thrice-rejected rule of interpretation a prevailing one. I know of no other instance in which this Court has ever held that administrative orders applying drastic regulation of business practices may hang on so slender a thread of inference.

The Court uses overtones of hostility to all quantity discounts, which I do not find in the Act, but they are translated into a rule which is fatal to any discount the Commission sees fit to attack. To say it is the law that the Commission may strike down any discount "upon 'the reasonable possibility' that different prices for like goods to competing purchasers may" substantially injure competition, coupled with the almost absolute subservience of judicial judgment to administrative experience, cf. Securities & Exchange Commission v. Chenery Corp., 332 U. S. 194, means that judicial review is a word of promise to the ear to be broken to the hope. The law of this case, in a nutshell, is that no quantity discount is valid if the Commission chooses to say it is not. That is not the law which Congress enacted and which this Court has uniformly stated until today.

[1] The full text of the later reference, quoted in part by the Court, is: "As we have said, the statute does not require that the discrimination must in fact have harmed competition, but only that there is a reasonable possibility that they 'may' have such an effect. We think that it was permissible for the Commission to infer that these discriminatory allowances were a substantial threat to competition."

It seems obvious that the Court's "as we have said" refers to the earlier statement that the test is "probability" which is quoted in full above, particularly in the absence of any other citation or reference.

The Robinson-Patman Act itself, insofar as it relates to quantity discounts, seems to me, on its face and in light of its history, to strive for two results, both of which should be kept in mind when interpreting it.

On the one hand, it recognizes that the quantity discount may be utilized arbitrarily and without justification in savings effected by quantity sales, to give a discriminatory advantage to large buyers over small ones. This evil it would prohibit. On the other hand, it recognizes that a business practice so old and general is not without some basis in reason, that much that we call our standard of living is due to the wide availability of low-priced goods, made possible by mass production and quantity distribution, and hence that whatever economies result from quantity transactions may, and indeed should, be passed down the line to the consumer. I think the Court's disposition of this case pretty much sanctions an obliteration of the difference between discounts which the Act would foster and those it would condemn.

It will illustrate my point to discuss only two of the discounts involved—two which the Commission and the Court lump together and treat exactly alike, but which to me require under the facts of this case quite different inferences as to their effect on competition.

In addition to a general ten-cent per case carload lot discount, there is what we may call a quota discount, by which customers who purchase 5,000 or more cases in a twelve-month period get a further rebate of 10 cents per case, while those who purchase 50,000 or more cases in such periods get an additional 5 cents per case. The application of this schedule to distribution of the table salt involved is substantially illustrated by one of the Company's exhibits, from which we find:

Cases purchased	Number customers	Discount per case
1–500	3,643	0
501–4,999	343	0
5,000–10,000	35	.10
10,000–49,999	14	.10
50,000 and over	5	.15

It thus appears that out of approximately 4,000 customers only 54 receive either of these two quota discounts in practice, and the larger one is available to only four or five major chain store organizations. The quota discounts allowed a customer are not related to any apparent difference in handling costs but are based solely on the volume of his purchases, which in turn depends largely on the volume of his sales, and these in turn are surely influenced by his lowered costs which he can reflect in his retail prices.

I agree that these facts warrant a prima facie inference of discrimination and sustain a finding of discrimination unless the Company, which best knows why and how these discounts are arrived at and which possesses all the data as to costs, comes forward with a justification. I agree, too, that the result of this system on respondent's customer list is enough to warrant the inference that the effects "may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly."

Even applying the stricter test of probability, I think the inference of adverse effect on competition is warranted by the facts as to the quota discounts. It is not merely probable but I think it is almost inevitable that the further ten-cent or fifteen-cent per case differential in net price of salt between the large number of small merchants and the small number of very large merchants, accelerates the trend of the former towards extinction and of the latter towards monopoly.

However, a very different problem is presented by the differential of 10 cents per case when delivered in carload lots. This carload price applies to various small purchasers who pool their orders to make a carload shipment and to all who pick up their orders, no matter how small, at the company warehouses which are maintained in ten cities. The evidence is that less than 1/10 of 1% of the respondent's total salt business fail to get the benefit of this carload-lot discount.

It does not seem to me that one can fairly draw the inference that competition probably is affected by the carload-lot discount. Indeed, the discount is so small in proportion to price, salt is so small an item in wholesale or retail business and in the consumer's budget that I should think it farfetched even to find it reasonably possible that competition would be substantially affected. Hence, the discount, whether more or less than the exact savings in handling, would not fall under condemnation of the statute. The incidence of this discount on customers is not arbitrarily determined by the volume of their business but depends upon an obvious difference in handling and delivery costs.

The Commission has forbidden respondent to continue this carload-lot differential. The Commission has no power to prescribe prices, so that it can order only that the differential be eliminated. Unless competitive conditions make it impossible, the respondent's self-interest would dictate that it abolish the discount and maintain the higher base price, rather than make the discount universally applicable. The result would be to raise the price of salt 10 cents per case to 99.9% of respondent's customers because 1/10 of 1% were not in a position to accept carload shipments. This is a quite different effect than the elimination of the quota discount.

It seems to me that a discount which gives a lowered cost to so large a proportion of respondent's customers and is withheld only from those whose conditions of delivery obviously impose greater handling costs, does not permit the same inferences of effect on competition as the quota discounts which reduce costs to the few only and that on a basis which ultimately is their size.

The two types of discount involved here seem to me to fall under different purposes of the Act and to require different conclusions of fact as to effect on competition. Accordingly, I should sustain the court below insofar as it sets aside the cease and desist order as to carload-lot discounts.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 29-446. April 22, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Alien Corporations—Venue—Service of Process.—Motions by six corporate defendants engaged in mining and selling diamonds, charged with violations of the antitrust laws, for an order quashing the return of the service of summons and dismissing the complaint for lack of jurisdiction and because the individuals upon whom purported service was made were not persons authorized to receive process on behalf of the corporations, are granted where it is shown that the business of defendants within the district is not of such a nature and character as to warrant the inferences that the corporations have subjected themselves to the local jurisdiction and are by their duly authorized agents present within the district where service is attempted. The maintenance of bank accounts which were used to facilitate transactions within the district which were merely incidental to the main business of defendants, the purchase of equipment, the maintenance of an office, and the carrying on of an extensive advertising campaign in the district, do not warrant a finding that defendants were "doing business" in the district so as to be liable to process. Such activities constitute the "transacting of business" but not the "doing of business". The fact that if defendants are not required to stand trial in this district the Government will not be able to bring them to trial in any other district, is unpersuasive. There is no rule which would render an alien corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Court where, under similar circumstances, jurisdiction over a domestic foreign corporation would not lie.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.391.

For plaintiff: Ephraim Jacobs, James Minicus, Special Attorneys, both of Washington, D. C.

For defendants: Cravath, Swaine & Moore; Hooker, Alley & Duncan, appearing specially; Root, Ballantine, Harlan, Bushby & Palmer, appearing specially, all of New York, N. Y.

[Facts]

HULBERT, D. J.: Six corporate defendants, hereinafter specifically designated, moved for an order quashing the return of the service of the summons herein and dismissing the complaint against each of them for lack of jurisdiction over said defendants and, further, that the individuals, upon whom purported service was made, were not persons authorized to receive process on behalf of said corporations.

This action was commenced by the filing of the complaint in the office of the Clerk of this Court on January 29, 1945. No responsive pleading has yet been interposed.

Simultaneously with the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff submitted a petition for preliminary injunction. Defendants unsuccessfully challenged the granting thereof and their petitions directly to the United States Supreme Court for certiorari presented:

(A) the propriety of review of the determination of the Court below, and

(B) the alleged excess of jurisdiction in making such decree granting the injunction.

The decree was reversed (325 U. S. 212) and this motion was then brought on.

Elaborate affidavits, depositions, briefs and exhibits have been submitted by the parties involved. The facts differ to some extent as to each defendant, but the Court will endeavor to consider the motions of the three defendants (1) De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd., (2) Diamond Corporation, Ltd., and (3) Diamond Trading Company, Ltd., together, but separately from the motions of the defendants (4) Societe Internationale Forestiere et Miniere du Congo (referred to as Forminiere), (5) Societe Miniere du Beceka (referred to as Beceka) and (6) Companhia de Diamantes de Angola (referred to as Diamang), which will be severally considered.

The defendants all are alien corporations existing under and by virtue of the laws of certain foreign countries.

[Issues Presented]

The motions present two issues:

(a) Are the defendants "found" in this district within the meaning of Section 12 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. 22), and

(b) if so, was the service of process in accordance with Rule 4d (3) or (7) F. R. C. P. (28 U. S. C. A. following Sec. 723c).

Under Sec. 12 of the Clayton Act, service of process must be made in the district in which the defendant is resident, or where it may be "found" although the venue may lie in the district where the defendant "transacts business." Eastman Kodak Company v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U. S. 359.

Whether or not a corporation is "found" within a given district is akin to the concept of whether it is "doing business." U. S. v. Scophony Corp., et al., 69 Fed. Supp. 666, probable jurisdiction noted March 10, 1947, 67 Supreme Ct. R. 972, #2,1030.*

In order that it may be said that a foreign corporation is "doing business" within a state or district so as to be subject to the service of process there "the business must be of such a nature and character as to warrant the inference that the corporation has subjected itself to the local jurisdiction, and is by its duly authorized officers or agents, present within the state or district where service is attempted." People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79.

The determination of whether a foreign corporation is "doing business" within a particular state or district depends upon the facts of the individual case. People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., supra; Roark v. American Distilling Co., 97 Fed. (2d) 297; Costello v. Lee, 43 Fed. Supp. 947.

In approaching the disposition of these motions this Court is mindful that the facts presented should be viewed as a whole in determining whether the defendants are "doing business" in this district so as to be subject to process here. United States v. United States Alkali Export Association, Inc., et al., Leibell, D. J., S. D. N. Y. Civil 24-464, decided July 16, 1946 (unreported); In Re Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum addressed to Canadian International Paper Co., et al., 72 Fed. Supp. 1013.

As to Defendants 1, 2 and 3

The Government sets up in its answering affidavit that defendant (1) De Beers, owns 80 per cent of the ordinary shares in the defendant (2) Diamond Corporation, and that the defendant (3) Diamond Trading Co., is wholly owned, jointly, by (1) De Beers and (2) Diamond Corporation.

Sir Ernest Oppenheimer is Chairman of the Board of all three and, for all intents and purposes, the personnel of the directorates present an identity for these three corporate defendants; that De Beers is engaged in the mining of diamonds; that Diamond Corporation purchases, in normal times, about 95 per cent in dollar value of the world's diamond output, of which approximately 90 per cent is ultimately exported to and disposed of in the markets of the United States; that Diamond Trading Company purchases the stock of diamonds of the Diamond Corporation and sells same to dealers, brokers and cutters.

* This case was reversed by the U. S. Supreme Ct. April 26, 1948.

It is to be noted that defendants 1, 2 and 3, take issue with respect to the aforesaid allegations as to the stock ownership of De Beers in the other two defendants and to the amount of the world's production of diamonds disposed of in the United States.

The Government's purpose in this regard, reflecting a high degree of integration existing between the three defendants, admittedly is, to emphasize that any activities which increase the sale of diamonds in the United States is of benefit to all three of said defendants.

Apparently, it is the Government's position that for the purpose of ascertaining if the three defendants are "doing business" in this district it is to be inferred that the act of any one of them, is the act of all, because of their close relationship. We are not dealing in this action with the problem of parent-subsidiary which so often arises in cases of this character. It is not contended that any one of the three defendants acted through a subsidiary located in the district.

If a parent company is found to be doing business here it does not necessarily follow that a subsidiary company is also doing business here, nor is the converse necessarily true. Cf. Schenstrom v. Continental Machines, Inc., 7 F. R. D. 434. However, this does not appear to be of particular import in the consideration of the present motion.

In support of its contention that these defendants were "doing business" in this district, the Government alleges many items or activities from which it would have the Court conclude that the defendants are here present and subject to its process. Although the Court has carefully considered all points raised by the Government, it does not feel that a discussion of each of them is essential but will endeavor to mention those upon which the Government appears to make particular point.

[Bank Accounts]

Reference is made to the maintenance by these defendants of ten bank accounts in the City of New York within six years preceding the filing of the complaint. The record as it stands does not fully disclose the exact purpose of these accounts. The complaint contains an allegation that these bank accounts were maintained for the purpose of paying for advertising, publicity, public relations work, and purchases of machinery, tools and supplies.

It appears to the Court that the items "purchases of machinery, tools and supplies" relate more particularly to the defendants 4, 5 and 6. It does appear that the bank accounts were used in connection with an exhibition which defendants 1, 2 and 3 had at the New York World's Fair in 1939 and 1940 for advertising in this country, and the expense of visits made by certain of their representatives from time to time in connection therewith. But it does not appear that these bank accounts were used as a part of the main business of said defendants; at most, they were used to facilitate transactions within the district which, in their nature, were incidental to the main business of the defendants. Cf. Fowble v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 16 Fed. (2d) 504.

[Advertising Campaign]

Much stress is laid upon an advertising and publicity campaign conducted for defendants 1, 2 and 3, by the advertising agency of N. W. Ayer & Son, Inc., from 1939 to the date of filing of the complaint in this action. Before undertaking that advertising campaign, the defendants consulted Ayer who made a survey of the diamond market in the United States and reported to De Beers on whose behalf Ayer undertook to ascertain if advertising would stimulate sales in gem diamonds and indirectly, rough diamonds. Sales of diamonds in the United States were not made by these defendants, 1, 2 and 3 directly, (except in limited instances hereinafter mentioned) but any increase in sales here would, of course, be reflected in their business abroad. It should be made clear that Ayer did not function solely on behalf of these defendants, but handled advertising for other clients; nor was it engaged in taking orders for the sale of defendants' products.

The fact that the advertising conducted in this instance was extensive and expensive hardly warrants a finding that it was "doing business." Many of our large corporations advertise in all States of the Union, yet they do not thereby "do business" in each State so as to subject themselves to suit in all States.

Under the general heading of advertising, it appears that Ayer not only bought advertising space in magazines, but it publicized diamonds by such methods as furnishing news items to newspapers and by the use of the radio and the movies. It employed a lecturer to deliver addresses on diamonds at girls' schools; it sold window displays, booklets, etc., to dealers to assist in the sale of diamonds. All this activity on the part of Ayer was nothing more than a method toward the accomplishment of the function they were engaged to perform, namely, the advertising, publicity and promotion, to attract the interest of the public in the purchase of diamonds. In some of the advertisements which were published, a price range for diamonds of various weights was quoted. Such information was included at the suggestion of Ayer after they had made their survey from which they concluded that few people had knowledge of what the retail cost of gem diamonds was. De Beers did indicate some objection to the inclusion of prices but consented to this practice upon the advice of Ayer. While the quotation of prices might have some materiality, were this action tried on the merits, the Court is not persuaded that it adds anything to the "doing business" aspect of this case.

The record reflects that Ayer rendered certain services to De Beers which were not directly connected with the advertising campaign. Such services included the rendering of reports with respect to Government price regulations, complaints made by some users of industrial diamonds, and reports showing the hours, wages and union membership of diamond cutters in the United States. Many other instances of the rendition of services to the defendants are cited, including the use from time to time of office space in Ayer's office by representatives of the defendants while in this country.

Upon careful consideration of each of these items, it is the Court's conclusion that such activities do not add up to "doing business" for it is not established that these defendants continuously conducted a substantial part of their main business here to the extent that it can be said that they were present in this jurisdiction.

[Transacting Business]

There is no question that they did "transact business" here, but that is not enough. Some few sales were made in this country to the United States Government and to private buyers. One such sale was made of certain of the diamonds which De Beers had on display at the New York World's Fair.

On pages 16 and 17 of the Government's affidavit (Minicus) verified Jan. 24, 1947, re De Beers, contention is made that sales of diamonds to dealers in the United States were effected within the United States, but this contention is met to the satisfaction of the Court by the facts stated in the affidavit of Paul J. Timbal, verified March 21, 1945.

The last point which the Court deems worthy of mention is the fact that there were in the United States from time to time certain representatives of defendants. The purpose of these visits, according to the Government, is reflected in the Minicus affidavit (supra) at pages 14 and 15. Viewing these visits in a light most favorable to the Government, it does not appear to add anything of substance against this motion.

While as it has heretofore been pointed out each case must rest upon its own facts, the following citations have, in addition to those mentioned, supra, been of assistance to the Court in reaching its decision. Shelton v. Schwartz, 43 Fed. Supp. 328; Consolidated Textile Corp. v. Gregory, 289 U. S. 85; Davega, Inc. v. Lincoln Furniture Mfg. Co., 29 Fed. (2d) 164; Hutchinson v. Chase & Gilbert, Inc., 45 Fed. (2d) 139; Hinchcliffe Motors, Inc. v. Willys-Overland Motors, Inc., 30 Fed. Supp. 580.

The Court has also considered many other cases concerning the concept of "doing business" and "transacting business" but no useful purpose would be served by specific reference to them.

The Government suggests as part of its argument, that consideration should be given to the fact that if the defendants are not required to stand trial in this district, the Government will not be able to bring them to trial in any other district. The Court cannot be influenced by any such argument. If the defendants are not "doing business" here there can be no due process and suit cannot be maintained if the Court has not acquired jurisdiction, which, in this type of action, must rest on a determination that the defendants are "found" here. There is no rule which will render an alien corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Court where, under similar circumstances, jurisdiction over a domestic foreign corporation would not lie. United States v. Scophony Corp., supra.

As to Defendant 4

Forminiere is a corporation existing by virtue of the laws of the Belgian Congo; 25 per cent of its stock is owned by American stockholders who have for years been represented on the Board of Directors of this defendant, by two members, and on the Board of Auditors, by one member.

The record does not clearly reflect the function of the two American directors, but the defendant contends they are entitled to receive information about the affairs of the corporation to effectively enable the American stockholders to protect their investment. Defendant points out that the actual management of the company takes place in Europe and that the American members of the Board of Directors have never attended such meetings. There is evidence, however, that on at least one occasion, the American members of the Board executed proxies so that they might thus be represented at a Board meeting. One of the two American directors who were members of the Board at the time this action was commenced, has since died, and hence there is no affidavit by him to reflect what his activities were as a Director. The affidavit of the other Director, Mr. Whelpley, who has since resigned as such, is before the Court, as is the deposition of Mr. Thiele, who succeeded him. Mr. Whelpley denies taking any part in the management of Forminiere or in any decision on the management of its affairs, or on the conduct of its business. He states that his becoming a Director was with the understanding that his activities would be limited to obtaining information and keeping himself advised regarding the affairs of the Company, to the extent that he deemed it necessary in the interest of the American stockholders. Mr. Thiele also denies that he rendered any services pursuant to his directorship.

Forminiere, from 1939 until January 1944, maintained a bank account in this district with the Guaranty Trust Company of New York. This account was opened and managed, and deposits made from abroad. This account, it is said, was opened as a war-time measure. The American Directors had authority to sign checks, as did Mr. Sturm, who was on the Board of Auditors, and Mr. Ball (whose activities will be discussed hereafter).

The bank was requested to send monthly statements to Mr. Ball. There is evidence that this account was used to pay for purchases of mining machinery and equipment fabricated in this country for shipment and use abroad, and for other disbursements specifically directed by the Company. Mr. Ball and Mr. Sturm aver that neither of them ever drew any checks on this account, although so authorized, but it appears that transfers from this account to Ball were made to enable him to make purchases for the defendant.

In opposition to the motion of the defendant Forminiere, the Government places great stress on the activities of Mr. Sydney H. Ball in its behalf. Mr. Ball is a geologist and mining engineer and a member of the firm of Rogers, Mayer & Ball, with offices at 26 Beaver Street, New York, within this district. For a number of years he has acted as consulting geologist for Forminiere. He supplied said Company with technical information, subscribed to technical journals for it, arranged for payments in this country to the account for Americans working for the Company abroad, and bought for the Company mining equipment and supplies.

[Maintenance of Office]

The Government contends that Forminiere maintains an office at the place of business of Mr. Ball and pays part of the office expenses of Mr. Ball, and that Mr. Ball uses stationery which bears the name of this defendant across the top; that Mr. Ball is authorized to draw on an account in the Chase National Bank, in this district, opened in 1910, which account bears the name "S. H. Ball, Consulting Geologist, Forminiere," the funds of said account being supplied by the defendant. It is established that payment of the purchases made by Mr. Ball for the Company are paid out of this account as is his fee and the expenses which the Company pays in connection with the functions rendered by Mr. Ball's office for the defendant.

The Government invites the attention of the Court to the reference made by the defendant to "Forminiere office New York" but even the maintenance of an office in and of itself does not establish that the defendant is "doing business" here. The record clearly shows that Ball made substantial purchases for this defendant. It is likewise clear that the volume of purchases was influenced by the existence of World War II.

The foregoing circumstances prompted the Court to suggest the desirability of a reference to a Special Master (hereinafter more particularly mentioned).

As heretofore indicated, the cases on the subject of "doing business" are, at most, guide posts.

> "It is quite impossible to establish any rule from the decided cases; we must step from tuft to tuft across the morass." Hutchinson v. Chase & Gilbert, supra.

Absent the element of purchasing, the activities of this defendant would certainly not establish "doing business." When the purchasing element is considered along with the other activities of said defendant, a stronger argument is presented in support of the Government's position, but it is not strong enough. True, the buying of equipment and supplies in this country must have been a great aid in the functioning of this defendant and perhaps was necessary to its successful operation, but it seems unreasonable, even upon the facts presented, to say that it is present here to such an extent that it has subjected itself to the jurisdiction of this Court. The defendant was engaged in the mining of diamonds, an activity performed wholly without this country. Apparently its operations were conducted on a large scale. It seems entirely logical that it would turn to the United States to acquire equipment in view of world conditions at that time.

In viewing all the facts presented concerning the activities of the defendant within this district, the Court is forced to the conclusion that the defendant is not "doing business" or "found" here.

As to Defendant 5

With respect to the defendant Beceka, the facts presented do not in the opinion of this Court show that it was "doing business" here.

Beceka and Forminiere are associated companies. Purchases on behalf of Beceka were made by Mr. Ball through Forminiere. It appears that Mr. Ball in purchasing for Beceka arranged for priorities and export licenses and handled shipping arrangements. The overall picture of the activities of Beceka in this district does not warrant more than a conclusion that it transacted business in this district which, as heretofore indicated, is not enough to subject it to suit here.

As to Defendant 6

The activities of the defendant Diamang in this jurisdiction are substantially of the same general character as those of the defendants Forminiere and Beceka. No useful purpose would be served by a detailed listing of such activities which, when considered as a whole, spell out the "transacting of business" but not the "doing of business" and the net result is the same as reached in the preceding cases.

In conclusion it must be emphasized that the disposition of these motions has not been accomplished with ease. The Court has endeavored to view realistically the facts presented. As previously stated, after argument, it proposed a reference to a Special Master to hear and report, but counsel for the Government declared that no appropriation existed and hence, consent on its behalf thereto, was unauthorized, but, he suggested, that if the disposition of the case were held in abeyance until after the first of July, 1947, an appropriation might be made available. However, it was not.

In the meantime the writer became ill. In October he was hospitalized and after his discharge two months later, was still unable to resume his duties until recently, and records that his determination has been reached with less personal satisfaction than if the affiants had been required to appear before a Special Master and subjected to examination and cross examination.

This prompts me to refer to the case of Pickthall v. Anaconda Mining Co., et al., S. D. N. Y., Oct. 3, 1947 (unreported) cited by the Government, where it was held that the functions of officers and directors of one of the defendants were sufficient to subject it to suit in this jurisdiction.

I have again looked into this question and do not feel at all able to analyze and compare the facts in the case cited and the case at bar without some further elucidation not disclosed by the record before me.

[Motions Granted]

The motions of the several defendants must be granted.

[¶ 62,249] The Newark Evening News Publishing Company v. King Features Syndicate, Inc., The Hearst Corporation, and Hearst Consolidated Publications, Inc.

In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. Civil Action No. 10627. January 27, 1948.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Motion for Summary Judgment—Conspiracy to Restrain Trade—Facts Insufficient to Support Summary Judgment.—In a civil action brought under the Clayton Act by a newspaper publishing company against the owner and exclusive distributor of certain copyrighted comic strips and the publisher of another newspaper, alleging a combination and conspiracy to restrain trade, in violation of the antitrust laws, a motion by plaintiff for summary judgment is denied where the facts established, together with all the inferences of which they are reasonably susceptible, are not sufficient to support a summary judgment. Where it appears from the record that there is a genuine issue of fact, the court is without jurisdiction to enter a summary judgment. Defendants deny that the combination violates the antitrust laws, that it will restrain interstate commerce, and that plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury. A judgment on the issues raised by these denials can be had only upon a trial of the action on the merits.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2036.76.

[Nature of Action]

SMITH, D. J.: This is a civil action under Section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. 26. The plaintiff's claim to injunctive relief is predicated upon the charge that the defendants, in violation of Section 3 of the said Act, 15 U. S. C. A. 14, and Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. 1, and pursuant to and in furtherance of an unlawful conspiracy, "combined with other persons, known and unknown to the plaintiff, to restrain trade and commerce among several states" to the irreparable injury of the plaintiff, "its readers, its advertisers and the public." This charge is denied by the defendants, who assert a lawful right to pursue the business policy of which the plaintiff complains. An extensive recital of the allegations of the respective pleadings is unnecessary to the determination of the questions here presented.

[Motion for Summary Judgment]

The action is before the Court at this time on a motion for summary judgment filed by the plaintiff pursuant to Rule 56 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., foll. Sec. 723 (c), and is submitted on the pleadings, affidavits and accompanying exhibits, and admissions. This record, although voluminous, will not support a determination that "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact," a prerequisite to the entry of summary judgment under the said rule.

Facts

I.

The Newark Evening News Publishing Company, hereinafter identified as the News, is the owner and publisher of a daily newspaper, which is sold and distributed in both intrastate and interstate commerce, to wit, in the states of New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and other states. There is no evidence, however, as to the magnitude of the newspaper's sales in interstate commerce.

II.

Prior to 1943, when it was merged with the Hearst Corporation (the present defendant),[1] King Features Syndicate, Inc., hereinafter identified as the Syndicate, was the owner and exclusive distributor of certain comic strips which were copyrighted under the laws of the United States, 17 U. S. C. A. 1, et seq. These comic strips were sold and distributed in interstate commerce.

III.

The News and the Syndicate entered into an agreement, dated September 18, 1937, under which the former acquired the right to use and publish two comic strips, to wit, "Bringing Up Father" and "Blondie," daily for a period of one year. A similar agreement covering other comic strips was made between the same parties on November 12, 1941. These contracts were self-renewable but subject to termination by either party upon notice to the other. The comic strips have been exploited and published continuously in the daily newspaper of the News since the agreements were made.

[1] King Features Syndicate, Inc., was successively the wholly owned subsidiary of Newspaper Feature Service, Inc., the Star Holding Corporation, and the Hearst Corporation. It should be noted, however, that the last corporation is not the defendant in the present action.

IV.

The Syndicate was merged with the Hearst Corporation in December of 1943, and the latter acquired all the right, title and interest of the former in and to the copyrighted comic strips. The Hearst Corporation organized a new corporation "King Features Syndicate, Inc.," hereinafter identified as King. Contemporaneously King and the Hearst Corporation entered into an agreement under which the latter assigned its right, title and interest in and to the copyrighted comic strips to the former, and the former granted to the latter the exclusive right and license to sell and distribute the copyrighted comic strips throughout the world, reserving to itself its property in the copyrighted comic strips and the right to use and publish them in comic books.

V.

Thereafter the Hearst Corporation assumed the agreements between the News and the Syndicate and fulfilled the obligations thereunder continuously until June 19, 1947, when it gave notice to the News of its intention to terminate the earlier agreement as of October 4, 1947 and the later agreement as of January 1, 1948. The termination of these agreements was prompted by the proposed plan of the Hearst Corporation to grant to the Hearst Consolidated Publications, Inc., a subsidiary of the Hearst Corporation, publisher of the New York Journal-American, the exclusive right to use and publish the copyrighted comic strips in the metropolitan area.

Discussion

The only facts clearly beyond dispute are those herein summarized. These facts, together with all the inferences of which they are reasonably susceptible, are not sufficient to support a summary judgment. The defendants deny: first, that the combination violates the Clayton and Sherman Acts; second, that the combination will effect an unreasonable restraint on interstate commerce; and third, that the plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury. It is our opinion that a judgment on the issues raised by these denials can be had only upon a trial of the action on the merits. The present record, although not completely devoid of any evidence on these issues, leaves much to be desired.

Rule 56 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, supra, does not vest in the court the jurisdiction to summarily try the factual issues on the pleadings and affidavits of the parties, but vests in the court the limited authority to enter summary judgment only if it clearly appears from the record that "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." The complete absence of any genuine issue of fact must be apparent and all doubts thereon must be resolved against the moving party. Fishman v. Teter, 133 F. 2d 222; Toebelman v. Missouri-Kansas Pipe Line Co., 130 F. 2d 1016; McElwain v. Wickwire Spencer Steel Co., 126 F. 2d 210; Miller v. Miller, 122 F. 2d 209; Whitaker v. Coleman, 115 F. 2d 305; see also Sarnoff v. Ciaglia, — F. 2d, recently decided by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. If it appears from the record that there is a genuine issue of fact, even though it may relate only to the credibility and the weight of the testimony, the court is without jurisdiction to enter summary judgment. Sartor v. Arkansas Gas Corp,. 321 U. S. 620; Arnstein v. Porter, 154 F. 2d 464.

Conclusion

The motion for summary judgment will be denied. It is suggested, however, that the facts herein summarized may be embodied in a pretrial order as though a pretrial conference had been had under Rule 16 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

[¶ 62,250] National Pressure Cooker Company v. Philip Klein, trading as Phil's Distributors.

In the Court of Chancery of the State of Delaware, in and for New Castle County. February 9, 1948.

Delaware Fair Trade Act

Unfair Competition—Bill to Enjoin—Demurrer.—In an action by a Wisconsin corporation engaged in the manufacture of pressure cookers to enjoin the violation of the Delaware Fair Trade Act by a retailer of plaintiff's products, a demurrer to the bill on the ground that the title of the Act is misleading, and therefore violates the Delaware constitution, is overruled. The contention that the reasonable inference from the phrase "through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices, and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed" is that the Act applies only to persons who contract with manufacturers, and that Section 6 of the Act, which specifically includes non-contracting dealers, is more comprehensive, is rejected. It is held that that part of the title relied on by defendant as being more restricted than Section 6 is reasonably capable of the construction that it is merely descriptive of the method by which retail prices are to be established and the general intent of the Act carried out.

See the Delaware Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8124; and Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7134.

For plaintiff: David F. Anderson, of Southerland, Berl & Potter, Wilmington, Del.

For defendant: F. William Carr, of the office of Killoran & Van Brunt, Wilmington, Del.

[Nature of Action]

HARRINGTON, CHANCELLOR: The plaintiff's action is based on Chapter 201, Volume 43, Laws of Delaware, known as the Fair Trade Act, and the defendant has demurred to the bill.

National Pressure Cooker Company alleges that it is engaged in the manufacture of pressure cookers and other articles which are marketed and sold at retail to the consumer under certain brand or trade names; that the plaintiff company has spent large sums of money to advertise and promote the sale of its products under such names (specified in the bill); that, pursuant to the Delaware statute, fair trade agreements were made between the plaintiff company and a large number of retailers in this State which are still in effect and by which certain minimum resale prices were established in Delaware for the plaintiff's products, bearing brand or trade names, and a copy of such contracts, together with a list of the prices established, is attached to the bill; that the defendant, Philip Klein, trading as Phil's Distributors, at a specified place in the City of Wilmington, was fully advised of such agreements and of the price list in force and effect in the State of Delaware, but has sold, or offered to sell, the plaintiff's products bearing its brand or trade names, at prices below the minimum retail prices so established, and unless restrained by this court will continue to do so.

National Pressure Cooker Company seeks to enjoin the defendant from selling or offering to sell plaintiff's products of the kind described in the bill at prices less than those established in this State.

It appears from the bill that the defendant had not entered into a fair trade agreement with the plaintiff.

[Fair Trade Act]

Chapter 201, Volume 43, Laws of Delaware is entitled: "An Act To protect trademark owners, producers, distributors and the general public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of competitive commodities bearing a distinguishing trademark, brand or name, through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices, and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed."

Section 6 (which is set out in the bill) and on which the action is based, provides:

"Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or selling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this Act, whether the person so advertising offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby."

[Constitution]

Section 16, Article XI of the Constitution of 1897 provides:

"No bill or joint resolution, except bills appropriating money for public purposes, shall embrace more than one subject which shall be expressed in its title."

[Demurrer]

As we have seen, Klein, the defendant, did not enter into a fair trade agreement with National Pressure Cooker Company, the plaintiff, and under his demurrer claims that in view of the provisions of Section 6 of the Act the title is misleading, and therefore violates the constitutional provision above quoted. He does not attack the Act on any other ground. That part of the title relied on as being misleading as to the scope of the Act is the phrase "through the use of voluntary contracts establishing minimum resale prices, and providing for refusal to sell unless such minimum resale prices are observed." Klein claims that the reasonable inference from that language is that the Act only applies to persons who make contracts establishing retail sale prices with the manufacturers or distributors of commodities bearing trade-mark or brand names, while Section 6 is more comprehensive.

[Purpose of Constitutional Provision]

The conclusion in each case necessarily depends upon the particular statute and title involved, but the purpose of Section 16, Article XI of the Constitution is to prevent deception by provisions of which the title gives no intimation. Wilmington Trust Co. v. Highfield, 4 W. W. Harr. (34 Del.) 394; Monaghan v. Lewis, 5 Penn. 218. The title of an Act must, therefore, "be sufficiently comprehensive to give * * * fair and reasonable notice of the subject matter of the legislation proposed." State v. Ferschke, 2 Boyce 477. But it need not be an index of the provisions of the bill or a synopsis of the means by which its object is to be accomplished. State v. Emerson, 1 Terry 233; State v. Grier, 4 Boyce 322; In re Cypress Farms Ditch Co., 7 W. W. Harr. (37 Del.) 71; 1 Cooley Const. Lim. § 297, note. Moreover, the courts are disposed to construe Section 16, Article XI liberally, and where reasonably "possible, it should be so construed as to uphold, rather than to destroy, legislation." Wilmington Trust Co. v. Highfield, supra; Monaghan v. Lewis, supra. It is, therefore, sufficient "if the title is so framed as to apprize those interested in the subject matter of legislation as reasonably to lead to inquiry into the body of the bill." State v. Emerson, supra.

In Clendaniel v. Conrad, 3 Boyce 549, the court said:

> "If the provisions of the Act, relating directly or indirectly to the same subject, are naturally connected and are not foreign to the subject expressed in the title, they will not be held unconstitutional * * *"

The court also said the constitutional provision

> "* * * is not violated by any Act having various details properly pertinent and germane to one general subject."

In other words, if the title is such as to fairly disclose the general character of the enactment, it is usually sufficient. 1 Cooley Constit. Lim. § 297, note. These principles are "but a particular application to the constitutional provision in question of the general principle * * * that every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of legislative enactment and that they should not be declared invalid unless their invalidity is beyond doubt." Wilmington Trust Co. v. Highfield, supra.

[Title of Act Not Misleading]

Section 1 of the so-called "Fair Trade Act" defines certain terms. Section 2 provides that no contract, relating to the sale or resale of a commodity, which bears the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer or distributor, shall be deemed in violation of any law of Delaware by reason of provisions under which the seller requires the buyer not to sell at less than minimum prices established by the seller. Section 3 provides that "for the purpose of preventing evasion of the resale price restrictions imposed in respect to any commodity by any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this Act," certain specified practices, such as combination sales, shall be deemed a violation of such resale price restrictions. Section 4 provides that the minimum resale price may be fixed only by the owner or distributor specifically authorized by the owner of the trade-mark, brand or name. Section 5 exempts certain resales which otherwise would be covered by a contract entered into under the Act. Section 6 has already been quoted. Section 7 provides that the Act shall not apply to contracts between purchasers. Section 8 contains the usual severability clause. Section 9 repeals inconsistent Acts, and Section 10 gives the popular name of the Act. Its apparent intent is to protect the owners of trade-marks or trade or brand names from practices regarded by the legislature as unfair business competition, and Section 6 is consistent with that general purpose. Nor do I think the title is misleading, though some persons may not enter into the contemplated trade agreements. Applying the principles above stated, that part of the title relied on by the defendant as being more restricted than Section 6 is reasonably capable of the construction that it is merely descriptive of the method by which retail prices are to be established and the general intent of the Act carried out.

The Maryland Court of Appeals reached the same conclusion, though other reasons for sustaining the title of the Act were also relied on. Goldsmith v. Mead Johnson & Co., 176 Md. 682. A different conclusion was reached in Bristol-Myers v. Webb's Cut Rate Co., Inc., 137 Fla. 508; but the rule adopted by the Maryland court seems more consistent with established principles. State v. Emerson, 1 Terry (40 Del.) 233, relied on by the defendant, is not inconsistent with this conclusion.

[Demurrer Overruled]

The defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's bill is overruled, and an order will be entered accordingly.

In the Supreme Court of the United States. No. 75. October Term, 1947. May 10, 1948.

On writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Restraint of Interstate Commerce—Agreements Among Refiners to Pay Uniform Price—Complaint Improperly Dismissed.—A complaint alleging a combination and conspiracy among California sugar refiners, who control the supply of sugar beet seed and the market for sugar beets in that area, to violate the Sherman Act by agreeing among themselves to pay a uniform price for sugar beets grown in California, such price being computed on the basis of average net returns of all of the refiners rather than the separate returns of the purchasing refiner, states a cause of action arising under the Sherman Act.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.125, 1640.621.

Interstate Commerce—Total Economic Process.—The growing and refining of sugar beets wholly within a state, for distribution and sale in interstate commerce, may have a real and substantial effect upon interstate commerce. The artificial separation of "production" and "manufacturing" from "commerce" without regard to their economic continuity, the effects of the former two upon the latter, and the varying methods by which the several processes are organized, related and carried on in different industries or within a single industry, no longer suffices to put either production or manufacturing and refining processes beyond reach of Congressional authority or of the Sherman Act. Given a restraint of the type forbidden by the Act, though arising in the course of intrastate or local activities, and a showing of actual or threatened effect upon interstate commerce, the vital question becomes whether the effect is sufficiently substantial and adverse to the policy of the Act to constitute a forbidden consequence. If so, the restraint must fall. The dissenting opinion states that since the amended complaint failed to allege that the cost of the sugar which moved in interstate commerce was affected, no cause of action was stated.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.188.

Change in Form of Commodity—Effect upon Interstate Commerce.—A mere change in the form of the commodity does not defeat application of the Act to practices occurring either during the changing processes or before they begin, when they have the effects forbidden by the Act. The mere fact that the price fixing related directly to the unrefined beets did not sever or render insubstantial its effect subsequently in the sale of sugar.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.125.

Lessening of Competition—Creation of Monopoly.—The alleged agreements had the effect of rendering the price received by the grower devoid of all competitive influence in amount, and of reducing competition in the interstate distribution of sugar. By their agreement the combination of refiners acquired a monopoly of raw material, and, thereby, control of the quantity of sugar sold and shipped from that area.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.485.

Injury to Petitioners—Treble Damages.—The test of the legality and immunity of the combination is whether the policy of the Act has been violated in a manner to produce the general consequences it forbids for the public and the special consequences for particular individuals essential to the recovery of treble damages. Both types of injury are present in this case: the restraints on the public interest in the interstate sale of sugar; and special injuries affecting the petitioners resulting from those effects as well as from the immediate operation of the uniform price arrangement itself.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.351.

Reversing and remanding the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 159 Fed. (2d) 71, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,527.

For petitioners: Guy Richards Crump, Los Angeles, Calif.

For respondent: Louis W. Myers, Pierce Works, Los Angeles, Calif.; O'Melveny & Myers, John Whyte, of counsel.

MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Facts of Case]

The action is for treble damages incurred by virtue of alleged violation of the Sherman Act, §§ 1 and 2. 26 Stat. 209, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, 7, 15. The case comes here on certiorari, 331 U. S. 800, from affirmance by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 159 F. 2d 71, of a judgment of the District Court, 64 F. Supp. 265. That judgment dismissed the amended complaint as insufficient to state a cause of action arising under the Act. In this posture of the case, the legal issues are to be determined upon the allegations of the amended complaint.[1]

The main question is whether, in the circumstances pleaded, California sugar refiners who sell sugar in interstate commerce may agree among themselves to pay a uniform price for sugar beets grown in California without incurring liability to the local beetgrowers under the Act. Narrowly the question is whether the refiners' agreement together with the allegations made concerning its effects shows a conspiracy to monopolize and to restrain interstate trade and commerce or one thus affecting only purely local trade and commerce.

The material facts pleaded, which stand admitted as if they had been proved for the purposes of this proceeding, may be summarized as follows: Petitioners' farms are located in northern California, within the area lying north of the thirty-sixth parallel. The only practical market available to beet growers in that area was sale to one of three refiners.[2] Respondent was one of these. Each season growers contract with one of the refiners to grow beets and to sell their entire crops to the refiner under standard form contracts drawn by it. Since prior to 1939 petitioners have thus contracted with respondent.

The refiners control the supply of sugar beet seed. Both by virtue of this fact and by the terms of the contracts, the farmers are required to buy seed from the refiner. The seed can be planted only on land specifically covered by the contract. Any excess must be returned to the refiner in good order at the end of the planting season.

[1] The original complaint contained three counts, the first alleging violations of the Sherman Act and the second and third charging breach of contracts made in 1940 and 1941 respectively. In order to expedite decision and review upon the Sherman Act contention, by stipulation the amended complaint was filed setting forth, with an amendment to be noted, see note 5, only the allegations of the Sherman Act count. The stipulation provided for following this course without prejudice to further assertion by petitioners of rights under the two contract counts within a specified period following final determination of the Sherman Act issues.

[2] It was alleged that the beets, when harvested, are "bulky and semi-perishable and incapable of being transported over long distances or of being stored cheaply or safely for any extended period . . . when ripe, deteriorated rapidly if kept in the ground and not harvested, and it was necessary to harvest them promptly when matured."

There were also allegations that initial outlay, annual upkeep and operating expenses, and time required for erecting and equipping a refinery, were so great that no competition from any new refinery could be expected short of two years at best; that the three refiners had a monopoly in the area of the supply of seeds and of refining; and that no grower in the region could sell beets at a profit except to one of the three refiners.

The standard contract gives the refiner the right to supervise the planting, cultivation, irrigation and harvesting of the beets, including the right to ascertain quality during growing and harvesting seasons by sampling and polarizing. Before delivering beets to the company, the farmers must make preliminary preparations for processing them into raw sugar.[3] The refiner has the option to reject beets if the contract conditions are not complied with and if the beets are not suitable in its judgment for the manufacture of sugar.

Prior to 1939 the contract fixed the grower's price by a formula combining two variables, a percentage of the refiner's net returns per hundred pounds from sales of sugar and the sugar content of the individual grower's beets determined according to the refiner's test.[4]

Sometime before the 1939 season the three refiners entered into an agreement to pay uniform prices for sugar beets. The mechanics of the price-fixing arrangement were simple. The refiners adopted identical form contracts and began to compute beet prices on the basis of the average net returns of all three rather than the separate returns of the purchasing refiner. Inevitably all would pay the same price for beets of the same quality.

Since the refiners controlled the seed supply and the only practical market for beets grown in northern California, when the new contracts were offered to the farmers, they had the choice of either signing or abandoning sugar beet farming. Petitioners accordingly contracted with respondent under this plan during the 1939, 1940 and 1941 seasons. The plan was discontinued after the 1941 season. Because beet prices were determined for the three seasons with reference to the combined returns of the three refiners, the prices received by petitioners for those seasons were lower than if respondent, the most efficient of the three, had based its prices on its separate returns.

The foregoing allegations set forth the essential features of the contractual arrangements between the refiners and the growers and of the agreement among the refiners themselves. Other allegations were made to complete the showing of violation and injury. They relate specifically to the peculiarly integrated character of the industry, effects of the arrangements upon interstate commerce, and the relation between the violations charged and the injuries suffered by petitioners.

With reference to the industry in general. it was stated that sugar beets were grown during the seasons 1938 to 1942 on large acreages not only in northern California but also in Utah, Colorado, Michigan, Idaho, Illinois and other states. The crops so grown, when harvested, were not "sold in central markets as were potatoes, onions, corn, grain, fruit and berries, but were produced by growers under contract with manufacturers or processors and immediately upon being harvested were delivered to these manufacturers and taken to their beet sugar refineries where the sugar beets were manufactured by an elaborate process into raw sugar by the said manufacturers, who thereafter sold the resulting sugar in interstate commerce." Then follow the allegations summarized above in note 2 concerning the bulky and semi-perishable nature of sugar beets, the impossibility of transporting them over long distances or of storing them cheaply or safely, their rapid deterioration when ripe, and the necessity for prompt harvesting and marketing. These allegations must be taken as intended and effective to put the agreements complained of in the general setting of the industry's unique structure and special mode of operation.

The specific allegation is added that the sugar manufactured by respondent and the other northern California refiners from beets grown in the region "was, during all of said period [1938 to 1942], sold in interstate commerce throughout the United States."

By way of legal as well as ultimate factual conclusions the amended complaint charged that respondent had unlawfully conspired with the other northern California refiners to "monopolize and restrain trade and commerce[5] among the several states and to unlawfully fix prices to be paid the growers . . . all in violation of the anti-trust laws . . ."; and that each refiner no longer competed against the others as to the price to be paid the growers, but paid the same price on the agreed uniform basis of average net returns.

[3] These include cutting off the beet tops, trimming the crowns in a specified way, and removing all foreign substances likely to interfere with factory work.

[4] Net returns from sugar sales were measured by gross sales price less selling expenses directly applicable to sugar. Monthly settlements were made for beets delivered during the preceding month on the estimated net returns of the refiner. But final settlement had to be deferred until the end of the season when net returns could be accurately determined.

There were further charges that prior to 1939 the northern California refiners had "competed in interstate commerce with each other as to the performance, ability and efficiency of their manufacturing, sales and executive departments, and each strove to increase sales return and decrease expenses," with the result that for 1938 respondent secured substantially greater "net gross receipts of sales of sugar" than the other refiners. These in turn were reflected in the payment of 29½ to 52½ cents per ton more to petitioners and other growers dealing with respondent than was paid by the other refiners to their growers.

However, for the seasons 1939, 1940 and 1941, under the new uniform contracts and prices, "there was no longer any such competition . . ." Instead it was alleged upon information and belief that, as a result of the alleged conspiracy, respondent did not conduct its interstate operations as carefully and efficiently as previously or "as it would have had said conspiracy not existed." In consequence, respondent received less in sales returns for raw sugar and incurred greater expenses than if competition had been free, and petitioners "did not receive the reasonable value of their sugar beets."

Further charges were that as "a direct, expected and planned result of said conspiracy, the free and natural flow of commerce in interstate trade was intentionally hindered and obstructed," so that instead of the refiners "producing and selling raw sugar in interstate commerce . . . in competition with each other . . . they became illegally associated in a common plan wherein they pooled their receipts and expenses and frustrated the free enterprise system . . ."; all incentive to efficiency, economy and individual enterprise disappeared; and the refiners operated, "in so far as the growers were concerned," as if they were one corporation owning and controlling all factories in the area, but with three completely separated overheads and with none of the efficiency that consolidation into one corporation might bring.[6]

We are not concerned presently with the allegations relating to the injuries and amounts of damages inflicted upon petitioners,[7] except to say that they are sufficient to present those questions for support by proof, if the allegations made to show a cause of action arising under the statute are sufficient for that purpose.

In our judgment the amended complaint states a cause of action arising under the Sherman Act, §§ 1 and 2, and the complaint was improperly dismissed.

[Growing, Refining and Distribution Integrated]

I.

Broadly petitioners regard the entire sequence of growing the beets, refining them into sugar and distributing it, under the arrangements set forth, as a chain of events so integrated and taking place in interstate commerce or in such close and intimate connection with it that, for purposes of applying the Sherman Act, the complete sequence is an entirety and no part of it can be segregated from the remainder so as to put it beyond the statute's grasp.

[5] At this point the words "in sugar and sugar beets" appeared in the original complaint. They were stricken from the amended complaint by petitioner's counsel prior to dismissal of that complaint. Cf. note 1. This change however did not affect numerous other allegations remaining in the amended complaint concerning the combination's restrictive and monopolistic effects upon interstate trade in sugar. See note 6 and text; also note 24 and text Part IV infra.

[6] Paragraph XIX of the amended complaint summarized petitioners' conclusions as follows: "By reason of the foregoing acts of the defendant and its said conspirators, interstate commerce in sugar was illegally restrained, competition therein was not only substantially lessened but was destroyed, the price of sugar beets was illegally fixed, and an illegal monopoly was established, all in violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States, to the damage of plaintiffs as aforesaid." (Italics added.) Cf. notes 5 and 24.

[7] It is not clear whether damages were to be measured by the difference between the prices actually paid and those that would have been paid if based on respondent's separate returns, or by the difference between the prices paid and the prices set by the Secretary of Agriculture, pursuant to the Sugar Act of 1937, 50 Stat. 910, 7 U. S. C. § 1131 (d); see 5 Fed. Reg. 5231. But that is an issue that need not concern us now. Petitioner Mandeville Island Farms prayed judgment for $315,043.80; petitioner Zuckerman for $112,192.14.

Respondent, on the contrary, broadly severs the phase or phases of growing and selling beets from the later ones of refining them and of marketing the sugar. The initial growing process together with sale of the beets, and it would seem also the intermediate stage of refining, are taken to be "purely local," since all occurred entirely within California; therefore were wholly intrastate events; and consequently were beyond the Sherman Act's reach.

Connected with this severance is the assertion that the complaint alleges no monopolistic or restrictive effects upon interstate commerce, but only such effects in the intrastate phases of the industry.

Much stress is laid upon the so-called interruption of the sequence at the refining stage. Prior to the interruption only beets are involved, afterward only sugar. Since the two commodities are different and all that affects the beets takes place in California, including the restraints alleged upon their sale, the trade and commerce in beets is wholly distinct from that in sugar and is entirely local, as are therefore the restraint and monopolization of that trade. Admittedly once the beets are converted into sugar and the sugar starts on its interstate journey to the tables of the nation, interstate commerce becomes involved. But only then is it affected, and nothing occurring before the journey begins or at any rate before the beets become sugar substantially affects or, for purposes of the statute's application, has relevance to that commerce.

Thus sugar together with its interstate sale and transportation is absolutely divorced from sugar beets, their production, sale and delivery to the refiner. Manufacture breaks the relationship and with it all consequences growing out of the restraints for the interstate processes and the purposes of the statute. In other words, since the restraints precede the interstate marketing of the sugar and immediately affect only the local marketing of the beets, they have no restrictive effect upon the trade and commerce in sugar.

This very nearly denies that sugar beets contain sugar. It certainly denies that the price of beets and restrictions upon it have any substantial relation in fact or in legal significance for the statute's purposes to the price of sugar sold interstate, when the restrictions take place within the confines of a single state and before the interstate marketing process begins.

[Interstate Commerce Involved]

II.

The broad form of respondent's argument cannot be accepted. It is a reversion to conceptions formerly held but no longer effective to restrict either Congress' power, Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S. 111, or the scope of the Sherman Act's coverage. The artificial and mechanical separation of "production" and "manufacturing" from "commerce," without regard to their economic continuity, the effects of the former two upon the latter, and the varying methods by which the several processes are organized, related and carried on in different industries or indeed within a single industry, no longer suffices to put either production or manufacturing and refining processes beyond reach of Congress' authority or of the statute.

It is true that the first decision under the Sherman Act applied those mechanical distinctions with substantially nullifying effects for coverage both of the power and of the Act. United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1. Like this one, that case involved the refining and interstate distribution of sugar. But because the refining was done wholly within a single state, the case was held to be one involving "primarily" only "production" or "manufacturing," although the vast part of the sugar produced was sold and shipper interstate,[8] and this was the main end of the enterprise. The interstate distributing phase, however, was regarded as being only "incidentally," "indirectly," or "remotely" involved; and to be "incidental," "indirect," or "remote" was to be, under the prevailing climate, beyond Congress' power to regulate, and hence outside the scope of the Sherman Act. See Wickard v. Filburn, supra, at 119 et seq.

[8] It has been previously noted here that the Court applied these labels as a heritage from prior decisions under the commerce clause, dealing not as the Knight case with an act or acts of Congress, but with the validity of state statutes, Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S. 111, 121; United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., 322 U. S. 533, 543-545, an approach reflecting Marshall's idea of the mutual exclusiveness of state and national power in this area and ignoring the later evolution of different conceptions in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299. See Prudential Ins. Co. v. Benjamin, 328 U. S. 408, 412-427.

The Knight decision made the statute a dead letter for more than a decade and, had its full force remained unmodified, the Act today would be a weak instrument, as would also the power of Congress, to reach evils in all the vast operations of our gigantic national industrial system antecedent to interstate sale and transportation of manufactured products. Indeed, it and succeeding decisions, embracing the same artificially drawn lines, produced a series of consequences for the exercise of national power over industry conducted on a national scale which the evolving nature of our industrialism foredoomed to reversal.[9]

We do not stop to review again in detail the familiar story of the progression of decision to that end, perhaps not told elsewhere more succinctly or pertinently than in Wickard v. Filburn, supra.[10] Suffice it to say that after coming back to life again in the Northern Securities case, 193 U. S. 197, for matters of transportation, the Sherman Act received a second rebirth in 1911 with the decisions in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, and United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106. Cf. United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., 322 U. S. 533, 553 et seq.

Not thereafter could it be foretold with assurance that application of the labels of "production" and "manufacture," "incidental" and "indirect," would throw protective covering over those processes against the Act's consequences. Very soon also came the Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 342, again in the field of transportation, but inevitably to add force and scope to the Standard Oil and American Tobacco rulings that manufacturing companies lay within the reach of the power and of the statute, deriving no immunity for their conduct violative of the prohibitions merely from the fact of engaging in that character of activity.

With extension of the Shreveport influence to general application,[11] it was necessary no longer to search for some sharp point or line where interstate commerce ends and intrastate commerce begins, in order to decide whether Congress' commands were effective. For the essence of the affectation doctrine was that the exact location of this line made no difference, if the forbidden effects flowed across it to the injury of interstate commerce or to the hindrance or defeat of congressional policy regarding it.

The formulation of the Shreveport doctrine was a great turning point in the construction of the commerce clause, comparable in this respect to the landmark of Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299. For, while the latter gave play for state power to work

S. 110; Stern, The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933-1946, 59 Harv. L. Rev. 645, 883.

The Filburn case dealt with the second Agricultural Adjustment Act and the power of Congress to enact it. But, referring to the first Interstate Commerce Act and the Sherman Act, the Court in the Filburn case (pp. 121-122) said that those statutes "ushered in new phases of adjudication" requiring a different approach to interpretation of the commerce clause, although "when it first dealt with this new legislation, the Court adhered to its earlier pronouncements, and allowed but little scope to the power of Congress." For the latter statement the Knight case was cited as the principal example.

[11] The doctrine encompassed fundamentally not merely an expanding factor in federal power over transportation. It was rather an integer in the sum of power over commerce, of which authority over transportation was but a part. The "affectation" approach was actually a revival of Marshall's "necessary and proper" doctrine, cf. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S. 111, 120, 122, but unqualified by his idea of mutual exclusiveness, see note 8. Once applied to transportation and the Interstate Commerce Acts, it was inevitable that the approach would be extended to the productive and industrial phases of the national economy and the statutes regulating them, including the Sherman Act. Time and events were disclosing ever more clearly the impact of their effects upon interstate trade and commerce. And this was posing the same necessity for regulation as in the field of transportation, in order to protect and preserve the national commerce and carry out Congress' policy regarding it.

in the field of commerce, the former broke bonds confining Congress' power and made it an effective instrument for fulfilling its purpose. The Shreveport doctrine cut Congress loose from the haltering labels of "production" and "manufacturing" and gave it rein to reach those processes when they were used to defy its purposes regarding interstate trade and commerce. In doing so the decision substituted judgment as to practical impeding effects upon that commerce for rubrics concerning its boundaries as the basic criterion of effective congressional action.

The transition, however, was neither smooth nor immediately complete, particularly for applying the Sherman Act. The old ideas persisted in specific applications as late as the 1930's. But after the historic decisions of 1911, and even more following the Shreveport decision, a constantly growing number of others rejected the idea that production and manufacturing are "purely local" and hence beyond the Act's compass, simply because those phases of a combination restraining or monopolizing trade were carried on within the confines of a single state or, of course, of several states.[12] The struggle for supremacy between the conflicting approaches was long continued. But more and more until the climax came in the late 1930's, this Court refused to decide those issues of power and coverage merely by asking whether the restraints or monopolistic practices, shown to have the forbidden effects on commerce, took place in a phase or phases of the total economic process which, apart from other phases and from the outlawed effects, occurred only in intrastate activities.[13]

In view of this evolution, the inquiry whether the restraint occurs in one phase or another, interstate or intrastate, of the total economic process is now merely a preliminary step, except for those situations in which no aspect of or substantial effect upon interstate commerce can be found in the sum of the facts presented.[14] For, given a restraint of the type forbidden by the Act, though arising in the course of intrastate or local activities, and a showing of actual or threatened effect upon interstate commerce, the vital question becomes whether the effect is sufficiently substantial and adverse to Congress' paramount policy declared in the Act's terms to constitute a forbidden consequence. If so, the restraint must fall, and the injuries it inflicts upon others become remediable under the Act's prescribed methods, including the treble damage provision.

The Shreveport doctrine did not contemplate that restraints or burdens become or remain immune merely because they take place as events prior to the point in time when interstate commerce begins. Exactly the contrary is comprehended, for it is the effect upon that commerce, not the moment when its cause arises, which the doctrine was fashioned to reach.

Obviously therefore the criteria respondent would have us follow furnish no basis for reaching the result it seeks. Only by returning to the Knight approach, and severing the intrastate events relating to the beets, including the price restraints, from the later events relating to the sugar, including its interstate sale, could we conclude there were no forbidden restraints or practices touching interstate commerce here. At this late day we are not willing to take that long backward step.

III.

We turn then to consider the questions posed upon the amended complaint that are relevant under the presently controlling criteria. These are whether the allegations

[14] In United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293, 297, we said: "It is true that this Court has on occasion determined that local conduct could be insulated from the operation of the Anti-Trust laws on the basis of the purely local aims of a combination, insofar as those aims were not motivated by the purpose of restraining commerce, and where the means used to achieve the purpose did not directly touch upon interstate commerce." The decisions cited were Industrial Association of San Francisco v. United States, 268 U. S. 64; Levering & Garrigues Co. v. Morrin, 289 U. S. 103; United Leather Workers v. Herkert & Meisel Trunk Co., 265 U. S. 457; cf. Local 167 v. United States, 291 U. S. 293, 297, and United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U. S. 219.

disclose a restraint and monopolistic practices of the types outlawed by the Sherman Act; whether, if so, those acts are shown to produce the forbidden effects upon commerce; and whether the effects create injury for which recovery of treble damages by the petitioners is authorized.

It is clear that the agreement is the sort of combination condemned by the Act,[15] even though the price-fixing was by purchasers,[16] and the persons specially injured under the treble damage claim are sellers, not customers or consumers.[17] And even if it is assumed that the final aim of the conspiracy was control of the local sugar beet market, it does not follow that it is outside the scope of the Sherman Act. For monopolization of local business, when achieved by restraining interstate commerce, is condemned by the Act. Stevens Co. v. Foster & Kleiser, 311 U. S. 255, 261. And a conspiracy with the ultimate object of fixing local retail prices is within the Act, if the means adopted for its accomplishment reach beyond the boundaries of one state. United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293.

The statute does not confine its protection to consumers, or to purchasers, or to competitors, or to sellers. Nor does it immunize the outlawed acts because they are done by any of these. Cf. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781. The Act is comprehensive in its terms and coverage, protecting all who are made victims of the forbidden practices by whomever they may be perpetrated. Cf. United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Assn., supra, at 553.

Nor is the amount of the nation's sugar industry which the California refiners control relevant, so long as control is exercised effectively in the area concerned, Indiana Farmer's Guide v. Prairie Farmer, 293 U. S. 268, 279, United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 225, the conspiracy being shown to affect interstate commerce adversely to Congress' policy. Congress' power to keep the interstate market free of goods produced under conditions inimical to the general welfare, United States v. Darby, 312 U. S. 100, 115, may be exercised in individual cases without showing any specific effect upon interstate commerce, United States v. Walsh, 331 U. S. 432, 437-438; it is enough that the individual activity when multiplied into a general practice is subject to federal control, Wickard v. Filburn, supra, or that it contains a threat to the interstate economy that requires preventive regulation. Consolidated Edison Co. v. Labor Board, 305 U. S. 197, 221-222.

Moreover, as we said in the Frankfort Distilleries case, ". . . there is an obvious distinction to be drawn between a course of conduct wholly within a state and conduct which is an inseparable element of a larger program dependent for its success upon activity which affects commerce between the states." 324 U. S. 293, 297. That statement is as true of the situation now presented as of the one then before us, although instead of restraining trade in order to control a local market petitioners control a local market in which they purchase. For this is not a case involving only "a course of conduct wholly within a state"; it is rather one involving "conduct which is an inseparable element of a larger program dependent for its success upon activity which affects commerce between the states," and in such a case it is not material that the source of the forbidden effects upon that commerce arises in one phase or another of that program.

In view of all this, it is difficult to understand respondent's argument that the complaint does not allege that the conspiracy had any effect on interstate commerce, except on the basis of the discarded criteria discussed in Part II above. The contention ignores specific allegations which we have set forth. But apart from that fact it rests only on a single grounding, which in the circumstances of this case is little, if any, more than a different phrasing of the criteria supplanted by the Shreveport approach.

This is that the change undergone in the manufacturing stage when the beets are converted into sugar makes the case different, for the Sherman Act's objects, than it would be if the identical commodity were concerned from the planting stage through the phase of interstate distribution, e. g., if the commodity were wheat, as was true in [15] United States v. Frankfort Distilleries, 324 U. S. 293, and authorities cited.

[16] Cf. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781; United States v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525; Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375. Each case involved outlawed practices by persons who were both purchasers and sellers, and forbidden effects upon sellers as well as purchasers and consumers.

[17] See note 16.

Wickard v. Filburn, supra, or raisins purchased by packers from growers and shipped interstate after packing, cf. Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, 350.

We do not stop to consider specific and varied situations in which a change of form amounting to one in the essential character of the commodity takes place by manufacturing or processing intermediate the stages of producing and disposing of the raw material intrastate and later interstate distribution of the finished product; or the effects, if any, of such a change in particular situations unlike the one now presented.[18] For mere change in the form of the commodity or even complete change in essential quality by intermediate refining, processing or manufacturing does not defeat application of the statute to practices occurring either during those processes or before they begin, when they have the effects forbidden by the Act.[19] Again, as we have said, the vital thing is the effect on commerce, not the precise point at which the restraint occurs or begins to take effect in a scheme as closely knit as this in all phases of the industry. Hence in this case the mere fact that the price fixing related directly to the beets did not sever or render insubstantial its effect subsequently in the sale of sugar.

Indeed that severance would not necessarily take place if the manufacturing stage had produced a much greater change in commodities than was effected here. But under the facts characterizing this industry's operation and the tightening of controls in this producing area by the new agreements and understandings, there can be no question that their restrictive consequences were projected substantially into the interstate distribution of the sugar, as the amended complaint repeatedly alleges. Indeed they permeated the entire structure of the industry in all its phases, intrastate and interstate.

We deal here, as petitioners say, with an industry tightly interwoven from sale of the seed through all the intermediate stages to and including interstate sale and distribution of the sugar. In the middle of all these processes and dominating all of them stand the refiners. They control the supply and price of seed, the quantity sold and the volume of land planted, the processes of cultivation and harvesting, the quantity of beets purchased and rejected, the refining, and the distribution of sugar both interstate and local.

Some of these controls have been built up by taking advantage of the opportunities afforded by the industry's unique character, both natural and in its general pattern and habits of organization; [20] others by utilizing the key positions these advantages give the refiners to put contractual restraints upon the growers by their separate actions; [21] and still greater ones by the refiners' ability, by virtue of their central and dominating place thus achieved, to agree among themselves upon further restrictions.

Even without the uniform price provision and with full competition among the three refiners, their position is a dominating one. The growers' only competitive outlet is the one which exists when the refiners compete among themselves. There is no other market. The farmers' only alternative to dealing with one of the three refiners is to stop growing beets. They can neither plant nor sell except at the refiners' pleasure and on their terms. The refiners thus effectively control the quantity of beets grown, harvested and marketed, and consequently of sugar sold from the area in interstate commerce, even when they compete with each other. They dominate the entire industry. And their dominant position, together with the obstacles created by the necessity for large capital investment and the time required to make it productive, makes outlet

[18] Compare Arkadelphia Milling Co. v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co., 249 U. S. 134, with Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, 315 U. S. 148.

[19] Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375; American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. (2d) 416.

[20] The natural factors include the peculiar nature of the crop in its limitation to a single primary and commercially profitable use, the necessity for immediate and nearby marketing to follow directly upon harvesting, and the well-known fact that sugar beets are grown only in widely scattered regions specially adapted to the crop in soil, climate and availability of water in large quantities during the growing season.

[21] Resulting in large part from the natural limitations stated in note 20 and the fact that extracting the sugar content from the beets is an elaborate and technical process, is the further important fact that the processing cannot be done by the growers individually or even in small cooperative groups, but requires specialized and large scale business organization, equipment and investment. All these factors and perhaps others combine to make the refining stage of the industry a specialized manufacturing one to be carried on separately from growing, to establish the refiners' key place in the entire industry, and thus to leave the growers completely at the refiners' mercy for the profitable production of beets except as the latter may compete among themselves.

through new competition practically imposible. Upon the allegations, it is absolutely so for any single growing season. A tighter or more all-inclusive monopolistic position hardly can be conceived.

When therefore the refiners cease entirely to compete with each other in all stages of the industry prior to marketing the sugar, the last vestige of local competition is removed and with it the only competitive opportunity for the grower to market his product. Moreover it is inconceivable that the monopoly so created will have no effects for the lessening of competition in the later interstate phases of the over-all activity or that the effects in those phases will have no repercussions upon the prior ones, including the price received by the growers.

There were indeed two distinct effects flowing from the agreement for paying uniform growers' prices, one immediately upon the price received by the grower rendering it devoid of all competitive influence in amount; the other, the necessary and inevitable effect of that agreement, in the setting of the industry as a whole, to reduce competition in the interstate distribution of sugar.

The idea that stabilization of prices paid for the only raw material consumed in an industry has no influence toward reducing competition in the distribution of the finished product, in an integrated industry such as this, is impossible to accept. By their agreement the combination of refiners acquired not only a monopoly of the raw material but also and thereby control of the quantity of sugar manufactured, sold and shipped interstate from the northern California producing area. In substance and roughly, if not precisely, they allocated among themselves the market for California beets substantially upon the basis of quotas competitively established among them at the time the uniform price arrangement was agreed upon. It is hardly likely that any refiner would have entered into an agreement with its only competitors, the effect of which would have been to drive away its growers, or therefore that many of the latter would have good reason to shift their dealings within the closed circle. Thus control of quantity in the interstate market was enhanced.

This effect was further magnified by the fact that the widely scattered location of sugar beet growing regions and their different accessibilities to market [22] give the refiners of each region certainly some advantage over growers and refiners in other regions, and undoubtedly large ones over those most distant from the segment of the interstate market served by reason of being nearest to hand.

Finally, the interdependence and inextricable relationship between the interstate and the intrastate effects of the combination and monopoly are shown perhaps most clearly by the provision of the uniform price agreement which ties in the price paid for beets with the price received for sugar. The percentage factor of interstate receipts from sugar which the grower's contract specifies shall enter his price for beets makes that price dependent upon the price of sugar sold interstate. The uniform agreement's effect, when added to this, is to deprive the grower of the advantage of the individual efficiency of the refiner with which he deals, in this case the most efficient of the three, and of the price that refiner receives. It is also to reflect in the grower's price the consequences of the combination's effects for reducing competition among the refiners in the interstate distribution of sugar.

In sum, the restraint and its monopolistic effects were reflected throughout each stage of the industry, permeating its entire structure. This was the necessary and inevitable effect of the agreement among the refiners to pay uniform prices for beets, in the circumstances of this case. Those monopolistic effects not only deprived the beet growers of any competitive opportunity for disposing of their crops by the immediate operation of the uniform price provision; they also tended to increase control over the quantity of sugar sold interstate; and finally by the tie-in provision they interlaced those interstate effects with the price paid for the beets.

These restrictive and monopolistic effects, resulting necessarily from the practices allegedly intended to produce them, fall squarely within the Sherman Act's prohibitions, creating the very injuries they were designed to prevent, both to the public and to private individuals.

It does not matter, contrary to respondent's view, that the growers contracting with the other two refiners may have been benefited, rather than harmed, by the combination's effects, even if that result is assumed to have followed. It is enough that these petitioners have suffered the injuries for which the statutory remedy is afforded. For the test of the legality and immunity of such a combination, in view of the statute's policy, is not that some others than the members of the combination have profited by its operation. It is rather whether the statute's policy has been violated in a manner to produce the general consequences it forbids for the public and the special consequences for particular individuals essential to the recovery of treble damages. Both types of injury are present in this case, for in addition to the restraints put upon the public interest in the interstate sale of sugar, enhancing the refiner's controls, there are special injuries affecting the petitioners resulting from those effects as well as from the immediate operation of the uniform price arrangement itself.

The fact that that arrangement is the source of both effects cannot be taken to mean that neither is outlawed by the statute, in view of their interdependence and the completely unified and comprehensive nature of the scheme as respects its interstate and intrastate phases. The policy of the Act is competition. It cannot be flouted, as has been done here, by artificial nomenclatural severance of the plan's forbidden effects, any more than by such a segmentation of the integrated industry into legally unrelated phases. Nor can the severance be made in such a case merely by virtue of the fact that a refining or manufacturing process constitutes an intermediate stage in the whole.

To compare an industry so completely interlocked in all its stages, by all-inclusive contract as well as by industrial structure and organization, with one like producing, processing, and marketing fruits, vegetables, corn, or other products, susceptible of various uses and under conditions affording varied outlets for market, both local and interstate, in the raw or refined state, in which neither such a contractual nor such an industrial integration exists, is to ignore the facts of industrial life. So is it also to make conclusive comparisons with other industries in which the manufacturing process requires and has available a greater variety of raw materials for making the finished product, and involves a longer and more extensive process of change, than does extracting the sugar content of beets to make raw sugar.

We deal with the facts before us. With respect to others which may be significantly different, for purposes of violating the statute's terms and policy, we await another day.[23]

[Sugar and Sugar Beets]

IV.

Little more remains to be said concerning the amended complaint. The allegations comprehend all that we have set forth. We do not stop to restate them, leaving their substance at this point for reference to the summary made at the beginning of this opinion.

Respondent has presented its argument as if the amended complaint omitted all reference to restraint or effects upon interstate trade in sugar and confined these allegations to the trade in beets. It is true that at the hearing which followed filing of the amended complaint, petitioners at one point, apparently in response to some intimation from the court, eliminated the words "sugar and sugar beets" from one of the allegations that the refiners had conspired to "monopolize and restrain trade and commerce among the several states. . . ."[24]

Respondent takes this elision as effective to constitute an express disavowal by petitioners of any charge of restraint of trade in sugar, the only interstate commodity. The amendment did not eliminate or affect numerous other allegations which in effect

[23] It is suggested that Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341, is inconsistent with our conclusion here. The Court there held first that the Sherman Act did not apply because the program was sponsored by the State of California. Contrary to the present suggestion, the opinion assumes that the relation between the intrastate and the interstate commerce in raisins was sufficient to justify federal regulation, if the state-sponsored program of prorating had been "organized and made effective solely by virtue of a contract, combination or conspiracy of private persons, individual or corporate." 317 U. S. at 350. The case therefore contains no suggestion, on the facts or on the law, contrary to the result now reached.

[24] See note 5. By way of explaining the deletion the record contains only the statement of the stipulation, cf. note 1, that the amended complaint eliminated "what the Court considered an ambiguity in the [original] complaint." With no further support from the record, it has been assumed that the ambiguity so elided was the reference to restraint of interstate trade in sugar and hence the petitioners in making it stated themselves out of court.

Apart from the fact that the elision did not affect numerous other like allegations, see note 6 and text, the deletion included the specifications of both "sugar and sugar beets." From this the literal inference, if any of the sort could be made, would be that the elision was repeated the charge in various forms and with reference to various specific effects upon interstate as well as local phases of the commerce. Some of these explicitly specified trade or commerce in sugar,[25] others designated the trade affected as interstate, which on the facts could mean only sugar. Moreover, petitioners deny the disavowal, both in intent and in effect. They say the elision was insubstantial, since in the clause from which it was made the allegation of conspiracy to monopolize and restrain interstate commerce remained, and the only interstate trade was in sugar. We think the amendment, for whatever reason made, was not effective to constitute a disavowal, disclaimer or waiver.

The allegations are comprehensive and, for the greater part specific, concerning both the restraints and their effects. They clearly state a cause of action under the Sherman Act.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON with whom MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins, dissenting.

It appears to me that the Court's opinion is based on assumptions of fact which the petitioner disclaimed in the court below. These assumptions are permissible inferences from the amended complaint only if we disregard the way in which the amendments came about.

On hearing, the trial judge apparently considered that a cause of action would be stated only if the complaint alleged that the growing contracts affected the price of sugar in interstate commerce. But the contracts accompanying the pleadings indicated that the effects ran in the other direction. The market price of interstate sugar was the base on which the price of beets was to be figured. The latter price was derived from the income which respondent and others received from sugar sold in the open market over the period of a year. The trial judge therefore suggested that the references to restraint of trade in sugar in interstate commerce created an ambiguity in the complaint. Accordingly, the plaintiff, at the suggestion of the court and for the specific purpose of this appeal, filed an amended complaint which completely eliminated the charge that the agreements complained of affected the price of sugar in interstate commerce, and eliminated the two other counts "to enable the Court herein to pass upon the sufficiency of the first count and, further, to make possible a speedy and inexpensive review by appeal if the Court held that the first count was insufficient".[1] The District Court then held that since no beets whatever moved in interstate commerce and since there was no charge in the amended complaint that the cost or quality of the product which did move in interstate intended to withdraw all charges of monopoly or restraint of trade, whether in sugar or in beets, and thus to concede there was no case under the Sherman Act, a conclusion obviously at war with the remaining allegations of restraint of trade in both sugar and sugar beets.

But, if any difference between the two could be assumed as having been intended, it is much more likely that the supposed ambiguity deleted arose from the reference to interstate trade in beets, since the allegation as a whole referred only to "interstate trade and commerce" and on the facts pleaded the only trade in beets was intrastate (considered apart, as respondent would do, from its relation to and effects upon the trade in sugar).

In any event the case is to be decided upon the sum of the allegations of the amended complaint, not upon conjecture as to why a particular and, we think, immaterial amendment of one allegation was made. Indeed the entire allegation could have been elided without affecting the substance or validity of the remainder of the amended complaint to state a cause of action under the Sherman Act. There was more than enough without it.

[25] E. g., in the allegation quoted in note 6, as well as others set forth in the text preceeding that note.

[1] The full text of the Stipulation and Order which was executed by counsel for both parties, and by the District Judge, is as follows:

"Whereas, in oral argument on November 13, 1945, on the motion of defendant to dismiss, etc., Hon. Ben Harrison, the United States District Judge before whom said matter was argued, stated from the bench to counsel herein that he felt that the first cause of action, if supplemented by copies of the contracts attached to the defendant's motion to dismiss, would not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and suggested that it would be a tremendous saving of time and expense if the complaint were amended (a) by setting forth copies of the agreements involved in the first count, (b) by eliminating what the Court considered an ambiguity in the complaint, and (c) by the parties entering into a stipulation to eliminate from the pleadings, for the purpose of the appeal only and without prejudice to the rights of the plaintiffs, the second and third causes of action, so as to enable the Court herein to commerce was in any way affected, no cause of action was stated. The appeal was taken and the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

This Court, however, decides the case as though the original complaint as it related to sugar had not only remained unchanged but had been proved by evidence. Despite the deletion from the complaint of the allegation concerning the price of sugar, the Court assumes, without allegation or evidence, that the price of sugar is affected and on that basis builds its thesis that the Sherman Act has been violated. I think in fairness to the litigants and the District Court, the petitioner's case should be disposed of here on the same basis on which it was pleaded to the courts below.

On the proceedings in the courts below, I would affirm the judgment of the District Court.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Motion to Dismiss—Appropriate Forum—Venue Requirements.—Motions by defendants to dismiss an action alleging a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws, on the ground of forum non conveniens, are denied. The venue provisions of the Clayton Act are special venue statutes, and Congress in enacting them intended to prohibit the application of the principle of forum non conveniens. It is further held that in order for the doctrine to apply, defendant must be amenable to suit in the allegedly more convenient forum. The court cannot accept defendant's stipulation waiving venue protection in the second jurisdiction, but requires that he be amenable to process on the facts themselves. Plaintiff's choice of forum should be disturbed only where the choice is vexatious and oppressive to the defendant. The court does not find that trial in this district is either oppressive or vexatious to defendants, and a dismissal of the complaint is not warranted.

See the Sherman Act annotations Vol. 1, ¶ 1640.291.

pass upon the sufficiency of the first count on its merits and, further, to make possible a speedy and inexpensive review by appeal if the Court held that the first count was insufficient;

"Now, Wherefore, the parties stipulate, without plaintiffs' waiving their rights under the second and third counts and without prejudice to any of plaintiffs' rights thereunder, as follows, to-wit:

"1. Plaintiffs will file an amended complaint herein, attaching copies of the forms of contract in use in 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941, and omitting the second and third counts.

"2. Said omission of the said second and third counts shall be without prejudice to any of the rights of the plaintiffs as to any cause or causes of action included or includible therein by amendment, and shall not be a retraxit or a dismissal with prejudice.

"3. Defendant herein waives, for the period of time hereinafter set forth, any and all statutes of limitations now or hereafter applicable to the second or third causes of action or any matters therein set forth or includible therein by amendment, and waives the defense of laches as to the second and third causes of action or any matters therein set forth or includible therein by amendment.

"4. Plaintiffs may, at any time prior to six months after the decision on appeal as to the sufficiency of the first count has become final, either amend the amended complaint herein by realleging said second and third counts or any portion of either, or, at any time during said period, file a separate action or actions setting forth said second and third counts or any portion of either, all with the same force and effect as if said second and third counts were continuously included herein as second and third counts from the date of the commencement of this action.

"5. The waiver of the statute of limitations and of the defense of laches herein set forth, and the stipulation permitting the amendment of the amended complaint or the filing of a separate action or actions hereinabove set forth shall continue until six months after the determination on appeal as to the sufficiency of the first count has become final."

[Nature of Action]

RYAN, J.: Defendants move to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the District Court for the Southern District of New York is not the appropriate forum for the trial of this action, claiming that a determination of the issues would be had at greater convenience to the parties and witnesses if the action were brought in the United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division, Detroit; and, in addition and as to the second cause of action, that this court has no jurisdiction because the venue requirements for patent infringement suits are not satisfied. The defendant, Dearborn Motors Corporation, adds as a further ground for dismissal that to require it to defend this action in the Southern District of New York would be an undue burden on interstate commerce.

We shall consider only the facts involving those defendants who have been served by plaintiffs, to wit: Ford Motor Company, Dearborn Motors Corporation and its president, Ernest C. Kanzler, Henry Ford II and Sherman Tractor & Equipment Co., Incorporated.

Ford Motor Company is a Delaware corporation qualified to do business in the State of New York, maintaining a regular and established place of business in this district. Dearborn Motors Corporation is also a Delaware corporation and transacts business regularly here. Ernest C. Kanzler and Henry Ford II are residents of Michigan. Sherman Tractor & Equipment Co., Incorporated is a New York corporation and maintains a regular and established place of business within this district. The plaintiffs are Harry Ferguson, as an individual and a British citizen, and Harry Ferguson, Inc., a Delaware corporation. The complaint alleges three claims for relief against twelve defendants.

The first cause of action alleges, in substance, that in 1938, the late Henry Ford and Harry Ferguson entered into an oral agreement terminable by either party at any time, for the production and sale of a farm tractor, invented and patented by Ferguson; that operations were continued under this agreement between Ford Motor Company and the corporate plaintiff from 1938 until the end of 1946; that it was a relationship of good faith and mutual confidence; that defendants conspired to breach the alleged agreement, to destroy plaintiffs' business and to appropriate it through defendant, Dearborn Motors. It is alleged that this conspiracy violated sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and sections 3 and 7 of the Clayton Act with damages of $80,000,000. and a prayer for treble that sum under section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 USCA 1, 2, 14 and 18).

The second cause of action alleges the same facts as to the conspiracy but claims that one facet of the plan was to infringe deliberately certain patents of Ferguson's by copying the Ferguson system tractor and selling such allegedly infringing tractors in violation of these patents, with resulting damage of $3,700,000. and asking judgment in three times this amount. (35 USCA § 67).

The third cause of action is an alleged equitable claim, as well as a tort claim, based upon and incorporating the allegations of the first and second causes of action, but alleged to be ancillary to them, and does not ask for damages additional to their total of $251,100,000.

Many of the affidavits and a large portion of the briefs submitted discuss the alleged merits (as well as the lack of merit) of plaintiffs' claims. The consideration of these matters is neither proper nor necessary to the determination of the motion now before us, their appraisal is to be arrived at after trial only. Much, too, has been said by plaintiffs of the impossibility of securing a jury in Detroit "which would be wholly unbiased and without prejudice in this case," and to support this contention have submitted copies of proceedings had in a suit brought by Henry Ford, plaintiff, against The Tribune Company, et al., defendants, in the Michigan Circuit Court for the County of Wayne. An opinion of the court in that litigation in February, 1919, also submitted, held that "it would be impossible to secure a jury from the body of this County [Wayne] that would be wholly without prejudice in a case in which Henry Ford is one of the parties litigant," and granted a change of venue to an adjoining county. We reject this finding of a local court, made almost thirty years ago, not only as remote and of no value as an indication of present bias, but upon careful review conclude that it should receive no weight whatsoever even to demonstrate conditions as alleged to have existed in Detroit in 1919.

We come then to the substantial issues presented on this motion.

[Forum Non Conveniens]

The Supreme Court has clearly established that federal courts do have inherent power to dismiss complaints on the ground of forum non conveniens. [Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501 (1947)]. The Court distinguished the cases of Miles v. Illinois Central R. Co., 315 U. S. 698 (1942) and Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44 (1941) for the reason that the venue provision of the FELA was a "special venue" provision, and that Congress in enacting it intended to prohibit the application of this principle.

Plaintiffs contend that the venue provisions of the Clayton Act, under which this action is brought, are also special venue statutes and are governed by the same rule. They maintain that this court does not have authority to dismiss their first cause of action on the ground of forum non conveniens. Neither the Supreme Court nor any federal appellate court appears to have passed on this question. The United States District Court for the Southern District of California did first hold that civil suits under the Clayton Act fell within the special venue category [United States v. Standard Oil Co. of California, 7 F. R. D. 338 (July, 1947)], but later limited the classification to include only those venue sections whose legislative history and background indicated legislative intent to foreclose the question of forum non conveniens and not to include all venue sections drafted for particular causes of action. [United States v. National City Lines, Inc., 7 F. R. D. 456 (Sept. 1947)]. It is interesting to note that although in the former case the doctrine was held inapplicable, in a subsequent criminal action involving exactly the same facts defendant was granted a change of venue to a more convenient forum under Rule 21(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. [United States v. National City Lines, Inc., 7 F. R. D. 393 (Aug. 1947)]. The United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania has held that the venue section of the "Securities Act of 1933" [15 USCA § 77v(a)] is a special venue provision for the purposes of this rule. (Securities Exchange Commission v. Wimer, C. C. H. Fed. S. E. C. Law Report 90,402—1948. This court in a recent antitrust case, after holding that the facts did not call for the exercise of discretion in favor of the defendant, by way of dictum expressed the thought that in any event the doctrine of forum non conveniens was not applicable to suits under the anti-trust laws (15 USCA §§ 15, 22). (Fifth & Walnut Inc., et al. v. Loew's Inc., et al., S. D. N. Y. Jan. 23, 1948). However, with the issue now directly posed, re-examination of all relevant factors has been made. While Mr. Justice Jackson in the Gulf Oil case, supra, spoke in terms of "special venue" statutes foreclosing the doctrine of forum non conveniens, it is to be noted that the Supreme Court examined the particular legislative background of the FELA venue provision when passing upon this question in Miles v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; and only after so doing did it conclude that the Congress deliberately chose to give plaintiff in such actions the absolute right to select any forum within the statute's scope. Following a recognized canon of statutory construction [Moore Ice Cream Co. v. Rose, 289 U. S. 373, 377 (1933)], the Court also looked to the circumstances under which the statute was passed and the expressions of Congress to find that as for FELA actions, that body "loaded the dice" in favor of a plaintiff.

There are other factors which persuade that the special venue statute rule is applicable only on the basis of individual legislative history.

The United States Code is replete with venue sections for particular types of suits, viz., FELA, 45 USCA § 56; Clayton Act, 15 USCA §§ 15, 22; Internal Revenue Code, 28 USCA § 105; Copyright Actions, 17 USCA § 35; Stockholders' Derivative Suits, 28 USCA § 112; Securities Act, 15 USCA § 77v(a). To exclude the doctrine of forum non conveniens from all such suits and from suits on similar causes of action would be to emasculate it. It seems that had the Supreme Court meant to limit the operation of the rule so much it would have done so explicitly. Finally, the Supreme Court in the case of Koster v. Lumbermens Mutual Co., 330 U. S. 518 (1947), upheld the application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens to a stockholder's derivative suit brought under a statute having its own venue section in language substantially similar to that of the FELA and the Clayton Act. Under § 112 (28 USCA) stockholder's derivative suits may be brought:

> ". . . in any district in which suit against the defendant or defendants in said stockholders' action, other than said corporation, might have been brought by such corporation and process in such cases may be served upon such corporation in any district wherein such corporation resides or may be found. * * *"

Under § 56 (45 USCA) of the FELA, an action may be brought:

> ". . . in a district court of the United States, in the district of the residence of the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be doing business at the time of commencing such action. * * *"

And, under § 15 (15 USCA) of the Clayton Act, suit may be brought:

> ". . . in the district in which the defendant resides . . . or has an agent . . .", and under § 22, suit against a corporation may be brought:

> ". . . not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business . . . ."

It appears that the doctrine of forum non conveniens cannot be foreclosed in anti-trust suits merely because the statute contains its own venue section, but rather that an examination of its legislative history must be made to determine whether the doctrine is or is not applicable. Since the principal of forum non conveniens is applicable in the absence of legislative mandate to the contrary, the search is not for evidence that the Congress intended it to apply, but that it intended it not to apply. We find no indications, on the part of the Congress, that it intended the latter. Congress did by § 12 of the Clayton Act extend the venue allowances for anti-trust actions (51 Cong. Rec. 16274), by permitting plaintiff to sue a defendant where he transacts business [Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359 (1927). But cf. King V. Wall & Beaver Street Corporation, 145 F. 2d 377, 380], and there is indication that it intended to deny the courts the power to decline such jurisdiction.

A gleaning of the Congressional discussions relating to the venue provisions of the Clayton Act leads to the conclusion that the Congress intended to give plaintiffs in such actions the widest possible choice of forum. The following comments concerning the scope of the venue sections is found:

> "* * * We have already broadened the provisions of the Sherman Act with reference to the bringing of suit and the service of process at any place where the corporation is an inhabitant, or wherever it has an agent. I can hardly conceive of a suit being brought otherwise than under these conditions, and it makes service by process easy . . . ." (51 Cong. Rec. 9608) and further,

> "* * * I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that we are liberalizing the procedure in the courts in order to give the individual who is damaged the right to get his damages anywhere—anywhere you can catch the offender. . . ." (51 Cong. Rec. 16274)

Throughout the debate the atmosphere is markedly similar to that in the discussion relative to the FELA venue provisions. Again we note legislative desire to favor plaintiffs. We have evidence of a strong legislative purpose to abolish monopolies and of a general policy to hold anti-trust violators amenable to suit in several jurisdictions despite resulting hardship. Nowhere, in the record, is there any consideration given to the possible inconvenience of defendants. In view of the circumstances leading up to these particular provisions and of the inclusive language used; and more important, analyzing the expressions of purpose found in the Congressional Records, we must conclude that Congress has made the principles of forum non conveniens inapplicable to suits brought under the anti-trust statutes. And, an examination of the record and the various reports (H. R. Rep. 627, Sen. Rep. 698. Cong. Rec. 1168, 63rd Cong. 2d. Sess.) further confirms this conclusion.

The Sherman Act was passed July 2, 1890. By it combinations in restraint of trade were declared illegal, and criminal sanctions were set up to enforce it. The Government was given power to enforce it, but not much aid beyond the mere declaration of illegality of trusts and monopolies was given private plaintiffs in prosecuting their rights under the Act.

On October 15, 1914 Congress passed the Clayton Act. Fletcher (Cyclopedia of The Law of Private Corporations, Vol. 10, § 5041) analyzes the venue changes effected by this legislation, as follows:

> "By section 7 of the Sherman Act it is provided that anyone injured in his person or property by another person or corporation by reason of anything declared to be unlawful by that act may sue therefor 'in the district in which the defendant resides or is found.' [n. Sherman Act July 2, 1890, ch. 647, § 7, 26 Stat. 210]. But by section 4 of the Clayton Act, which supplemented the former laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies of interstate trade, the local jurisdiction of the district courts was materially enlarged in reference to suits against corporations. It was provided that any person 'injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the anti-trust laws' might sue therefor in the district 'in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent.' [n. 15 USCA 15].
> "Accordingly it will be seen that section 4 of the Clayton Act is similar to section 7 of the Sherman Act, but by the insertion of words 'or has an agent' in the venue clause, the plaintiff, in some circumstances, has additional districts in which to bring his suit to those permitted by section 7 of the Sherman Act. [n. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., supra; Venner v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. of New Jersey, 250 Fed. 292].
> "By section 12 of the Clayton Act it is clear that the jurisdictional provision of section 7 of the Sherman Act was very greatly enlarged, dealing specifically with the venue and service of process in suits against corporations. It is provided that 'any suit, action or proceeding under the anti-trust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the district where of it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business.' [n. 15 USCA 22; Venner v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. of New Jersey, supra]. It will be observed that section 12 of the Clayton Act deals only with corporations, and undoubtedly affords the plaintiff additional districts wherein he may sue that class of defendants. [n. Venner v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. supra; Southern Photo Material Co. v. Eastman Kodak Co., supra]. It is clear that as applied to suits against corporations for injuries sustained by violations of the Anti-Trust Act, the necessary effect of Section 12 of the Clayton Act was to enlarge the local jurisdiction of the district courts so as to establish the venue of such a suit not only, as theretofore, in a district in which the corporation resides or is 'found,' but also in any district in which it 'transacts business,' although neither residing nor 'found' therein, [n. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., supra], and a corporation is engaged in transacting business in a district within the meaning of this section, in such a sense as to establish the venue of a suit, although not present by agents carrying on business of such character and in such manner that it is 'found' therein and is amenable to local process, [n. Jeffrey-Nichols Motor Co. v. Hupp Motor Car Corp., 46 F. 2d 623, rev'g 41 F. 2d 767], if in fact, in the ordinary and usual sense, it 'transacts business' therein of any substantial character. [n. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., supra; Jeffrey-Nichols Motor Co. v. Hupp Motor Car Corp., supra. See also Cyclopedia of Federal Procedure, § 375]. This provision does not affect the general jurisdiction of the district courts, but merely establishes a personal privilege which a defendant is free to waive. [n. General Inv. Co. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 269 Fed. 235, aff'd 260 U. S. 261, 279.]
> "Having an office and doing business within the district is 'found' within the meaning of the Sherman and Clayton Acts allowing suit against the defendant in such case irrespective of diversity of citizenship; [n. Venner v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. of New Jersey, supra]; accordingly the federal courts have jurisdiction even though the plaintiff is a citizen of the state, as well as an inhabitant of the district in which the defendant is found. [n. Thorburn v. Gates, 225 Fed. 613, 615; Michigan Aluminum Foundry Co. v. Aluminum Castings Co., 190 Fed. 879]."

Congress, in passing the Clayton Act to amend the Sherman Act, showed just as much solicitude in giving private plaintiffs in anti-trust actions a choice of forum as it showed in giving plaintiffs a choice of forum under the amendment to the FELA. Nor, should we fail to give weight to that portion of Mr. Justice Reed's opinion in Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Kepner, supra, where he wrote of § 6 of the FELA, (at 54):

> "* * * When the section was enacted it filled the entire field of venue in federal courts. A privilege of venue, granted by the legislative body which created this right of action, cannot be frustrated for reasons of convenience or expense. If it is deemed unjust, the remedy is legislative. . . ."

It should be noted that the special venue provisions of the FELA were enacted in April, 1910, and the amendments granting special venue to plaintiffs in anti-trust suits were not adopted in the Clayton Act until October, 1914. The fact that almost identical language was used is most persuasive to convince one that the same privileges were intended to be extended by both Acts.

The conclusion follows that the doctrine of forum non conveniens is not applicable to anti-trust suits. These motions have not been disposed of on this conclusion only, but the same result has been reached on consideration of the factual merits.

We shall first consider the position of defendant Sherman Tractor & Equipment Co.

The Supreme Court in the Gulf Oil case, supra, enumerated the following factors to be weighed in determining whether a suit should be dismissed for forum non conveniens: The relative case of access to the sources of proof, the availability of compulsory process for unwilling witnesses and the cost of securing the attendance of willing ones, the possibility of the need for a view of the premises which may be involved, the burden of jury duty on the forum, the onus of the trial on the court's efficient functioning, and the federal court's familiarity with the state law which will determine the controversy.

Plaintiffs allege that this defendant, Sherman, is a conspirator charged with having (1) coerced dealers to drop plaintiffs' products and to sell for Dearborn Motors Corporation, (2) caused dealers to continue to use plaintiffs' pamphlets and manuals after having ceased handling their products, (3) attempted to give the impression to Sherman's customers that Dearborn was the successor to plaintiffs, and (4) sold the Ford Tractor.

Eber C. Sherman, the motivating force of the Sherman Corporation, does not deny that his main offices are in this district, and that the Sherman Tractor & Equipment Co., is a New York corporation having carried on business in this district for many years. As a resident of this district, with most of its affairs centered here, it is quite clearly not entitled to a dismissal. It points, however, to the allegedly great inconvenience to its co-defendants and maintains that it is not an obstacle to dismissal, because it will stipulate to accept service within the Eastern District of Michigan (the most convenient district according to the defendants), and will make Eber C. Sherman, its president and alleged controlling stockholder, available there as a witness for plaintiffs.

In the Gulf Oil case, supra, the Supreme Court said that the doctrine of forum non conveniens should never be applied unless the defendant was amenable to process in the allegedly more convenient forum, Mr. Justice Jackson writing that, (at 507)

> "* * * In all cases in which the doctrine of forum non conveniens comes into play, it presupposes at least two forums in which the defendant is amenable to process; the doctrine furnishes criteria for choice between them."

Defendant, Sherman, argues that by its stipulation-waiving venue protection—he is amenable to suit in Michigan. [General Inv. Co. v. Lake Shore Ry., 260 U. S. 261, 279 (1922)]. It appears to be sounder policy to require that defendant be amenable to suit in the second jurisdiction, on the facts themselves, and not to accept stipulations such as that offered by defendant [Fifth & Walnut Inc., et al. v. Loew's Inc., et al. supra; Neal v. Pennsylvania Ry. Co., et al., (S. D. N. Y. Jan. 2, 1948); cf. Williams v. Palmer, 181 Misc. 610.] Defendants suggest that if such stipulations are not accepted, a plaintiff may defeat the rule of forum non conveniens by joining a defendant who is not amenable to suit in the other jurisdiction. Where a defendant is enjoined for this purpose, such subterfuge may readily be ignored. Suffice it to say that this is not claimed by defendants to be the situation in this litigation. The motion by Sherman must fail, despite its offer to stipulate, which does not alter the degree of convenience to it of trial in this district, though admittedly making the Eastern District of Michigan more acceptable to plaintiffs. [Tivoli Realty Co. v. Interstate Circuit, Inc. et al., C. C. A. 5, March 18, 1948 (unreported)]. [CCH Trade Regulation Reports ¶ 62,229.]

Sherman is a central figure in the alleged conspiracy. Since we have found that this district is not an inconvenient forum to it, this must be considered as an important factor against the dismissal of the complaint as to the other defendants. To require plaintiffs to sue Sherman here and the other defendants in Detroit would be the nadir of convenient administration.

Concerning all the defendants the following allegations are made by the plaintiffs—

The first alleged major object of the claimed conspiracy was to take over the distributor-dealer organization developed by plaintiffs over a period of years. Plaintiffs allege (and, defendants do not deny) that of thirty-three distributors in the organization, only one was in Michigan and the other thirty-two in other states. It appears that there were only 101 dealers in Michigan and 2749 in other states. Many of them will undoubtedly be called on the trial. While New York is not so strikingly fitting a place at which to interrogate these men, neither is it so strikingly unfit, compared with the Eastern District of Michigan, as to justify a disturbance of plaintiffs' choice of forum.

It is well to remember that "unless the balance is strongly in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff's choice of forum should rarely be disturbed," (Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, supra), and that only where the choice is vexatious and oppressive to defendant should it be put aside by the court. [Williams v. Green Bay & Western R. R., 326 U. S. 549 (1946); Gulf Oil case, supra].

Plaintiffs also point to a series of dealer-distributor meetings throughout the United States, one of which took place in this district (at Tuckahoe, N. Y.). Defendant, Dearborn, says that this meeting was conducted by Sherman, but admits that its officials attended. It is enough for now that Dearborn admits attendance and that it is contended by plaintiffs that the incident will be important at the trial. This propinquity of relevant events tends against finding this district to be inconvenient.

Another alleged major objective of the claimed conspiracy was to take over Ferguson's source of farm implements which were utilized in his tractor system. These implements are manufactured by forty-one independent companies of which but eight are in Michigan. Again, we note that while New York would not be ideal, Michigan would be slightly less so.

Where there is a litigation as is here involved, it is pointless to search for a forum to which all relevant matters will be convenient. The best that can be done is to select a relatively convenient one and to utilize the various means for discoveries under the federal rules to alleviate the inevitable inconveniences.

Another matter alleged is plaintiffs' efforts through a financier in New York to raise capital after the split with Ford. These negotiations were had in New York; most of the relevant evidence on this issue is very likely within this district, which is the recognized investment market of the world. Therefore, as to these items of proof New York is clearly the most convenient place.

No suggestion is made that we should decline jurisdiction because of some special relief available in a Michigan court that this court cannot grant. (Slater v. Mexican National R. Co., 194 U. S. 900).

It appears from the admitted occurrences at Tuckahoe, and from another similar meeting within this district at Beacon, N. Y., from the fact that Sherman, both the individual and the corporation have long been domiciled and conducted business here and that a considerable portion of the selling and advertising for the Ford tractor was effected in this district, that a substantial number of witnesses and documents will come from within and around this district.

Of the other possible witnesses, only the distributors and dealers above mentioned and the officials and employees of Ford are subject to compulsory process in Michigan out of the great number diffused throughout the country. The transportation facilities of air and rail to and from New York alleviate to a considerable extent the distance to be travelled. There is small likelihood, and defendants have not suggested, that this litigation will require a view of any points in Michigan. The bulk of the law to be applied is federal law.

The court does not find that trial in this district is either oppressive or vexatious to defendants—warranting a dismissal of the complaint.

Defendant, Dearborn, raises an additional ground for dismissal against it. It argues that it would be an undue burden on interstate commerce to compel it to defend this action in this district.

There can be no doubt but that Congress may burden and interfere with interstate commerce if it so chooses. [Kilpatrick v. Texas & Pacific Ry. Co., C. C. A. 2, March 4, 1948 (unreported); Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Vigor, 90 F. (2d) 7, 8]. By the Clayton Act venue provisions, Congress clearly intended, as indicated by Congressional voicings (noted above), to allow a plaintiff to sue a defendant in any jurisdiction provided for by the Act — whether or not it burdened interstate commerce. Defendant Dearborn would require Congress to explicitly state in each venue provision that burdens on interstate commerce were thereby authorized. There is no substance to this position.

We must consider next the issue of patent infringement alleged in the second cause of action.

Plaintiffs allege that defendants conspired to deliberately infringe its patents and accuses the present Ford tractor of being an infringing article.

Defendants argue that in this the court has no jurisdiction because of improper venue, under the patent venue, which provides that,

> "* * * In suits brought for the infringement of letters patent the district courts in the United States shall have no jurisdiction, in law or in equity, in the district of which the defendant is an inhabitant, or in any district in which the defendant, whether a person, partnership, or corporation, shall have committed acts of infringement and have a regular and established place of business. * * *" (28 USCA § 109)

Jurisdiction and venue of a cause of action for patent infringement are conferred exclusively by this section. (Stonite Products v. Melvin Lloyd Co., 315 U. S. 561; Blaw-Knox Co. v. Lederle, 151 F. (2d) 973).

As to the defendant Sherman there is clearly jurisdiction within the first clause of this section. Sherman relies again on its proposed stipulation, and in effect, prays for a dismissal alleging forum non conveniens to be applicable to patent suits. [Urquhart v. American-La-France Foamite Corporation, 144 F. (2d) 542, cert. den. 65 S. Ct. 273 (1944)]. Assuming, arguendo, that the doctrine of forum non conveniens is so applicable—since the suit on the other cause of action is to proceed here and since this is part of the same alleged conspiracy, we would be constrained to deny dismissal on grounds of forum here also. The other three defendants, Ford Motor Company, Henry Ford II and Dearborn Motor Corporation, not being inhabitants of this district, must be found to come within the alternative clause to give this court jurisdiction. These defendants must be shown both to have committed acts of infringement and to have a regular and established place of business within this district. One without the other is not enough. (Edison v. Allis-Chalmers Co., 191 Fed. 837, 839; Streat v. American Rubber Co., 115 Fed. 634).

There are three possible ways in which one may infringe a patent: by making a device covered by the patent; by using such a device; or by selling a patented device (35 USCA § 40).

Plaintiffs first point to alleged occurrences within the district at Tuckahoe and Beacon, New York. In the promotion of the new tractor, as alleged, Dearborn per force had a general campaign, part of which involved holding meetings throughout the country attended by local dealers with a tractor present. One such meeting was held in Tuckahoe and another in Beacon. Defendant Dearborn maintains, however, that he sold this tractor to Sherman in Detroit, that Sherman organized the meeting and all its affairs and that some Dearborn officials attended, but only as guests. Plaintiffs maintain that these meetings were organized and motivated by defendant Dearborn, that he flew the tractor in for the meeting and that, hence, the acts of infringement were Dearborn's. Sherman is the state distributor of Dearborn's national product, and it seems unlikely that Dearborn officials would be only guests at such meetings. Defendants do not deny that Dearborn officials attended, participated in the events and that the time and place for the meeting were set by Dearborn. Certainly, the latter must in some way have aided the selling of its own product. It would seem only reasonable to conclude that Dearborn was the motivating force behind the events, and that, if it was an act of infringement, as alleged, Dearborn was chargeable with it.

While mere display alone might not constitute an act of infringement, (Marlatt v. Mergenthaler Linotype Co., 70 F. Supp. 426, 431-32), it seems clear that here it was more than mere display, but rather that there was a promotion and a campaign for the marketing of this article. This necessitated a detailed explanation of the tractor and its operation and cost, and other germane subjects. While such activity might not alone amount to infringement (Patent Tube Corporation v. Bristol-Meyers Co., 25 F. Supp. 776), there is a more convincing circumstance alleged to have occurred within this district, involving all defendants, from which infringement may reasonably be inferred.

Plaintiffs, quoting a bulletin of Ford Motor Company, maintain that the first 28,000 tractors produced by Ford in 1947 had transmissions which jumped out of gear or locked in two gears simultaneously. It is alleged that 8,000 of these required "field conversion." It is fairly certain, from practical considerations, that the righting of these defective tractors required work on the part of Ford Motor Company, Dearborn and Sherman in this district. We cannot, therefore, conclude that defendants have not committed acts of infringement within this district. Plaintiffs' allegations that this tractor is an infringing device are accepted as true for the purposes of this motion.

As to Henry Ford II, individually, he represents the family who holds all the voting stock of the Ford Motor Company—he is admittedly the company itself. He directs, manages, controls and speaks for this family enterprise. We might well query whether it would be of any point to dismiss the second cause of action against him and maintain it against the Ford Motor Company, and maintain the first cause of action against both. It has been held that in some situations that the cloak of corporate activity will not shield the interested individuals, and on this rationale, Ford individually would be bound by the infringement acts of the Company. Furthermore, as an alleged member of the claimed conspiracy he is liable, once the conspiracy has been established, for the acts of the other alleged conspirators committed to accomplish its alleged aims and purposes. [United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co. 310 U. S. 150, 253-54 (1940); Hitchman Coal v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, 249 (1917); Original Ballet Russe v. Ballet Theatre, 133 F. (2d) 187, 189]. He must, therefore, for this motion be considered to have committed the acts of infringement alleged within this district. Concluding that it is reasonable to infer that defendants have committed acts of infringement within this district, we must next inquire whether they have regular and established places of business in this district.

To satisfy this provision of the statute it is not enough that a party transact business in the district (Philips v. Baker, 121 F. (2d) 752, cert. den. 314 U. S. 688), or that it merely solicit business in it. (Elevator Supplies Co. v. Wagner Mfg. Co. 54 F. (2d) 937; Erickson v. Emerson, 40 F. Supp. 844). The ultimate distribution of a manufacturer's products within the district does not necessarily result in an act of infringement. (Bulldog Electric Prod. Co. v. Cole Electric Prod. Co., 134 F. (2d) 545). On the other hand, the regular and established place of business need not be the business connected with the alleged patent infringement. (Chadeloid Chemical Co. v. Chicago Wood Finish Co., 180 Fed. 770; Shelton v. Schwartz, 131 F. (2d) 805, 808).

The Ford Motor Company does not deny that it has been qualified to do business in New York since 1920, and that it has a regular place of business at 45 Rockfeller Plaza, New York City. The fact that in this district it deals with Ford cars and not tractors is immaterial to the issue involved. Henry Ford II must be considered, in effect, the Ford Motor Company for this purpose. Dearborn closely supervises the sales of Sherman in this district and frequently uses the latter's offices in Mount Vernon. It is alleged to be an instrumentality of Ford Motor Company; this company cannot escape liability to suit here by effecting its creations. (Vogt Instant Freezers v. N. Y. Eskimo Pie Corp., 69 F. (2d) 84, 86; Pacific Can Co. v. Hewes, 95 F. (2d) 42; Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Allis-Chalmers Co., 176 Fed. 362).

It is found for this motion that all the defendants have a regular and established place of business here within the meaning of the statute, and that this court has jurisdiction over the patent infringements alleged in the second cause of action. Patent suits have been dismissed where jurisdiction was doubtful. (Candas v.

Agnini, 14 F. Supp. 21; General Electric Co. v. Best Electric Co., 220 Fed. 347). This does not appear to be the case here. Moreover, even if it were, the fact that the first cause of action will be retained here would lead us to retain jurisdiction for trial over the second. It should be noted that approximately the same proofs will be made to substantiate each of the two alleged causes of action.

Sufficient has been produced by plaintiffs on this motion to warrant the trial of the alleged infringement in this district. The ultimate determination of the jurisdictional objections to the second cause of action can best be made at trial.

The third cause of action, alleging an equitable as well as a tort claim upon the same allegations as are set forth in the first and second causes of action, will depend upon the evidence adduced in support of these allegations. With the denial of the motions covering the first and second causes of action, it follows that the motion as to the third cause of action, must also be denied.

Motions denied.

[¶ 62,253] Edward P. Paul & Co., Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. No. 9457. Decided May 10, 1948.

On Petition to Review an Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Misrepresentation of Origin of Product—Cease and Desist Order.—A Commission order requiring an importer and manufacturer of porcelain products to cease and desist from using the legend "Imported—Du Barry" or any other legend or words indicative of French origin to designate products made in whole or in substantial part in Japan, without clearly disclosing the Japanese origin, and from representing in any manner that such products are of French or British origin, is affirmed. The Commission has not exceeded its jurisdiction in preventing the use of the word "Du Barry" when the word was used to convey the impression that the product was of French origin. The dissenting opinion states that the evidence was insufficient to support a conclusion that the use of the word was misleading. The contention that the advertisement could not be misleading because of the low price at which the product was sold is held to be an admission that the words are misleading and a contention that the natural implication of the words is offset by the price. The Commission has the power to direct that representations, admitted by this argument to be in themselves deceptive, be not used in the public distribution of the product.

See the Federal Trade Commission annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6650.070, 6650.130.

Notice of Hearing—Right to Show Cause.—The contention of petitioner that the Commission failed to observe the requirement of the Act that a notice of hearing, giving a date and place fixed, must be given, is held to be without substance.

See the Federal Trade Commission annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.387.

Motion to Quash Report—No Error to Deny.—A motion to quash the examiner's report was properly overruled. The rules of the Commission do not require the examiner to submit his report 15 days after the close of testimony, as petitioner contends, but within 15 days after receipt by him of the transcript of testimony. The record does not disclose when the examiner received the transcript; hence there is no factual basis for the contention.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.489.

Order Not Void for Vagueness—Order Affirmed.—The contention that petitioner cannot determine with precision when a product may be made "in substantial part" in Japan, is rejected. The term "in substantial part" becomes vague only when one attempts to come as close to the line of misrepresentation as the Commission will permit. Petitioner can avoid difficulty by merely being accurately true in its advertisements.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6125.470.

Affirming the order of the Federal Trade Commission in Dkt. 5202.

For petitioner: Nathan L. Silberberg.

For respondent: Donovan R. Divet, Special Attorney Federal Trade Commission; William T. Kelley, General Counsel, and Walter B. Wooden, Associate General Counsel, Federal Trade Commission, on the brief.

Before STEPHENS, CLARK and PRETTYMAN, JJ.

PRETTYMAN, J.: Petitioner is an importer and manufacturer of porcelain products sold by it principally to retail stores. It publishes and distributes from time to time to some 25,000 retailers a catalog. Among other items in this catalog was a "line" of table lamps, cigarette boxes, ash trays and candy boxes concerning which the following expressions were used as descriptive: "Imported 'Du Barry' Porcelain", "Imported Hand Decorated 'Du Barry' Porcelain", and "'Du Barry' Porcelain Table Lamps are nationally famous as reproductions of rare original French and English 'old pieces'". The respondent Commission issued a complaint, the burden of which was that by the advertising the petitioner represented and implied, and purchasers were led to believe, that the products were of British or French origin; that the representations were false, deceptive and misleading, in that the porcelain part of the products was made in Japan. After extended hearings, the Commission issued an order in which it required petitioner to cease and desist from using the legend "Imported—Du Barry" or any other legend or words indicative of French origin, to designate or describe products made in whole or in substantial part in Japan, without clearly disclosing the Japanese origin, and from representing in any manner that products made in whole or in substantial part in Japan are of French or British origin. This petition is for review of that order.

Petitioner's first point is that the Commission has exceeded its jurisdiction, because the order aims to prevent the company's use of its trademark, the word "Du Barry". The order does not purport to interfere with the use of the trademark. It merely directs that the company not represent to the public that products made in Japan are imported from elsewhere. The advertising above quoted was not a mere unadorned use of the word "Du Barry". It was an affirmative representation as to the nature of the product. There was substantial testimony that the advertising conveyed to both retailers and consumers the impression that the porcelain was of French origin. A reading of the advertisement and an observation of the products presented as exhibits lead one to conclude that this testimony was reasonable and neither strained nor improbable. A lamp, for example, is advertised as "imported 'Du Barry' porcelain, reproduction of rare original French piece," when as a matter of fact it consists of a piece of Japanese porcelain set in a metal base manufactured in this country. It is unnecessary to cite authority that in this posture of the case the court cannot disturb the findings.

The company says that the advertisement could not be misleading, because of the very low price at which the product is sold. It says that any purchaser would know that porcelain imported from France could not be sold at these low prices. But that arguments cuts both ways. Its basic assumption is that porcelain imported from France is of much greater value than that made elsewhere, so much so that any purchaser would know that fact. Thus, the premise is an admission that the words of the advertisement are misleading, and the ensuing contention is that the natural implication of the words is offset by the price. In substance, the argument is that a seller has a right to envelop a cheap article in an admittedly misleading aura of value so long as the price remains low. The answer is that the order of the Commission is merely that the terms which are misleading be eliminated. The Commission is not penalizing the company or ordering it to cease doing any business whatever. It merely directs that representations, admitted by this particular argument to be in themselves deceptive, be not used in the public distribution of the product. We have no doubt of its power and duty to do so.

Petitioner next contends that the Commission failed to observe the requirement of the Act that a notice of hearing, giving a date and place fixed, must be given. It says that the Act further requires that the corporation complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and "show cause" why an order should not be entered by the Commission.[1] The facts are that this company was given a notice of the time and place of the hearing before an examiner; that before the date thus fixed it was notified formally and in writing that another date, of which it would be duly notified, would be fixed; that by an order of November 22, 1944, the date at which the taking of testimony would begin was fixed as November 30, 1944; that on November 30th counsel for the company announced "The respondent is ready", making no objection as to lack of notice or of opportunity to prepare; that thereafter extended hearings on notice were held, in the course of which continuances were had from time to time, the dates for reconvening being announced in advance on the record, and without objection; that the petitioner, by counsel, participated in all the hearings; that counsel for the Commission first placed in the record the evidence which its staff had gathered in support of the complaint; that thereafter the company was afforded ample opportunity to present such evidence as it desired to present; that an examiner's report was filed; and that thereafter a hearing was had before the Commission upon that report and the exceptions to it. Petitioner's contention seems to be that under the Act it was entitled, as a matter of right, to show cause why an order should not be entered, before testimony in support of the complaint was placed in the record, and also that the various continuances of the hearing violated the company's rights. The premises for these contentions are not clear in the brief. There it is said that "The time mentioned in the complaint was wholly superficial" and "There was no show-cause hearing then or at any other time." We perceive no substance in the contentions thus stated.

Petitioner's next point is that its motion to quash the examiner's report should have been granted, because, it says, Commission Rule XX (July 1, 1944) required the examiner to submit his report 15 days after the close of testimony, and this examiner made his report 164 days after the hearing ended. It is sufficient to note that the Commission's rule is not as petitioner says. Rule XX of the Commission's Rules of Practice (July 1, 1944) requires that the examiner shall, within 15 days "after receipt by him of the complete stenographic transcript of all testimony in a proceeding," file his report. There is nothing in this record to show when the examiner received the transcript. Hence there is no factual basis upon which petitioner's contention can rest.[2]

Petitioner says that the order is void because it is too vague to be followed. It says that it cannot determine with precision when a product may be made "in substantial part" in Japan. It points to articles of which the part most striking upon observation may be the porcelain but of which the more costly parts may be the metal base or other parts added in this country, or elsewhere than in Japan. It says that it has no yardstick by which to determine what is meant by "in substantial part" of Japanese origin. The answer to this contention is that the order of the Commission merely requires the company to represent accurately, or else not to represent at all, the place of origin of its products. If the porcelain portion of a product is made in Japan and the other parts are made in the United States or elsewhere, a simple indication of that fact in the catalog would satisfy the Commission's order. The company says that its advertisements have not been misleading, and it thereby indicates a desire not to mislead. If that be so, it should have no objection to making its advertisements clear. If it has no desire to conceal the fact that the porcelain portion of these products is made in Japan, it could have no possible objection to so stating in its advertisements. The term "in substantial part" becomes vague only when one attempts to come as close to the line of misrepresentation as the Commission will permit. We find nothing objectionable in the use of the term in the order. The company can avoid difficulty with it by merely being accurately true in its advertisements.

[2] Neither petitioner's brief nor the printed joint appendix shows the date when the actual hearings ended, except for petitioner's statement that "Here the Examiner made his report 164 days after the hearing ended." That report was dated September 17, 1945. The last date appearing in the original record (not printed) as a day of taking testimony is April 5, 1945. That record contains a formal order of the Examiner, dated August 10, 1945, "closing taking of testimony". Prior to that latter date the Rules of the Commission had been amended, and the Rules promulgated July 1, 1945, required the Examiner to file his report "not later than thirty (30) days after receipt by him of the complete stenographic transcript of all testimony and all exhibits in the proceeding".

The order of the Commission will be affirmed and the petitioner company directed to obey the terms of that order.[8]

Affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

CLARK, J. (dissenting): I find myself completely unable to agree with the decision of the court in this case. I believe the finding of the Federal Trade Commission to be not only arbitrary and capricious in the extreme but also absurd and ridiculous.

The facts are very simple. Petitioner, Paul, had for many years manufactured and sold a line of so-called "art objects", i. e., lamps, porcelain and art ware, using as a trade name the name "Du Barry." Some of the material for this line of goods came from Italy, some from Czecho-Slovakia, some from Hungary, some from Yugoslavia, some from Japan. This importing practice had prevailed for many years.

The gist of the present action by the Commission is that an insertion was made in a catalogue intended to be and actually circulated to retailers only, and not to the general public, which described this line of goods as "Imported Du Barry", and further stated that it consisted of copies of well-known French and British specimens of the same class. Now, mark well, there is not a scintilla of evidence in the whole record concocted by the Commission that contradicts in the slightest degree the statements in the catalogue. Not one single word denies (1) that the articles were imported, (2) that they were marketed under a well recognized trade name "Du Barry," (3) that they were copies of well-recognized French and English masterpieces.

None of these facts were disputed. Moreover there was not one witness to testify that he or she had been misled into purchasing any of this line by any statement in the catalogue circulated to dealers. The proceeding was instituted on the complaint of a disgruntled retailer who had had several quarrels with petitioner on account of her singular reluctance, not to say resistance, toward paying her bills. The chief witness was the merchandise manager of a department store who neither bought nor sold goods, and was, moreover, embittered by the refusal of petitioner to give him an exclusive contract for the sale of goods. The so-called "public" witnesses, selected by the Commission, which was trying the case, were simply called in off the street and asked a hypothetical question which left out one of the most vital issues in the case—the question of the price at which the imported articles were sold. To be sure there was also the testimony of a man who qualified as an expert, on the basis of six weeks experience in the business, that someone might be misled, although he knew of no one who ever had been so misled.

It is on the basis of such testimony as this that the Commission arrives at the momentous conclusion that the term "Imported Du Barry" indicates origin from either France or Great Britain. Conceding the expertness of the Commission on such matters it is nevertheless incumbent on this court to check the bases of the Commission's opinion.

If, for instance, there is anything in the name Du Barry to make it a national trade mark for France or Great Britain there is no finding of fact made by the Federal Trade Commission to justify this, nor is there any justification in history so far as is known. If the specialists of the Federal Trade Commission have such evidence they were notably negligent in producing it in the trial of this case, and it is remarkable chiefly from its entire absence in the opinion and decision in the case.

To be sure, in the middle of the 18th century, a nameless waif, the illegitimate daughter of a poor washerwoman in Vaucouleurs, France, became a successful courtesan under the name of Mlle. Lange. Her great charm brought her under the protection of Jean, Comte du Barry, who used her as a decoy in his gambling house. Finding her very successful in this regard, he succeeded by devious means in introducing her to the notice of the King, who was captivated by her, with the result that she became his mistress. Since court etiquette forbade her introduction at court without a title and since Comte Jean was married and divorce was impracticable under French law at that time, Jean's brother Guillaume married the lady. Which of the three, the King's light of love, the erstwhile "protector" Comte Jean, or his brother, the complaisant husband, has been adopted by the Commission as a perpetual and national trade mark for both France and Great Britain does not clearly appear from the Commission's conclusion.

So far as history records the only connection that any one of them ever had with the unfortunate British to whom the Federal Trade Commission now attaches them is the final trip which Madame Du Barry made to England to try to sell her jewels, the ill-gotten gains from her affair with King Louis XV, for which she was beheaded in the French Revolution.

Petitions for Review of Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Conspiracy to Restrain Trade—Concurrent Use of Delivered Price System—Violation of Section 5 of Act.—A Commission order based on findings that petitioners engaged in a conspiracy to restrict and suppress actual and potential competition in the distribution and sale of rigid steel conduit in commerce, effectuated by the adoption and use of a basing point method of quoting prices for rigid steel conduit, and upon the conclusion that such conduct constitutes an unfair method of competition, in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, is affirmed. The finding of conspiracy need not be based on direct proof of an agreement. Such an agreement may be shown by circumstantial evidence such as evidence herein of collective activities to promote general use of the pricing formula. The decision of the Supreme Court in the Cement Institute case, which held that individual conduct which falls short of being a Sherman Act violation may as a matter of law constitute an unfair method of competition prohibited by the Federal Trade Commission Act, and that the determination of what conduct amounts to unfair methods of competition was left to the Commission and the courts, is cited as authority for the decision. It is further held that in the light of the opinion in the Cement Institute case, it cannot be said that the Commission erred in concluding that the individual use of the basing point method as here used does constitute an unfair method of competition.

See the Federal Trade Commission Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 6380.63.

For petitioners: Morton Peyser, Hoyt A. Moore, Thurlow M. Gordon, Robert M. Bozeman, Edward H. Green, and Roy L. Steinheimer, all of New York City; W. Denning Stewart of Pittsburgh; Ferris E. Hurd of Chicago, and Earl J. O'Brien.

For respondent: Walter B. Wooden, Washington, D. C.

Affirming the decision of the Federal Trade Commission in Docket 4452.

Before SPARKS, KERNER, and MINTON, Circuit Judges.

[Nature of Action]

KERNER, C. J.: Petitioners, fourteen corporate manufacturers of rigid steel conduit, and five representatives of these corporations ask us to review and set aside a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission, upon a complaint in two counts, charging that petitioners collectively have violated § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 45, which declares unlawful "unfair methods of competition in commerce." Each of the corporate petitioners except Spang Chalfant was a member of Rigid Steel Conduit Association. That association was a respondent in the proceedings before the Commissioner, but is not a petitioner here. Each of the five individual petitioners was not only an official of one of the corporate petitioners but also served in an official capacity in directing the affairs of Rigid Steel Conduit Association.

In substance the first count alleged the existence and continuance of a conspiracy for the purpose and with the effect of substantially restricting and suppressing actual and potential competition in the distribution and sale of rigid steel conduit in commerce, effectuated by the adoption and use of a basing point method of quoting prices for rigid steel conduit. The second count did not rest upon an agreement or combination. It charged that each corporate petitioner and others violated § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act "through their concurrent use of a formula method of making delivered price quotations with the knowledge that each did likewise, with the result that price competition between and among them was unreasonably restrained." It alleged that nearby customers were deprived of price advantages which they would have naturally enjoyed by reason of their proximity to points of production, and that such course of action created in said conduit sellers a monopolistic control over price in the sale and distribution of rigid steel conduit.

Petitioners answered the complaint. They denied any agreement or combination. After extensive hearings before a trial examiner, the Commission made its findings of fact and conclusions of law therefrom. It found the charges to be fully substantiated by the evidence.

Rigid steel conduit[1] is a steel pipe, used primarily in the roughing-in stage of building construction where electrical wiring is necessary in order to furnish a continuous channel or container for the wiring. It is made from standard steel pipe and is produced in two types differing only in the nature of the coating applied to it. It is a standard commodity. It was first manufactured in America in 1897, in or near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and originally was sold at delivered prices. The reason why delivered prices were used lay in the relative importance of transportation charges in the sale of the product. Points of production include Cohoes, New York and various places in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, West Virginia and Ohio. Various means were used to facilitate the calculation of delivered prices, but Youngstown was the first manufacturer to prepare a freight rate bulletin specially applicable to conduit sales. Similar bulletins were prepared by other manufacturers and later such bulletins were procured by some manufacturers from a traffic expert.

In addition to freight rate bulletins, another aid in computing delivered prices was the use of delivery charge tables, which were designed to simplify the procedure of figuring the delivered prices, and each petitioner refrained from publishing price quotations f.o.b. point of production or shipment, but used the practice and method of quoting price sheets, which it termed "Price Cards," in which it designated base prices f. o. b. Pittsburgh, Pa. and f. o. b. Chicago, Ill. About 1912 one manufacturer began announcing quotations of prices, based on Pittsburgh as a basing point, through the use of price cards which listed "Pittsburgh Basing Discounts" under which the discount was decreased—and the net price thereby increased—in proportion to the freight rate from Pittsburgh to the point of delivery. The practice thus established was followed by other manufacturers then in existence, and since then, up to 1930, by other manufacturers as they have entered the conduit business.

In 1930, petitioner National Electric shifted from the list and discount form of delivered price quotation to a quotation which specified the net base prices, with freight to be added, and during the next year or so other manufacturers likewise changed to the quotation of net base prices plus freight. In 1924, conduit began to be sold at prices based on Gary, Indiana, as a basing point. During that year petitioner Youngstown began to manufacture conduit at Evanston, Illinois, and inaugurated the practice of quoting and selling conduit at delivered prices based on Evanston, as well as Pittsburgh, as a basing point, the base price at Evanston being $4 above the current published price at Pittsburgh. Clayton Mark, during the period (1924-1930), had quoted conduit prices upon a Chicago base. Since freight rates from Chicago and Evanston were the same, Evanston ceased to be a basing point shortly after 1934. Other manufacturers followed the practices inaugurated by Youngstown and Clayton Mark.

It also appears that instead of petitioner conduit sellers using an absolute Pittsburgh plus system for all designations in their price quotations, they collectively discussed and considered the matter of maintaining and utilizing Chicago as a basing point, with its differential over Pittsburgh, and that until 1930 they followed a method of calculating delivered price quotations which provided for discounting from the Pittsburgh or Chicago base price, depending upon which base price and accompanying discount produced the lower figure at the customer's destination, and that during 1930 representatives of petitioners at a meeting of the Rigid Steel Conduit section of the National Electrical Manufacturers Association determined upon a change from that method to the one they now use. Accordingly, at the time of the hearings each of the petitioner conduit sellers quoted delivered prices for conduit based on Chicago as well as on Pittsburgh as basing points and sold at that base price.

There was testimony that the system thus used was an effective means of matching bids and price quotations, and that the quotations made by each conduit seller, irrespective of whether it had a manufacturing plant located at or near Pittsburgh or Chicago, enabled them to match their price quotations. It also appears that at times it was difficult to exactly determine the railroad tariff rate and that mistakes by some conduit sellers in the selection of a particular tariff rate to be used in a particular instance were a fruitful source of differences in the delivered prices quoted, thereby preventing a matching of such quotations. To prevent such errors, petitioners, acting through Rigid Steel Conduit Association, employed one Donley, who prepared a compilation of freight rate applicators containing the freight factor applicable from Pittsburgh to various destinations in the United States and, on a differential of $4 per ton above the Pittsburgh base price, the freight applicable from Chicago. These compilations became important adjuncts to petitioners' plans and methods in matching delivered price quotations. They were intended by petitioners to be used as their common price factors.

[Findings]

The findings upon which the order of the Commission is based are lengthy and of a comprehensive nature. In these findings the petitioners are identified by name in connection with the particular activities engaged in by them as part of their general plan of suppressing price competition through the combination charged. Essentially the findings are, that there was collective consideration of pricing policies on the part of representatives of petitioners in 1930 and collective considerations by such representatives of those matters through November, 1939; that by petitioners' adherence to their formula or system of pricing, their matching of bids under seal and the matching of their delivered price quotations was made effective, and a combination and conspiracy was maintained by petitioners to deprive purchasers of conduit of the benefits of competition in price, to maintain artificial and monopolistic methods and prices in the sale and distribution of conduit, to prepare and maintain common rate factors or freight adders used and useful in determining and establishing price quotations and prices for conduit, to classify customers of conduit and determine the treatment to be accorded them, to establish and maintain uniform discounts, terms and conditions of sale, to determine and control the use of warehouses in the distribution of conduit, to prepare, adopt, and use for the purpose of aiding in price maintenance and control, uniform contracts for distributors and for contractors buying for specific projects, and to enforce the terms of such contracts through investigations and reports thereon, to support and maintain their price structure through the conduct of investigations of sales and offers to sell, and the circulation of reports thereon; and that the acts and practices performed thereunder and in connection therewith, hindered, lessened and suppressed competition among sellers in the sale and distribution of conduit in interstate commerce.

These ultimate findings of fact are based upon subsidiary findings. It will not be necessary in this opinion to set forth these findings, as they appear in 38 Federal Trade Commission Decisions, 534-551. Upon these findings of fact the Commission concluded that these acts and practices constituted unfair methods of competition in commerce within the meaning of § 5 of the Act, and directed petitioners, other than General Electric Supply Corporation and Spang Chalfant, to cease and desist from entering into, continuing in, or carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, agreement, combination, or conspiracy between any two or more of petitioners, or between any one or more of petitioners and others not parties hereto, to do or perform any of the things specifically set forth in the order. For the injunctive paragraphs covering the specific activities, see 38 F. T. C. decisions, 593.

Petitioners assert that no finding was made as to when the conspiracy was instituted, how long it continued, and which respondents (petitioners) were members thereof. They insist that the Commission has failed to make a finding as to the conspiracy charged, together with findings which would disclose how and in what manner each of the petitioners became a member thereof.

In support of their contention, petitioners argue that the finding > "Paragraph Nineteen: (a) Pursuant to Count I of the complaint herein the Commission concludes from the evidence of record and therefore finds that the capacity tendency and effect of the combination and conspiracy maintained by the respondents [petitioners] named therein in the manner aforesaid, and the acts and practices performed thereunder and in connection therewith * * * has been, and is, to hinder, lessen, restrain, and suppress competition in the sale and distribution of conduit * * *," is wholly insufficient in law, because, so they say, the finding is only a description of the "capacity tendency, and effect" of the conspiracy.

In considering this contention, it is well to remember that findings are to be construed liberally in support of a judgment or order, Rank v. Kuhn, 20 N. W. 2d 72. Whenever, from facts found, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inferences will be deemed to have been drawn, Clyde Equipment Co. v. Fiorito, 16 F. 2d 106, 107, and any words which fairly import a concerted action for a conniving together to restrain trade, are sufficient to charge conspiracy, American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 147 F. 2d 93, 117.

Pertinent and akin to the question we are now discussing are the words of Mr. Justice Douglas in his concurring opinion in the case of United States v. Line Material Company, rendered March 8, 1948, in which case, after stating that the Sherman Act outlaws price fixing combinations, he said: "Price fixing in any form is perhaps the most powerful of all inducements for abandonment of competition. * * *. It is therefore one of the most effective devices to regiment whole industries and exact a monopoly price from the public. The benefits of competition disappear." And in the case of United States v. United States Gypsum Co., also decided by the United States Supreme Court on March 8, 1948, the court said that price fixing, without authorizing statutes, is illegal, per se. See also Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 220 U. S. 373; Federal Trade Commission v. Pacific States Paper Trade Association, 273 U. S. 52; United States v. Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U. S. 392. Any combination which tampers with price structures is engaged in an unlawful activity. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 221. And the existence of a plan or method which equalizes the delivered costs or prices of competitors having widely different freight costs to given destinations constitutes strong evidence in itself of an agreement to use such plan or system. Milk and Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Commission, 152 F. 2d 478; Fort Howard Paper Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 156 F. 2d 899. And price uniformity especially if accompanied by an artificial price level not related to the supply and demand of a given commodity may be evidence from which an agreement or understanding, or some concerted action of sellers operating to restrain commerce, may be inferred. Cement Manufacturers Protective Association v. United States, 268 U. S. 588, 606; Eugene Dietzgen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 142 F. 2d 321. The fixing of prices by one member of a group, pursuant to express delegation, acquiescence, or understanding, is just as illegal as the fixing of prices by direct, joint action. United States v. Masonite Corporation, 316 U. S. 265, 276. Moreover, the question we are now discussing was considered and decided in the Federal Trade Commission v. The Cement Institute, announced by the Supreme Court on April 26, 1948. In disposing of the identical question, the court solved our problem. It said:

> "It seems impossible to conceive that anyone reading these findings in their entirety could doubt that the Commission found that respondents, collectively maintained a multiple basing point delivered price system for the purpose of suppressing competition in cement sales. The findings are sufficient. The contention that they are not is without substance."

Petitioners also stress the point that the use of the basing point method of pricing does not have any adverse effect on competition and is not oppressive. They contend that in the event we should hold that the Commission made a finding that there was a price fixing conspiracy, such a finding is not supported by the evidence.

The argument is that there is no direct evidence of any conspiracy; that if the Commission made such a finding, it is based upon a series of inferences; and that the general use of the basing point method of pricing and the uniformity of prices does not justify an inference of conspiracy. We think there was direct proof of the conspiracy, but whether there was or was not, in determining if such a finding is supported, it is not necessary that there be direct proof of an agreement. Such an agreement may be shown by circumstantial evidence. Milk and Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, 480.

In this case there was evidence showing collective action to eliminate the Evanston basing point, and collective activities in promoting the general use of the formula presently to be noted. The record clearly establishes the fact that conduit manufacturers controlling 93% of the industry use a system under which they quote only delivered prices, which are determined in accordance with a formula consisting of a base price at Pittsburgh or Chicago plus rail freight, depending upon which basing point price controls at any particular destination or in any particular section of the United States; that as a result of using that formula the conduit producers were enabled to match their delivered price quotations, and purchasers everywhere were unable to find price advantages anywhere; and that purchasers at or near a place of production could not buy more cheaply from their nearby producer than from producers located at greater distances, and producers located great distances from any given purchaser quoted as low a delivered price as that quoted by the nearest producer.

An example of an instance where petitioners have matched their bids appears where the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, United States Navy Department requested bids under seal for the furnishing of one million feet of conduit for delivery at the Navy Yards in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Norfolk and Sewell's Point, Virginia. Seven of the petitioners submitted bids and matched their price quotations in terms of dollars per foot down to the fourth decimal point. Of course, there were other instances in the record showing identity of bids. Not only did petitioners match their bids when submitted under seal to agencies of public bodies, but each, with the knowledge of the others, did likewise—used the formula for the purpose of presenting to prospective private purchasers conditions of matched price quotations.

In this state of the record it will be enough to say that Congress has left to the Commission the determination of the facts, Federal Trade Commission v. A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., 324 U. S. 746, and the weight to be attributed to the facts proved and the inferences to be drawn from them, Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 324 U. S. 726, 739. See also United States Maltsters Ass'n v. Federal Trade Commission, 152 F. 2d 161; Milk and Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Commission, supra; Fort Howard Paper Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra; and Federal Trade Commission v. The Cement Institute, supra. Our study of this record and of the applicable law has convinced us that the Commission was justified in drawing the inference that the petitioners acted in concert in a price-fixing conspiracy.

We now turn to consider petitioners' contention that the individual use of the basing point method, with knowledge that other sellers use it, does not constitute an unfair method of competition. This contention embodies the theory of the second count of the complaint and of that part of the order to cease and desist that is directed against each of the corporate petitioners.

Briefly, the argument is that individual freight absorption is not illegal per se, and that the Commission's order is a denial of the right to meet competition. More specifically, petitioners say that conduit is a homogeneous product; that no buyer will pay more for the product of one seller than he will for that of another; that the buyer is not interested in the seller's cost of transportation or in any other factor of the seller's cost; that effective competition requires that traders have large freedom of action when conducting their own affairs; that in any particular market, the seller must adjust his own price to meet the market price or retire from that market altogether; that it has always been the custom of merchants to send their goods to distant markets to be sold at the prices there prevailing; that there is no lessening of competition, or injury to competitors, when a seller absorbs freight traffic to meet lawful competition; and that it is for the court to decide as a matter of law what constitutes an unfair method of competition under § 5 of the Act. Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz, 253 U. S. 421.

On the other hand, the Commission contends that unfair methods of competition include not only methods that involve deception, bad faith, and fraud, but methods that involve oppression or such as are against public policy because of their dangerous tendency unduly to hinder competition or create monopoly.

As already noted, each conduit seller knows that each of the other sellers is using the basing point formula; each knows that by using it he will be able to quote identical delivered prices and thus present a condition of matched prices under which purchasers are isolated and deprived of choice among sellers so far as price advantage is concerned. Each seller must systematically increase or decrease his mill net price for customers at numerous destinations in order to match the delivered prices of his competitors. Each seller consciously intends not to attempt the exclusion of any competition from his natural freight advantage territory by reducing the price, and in effect invites the others to share the available business at matched prices in his natural market in return for a reciprocal invitation.

In this situation, and indeed all parties to these proceedings agree, the legal question presented is identical with the one the Supreme Court considered in the Federal Trade Commission v. The Cement Institute case, supra. In that case, after stating that the Commission has jurisdiction to declare what conduct is an unfair method of competition, the court said: "* * * individual conduct, * * * which falls short of being a Sherman Act violation may as a matter of law constitute an unfair method of competition' prohibited by the Trade Commission Act. A major purpose of that Act * * * was to enable the Commission to restrain practices as 'unfair' which, although not yet having grown into Sherman Act dimensions would most likely do so if left unrestrained. The Commission and the courts were to determine what conduct, even though it might then be short of a Sherman Act violation, was an 'unfair method of competition.' This general language was deliberately left to the 'Commission and the courts' for definition because it was thought that 'There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field'; that consequently, a definition that fitted practices known to lead toward an unlawful restraint of trade today would not fit tomorrow's new inventions in the field; and that for Congress to try to keep its precise definitions abreast of this course of conduct would be an 'endless task'."

[Conclusion]

In the light of that opinion, we cannot say that the Commission was wrong in concluding that the individual use of the basing point method as here used does constitute an unfair method of competition.

In their briefs and upon oral argument, petitioners have raised additional points. These, too, have been examined and considered by the Supreme Court in the Federal Trade Commission v. The Cement Institute case, supra, and were found lacking in merit. Hence they need not be discussed by us.

[Order Affirmed]

The Commission's order is affirmed and an enforcement decree will be entered. It is so ordered.

[¶ 62,255] United States v. Universal Button Fastening and Button Company.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division. Civil Action No. 5860. May 7, 1948.

Sherman, Clayton Antitrust Acts

Consent Judgment—Practices Enjoined—Licensing Required.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging a manufacturer of button fastening machinery with violations of the antitrust laws enjoins defendant from: leasing or selling fastening machinery or from fixing a price charged therefor, on the condition that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not purchase, deal in, or use the fasteners of competitors of defendant; conditioning the availability of fastening machinery, parts, or repairs therefor upon the securement of fasteners from defendant or any other designated source; engaging in agreements or arrangements having the purpose or effect of continuing, reviving, or renewing violations alleged in the complaint; conditioning any license or immunity to practice any invention related to fastening machinery claimed in any United States patent by the tying of any such license or immunity to the securement of fasteners or similar products from defendant or any other designated source; and instituting or threatening to institute litigation for infringement. Defendant is directed to grant non-exclusive licenses at a uniform, reasonable royalty, under any and all existing patents, to all applicants therefor.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.401, 1530.50, 1540.27, 1590, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.11.

For plaintiff: John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General; Sigmund Timberg, Manuel M. Gorman, Grant W. Kelleher, Richard B. O'Donnell, Special Assistants to the Attorney General, all of Washington, D. C.; and Thomas P. Thornton, United States Attorney, Detroit, Mich.

For defendant: Angell, Turner, Dyer & Meek, Detroit, Mich.

Final Judgment

KOSCINSKI, J.: The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint in this action on July 29, 1946; defendant, Universal Button Fastening and Button Company, having appeared and filed its answer to said complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; and the plaintiff and said defendant by their respective attorneys having consented to the entry of this final judgment herein:

NOW, THEREFORE, before the taking of any testimony, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party with respect to any such issue, and upon the consent of the parties hereto, the Court being advised and having considered the matter it is hereby

ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties to this judgment; the complaint states a cause of action against defendant, Universal Button Fastening and Button Company, under the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", said Act being commonly known as the "Sherman Antitrust Act", and under the Act of Congress of October 15, 1914, as amended entitled "An Act to Supplement Existing Laws Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies, and For Other Purposes", amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, said Act being commonly known as the "Clayton Act".

II

[Terms Defined]

When used in this final judgment, the following terms have the meanings assigned respectively to them below:

(a) "Fasteners" means tack-attached or staple-attached buttons, rivets, burrs, and snap fasteners for the fastening of clothing.

"(b) "Fastening machinery" means machinery and accessories for attaching fasteners to clothing.

(c) "Existing patents" means all presently issued United States letters patent owned or controlled by defendant, Universal Button Fastening and Button

Company, or under which it has power to issue licenses or sublicenses, relating to fastening machinery, consisting of the following numbered United States patents:

1,678,616	1,798,969
1,798,970	2,048,930
2,196,159	2,161,404
2,292,223	2,362,630

and renewals, reissues, divisions and extensions of any such patent.

III

[Applicability]

The provisions of this judgment applicable to defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company shall apply to each of its subsidiaries, successors, and assigns, and to each of its officers, directors, agents, nominees, employees, and to any other person acting under, through or for such defendant.

IV

[Practices Enjoined]

Defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company be and hereby is enjoined and restrained from:

A. Leasing or making any sale or contract, or adhering to any contract for the sale or lease of fastening machinery, whether patented or unpatented, for use or resale within the United States, or any territory thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or from fixing a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not purchase, use or deal in the fasteners of a competitor or competitors of defendant, Universal Button Fastening and Button Company.

B. Conditioning the availability of fastening machinery or parts or repairs thereof upon the securement of fasteners from the defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company or any other designated source.

C. Removing fastening machinery from the premises of any lessee because such lessee purchases, uses, or deals in fasteners manufactured or sold by any person other than defendant.

D. Engaging in, or participating in, contracts, agreements, understandings or arrangements having the purpose or effect of continuing, reviving, or renewing any of the violations of the antitrust laws alleged in paragraphs 6 to 8 inclusive, in the complaint herein.

E. Conditioning any license or immunity, expressed or implied, to practice any invention related to fastening machinery claimed in any United States patent by the tying of any license or immunity for such invention to the purchase or securement of fasteners or any similar product or article from the defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company or any other designated source.

F. Instituting or threatening to institute or maintaining any suit, counterclaim or proceeding, judicial or administrative, for infringement or to collect charges, damages, compensation or royalties alleged to have accrued prior to the date of this judgment under any existing patent.

[Licensing Required]

Defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company be and hereby is directed to grant to any applicant making a written request therefor a non-exclusive, non-assignable and unrestricted license, save for and at a uniform reasonable royalty, under any or all existing patents as listed in Section II (c). Any applicant for such license who fails to agree with defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company upon a reasonable royalty may apply to this court upon thirty days notice to defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company and to the Attorney General at Washington, D. C. to determine the reasonable royalty for such license.

VI

[Other Statutes]

Nothing in this judgment shall prevent defendant Universal Button Fastening and Button Company from availing itself of the benefits of (a) the Act of Congress of April 10, 1918, commonly called the Webb-Pomerene Act, (b) the Act of Congress of 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings Proviso to Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", or (c) save as elsewhere in this judgment provided of the patent laws.

[Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and upon reasonable notice to the defendant, Universal Button Fastening and Button Company, made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (1) access during the office hours of said defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment, and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means provided in this paragraph shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department except in the course of legal proceedings, to which the United States is a party, for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

VIII

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification, or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 62,256] United States v. United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, et al.

In the United States Supreme Court. No. 527. October Term, 1947. May 24, 1948.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Jurisdiction of Special Court to Issue Writ of Mandamus—Enforcement of Mandate Obstructed by District Court.—An action brought by the government to terminate an alleged monopoly in the manufacture and sale of aluminum was dismissed by the District Court; on appeal to the Supreme Court, that body disqualified itself, and, under a 1944 amendment to the Expediting Act, certified the question to a special court of three Circuit Judges, which reversed and remanded the case. A petition by plaintiff for a writ of mandamus directing the district judge to execute the mandate of the special court to vacate so much of its judgment on the mandate as reserves jurisdiction to enable the defendant to apply for a determination whether it still has a monopoly was denied by the special court, which held that its jurisdiction to issue mandamus existed only as an incident to its jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a judgment of the District Court, and that control over its mandate had expired with the end of the term of court in which the mandate had issued. It is held that the special court has the power to enforce obedience to its mandate. The amendment to the Expediting Act gave the Circuit Court of Appeals the full amplitude of judicial power to deal with the cause certified to it by the Supreme Court. That power does not contract with the importance or gravity of the question presented. The power to compel obedience with the mandate turns on whether the lower court has obstructed enforcement of it, not on the collateral repercussions which enforcement may entail.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.612, the Expediting Act, Vol. 1, ¶ 781, and prior opinions reported in 1941-1943 Supp. at ¶ 52,763, and at ¶ 57,342, ¶ 57,572, ¶ 57,642.

[Facts of Case]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The United States brought a proceeding against the Aluminum Company of America (Alcoa) and others to prevent and restrain certain violations of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, 4. After trial the District Court dismissed the complaint. 44 F. Supp. 97. The case came here by appeal, after which we ascertained that due to the disqualification of four Justices to sit in the case, we were without a quorum. Accordingly, we transferred the case to a special docket and postponed further proceedings in it until such time as there was a quorum of Justices qualified to sit in it. 320 U. S. 708. Thereafter Congress amended the statute which provides for a direct appeal to this Court from the District Court in antitrust cases. The Act of June 9, 1944, c. 239, 58 Stat. 272, 15 U. S. C. Supp. V, § 29, passed to meet the contingency of the lack of a quorum here, provides: [1]

> "In every suit in equity brought in any district court of the United States under any of said Acts, wherein the United States is complainant, an appeal from the final decree of the district court will lie only to the Supreme Court and must be taken within sixty days from the entry thereof: Provided, however, That if, upon any such appeal, it shall be found that, by reason of disqualification, there shall not be a quorum of Justices of the Supreme Court qualified to participate in the consideration of the case on the merits, then, in lieu of a decision by the Supreme Court, the case shall be immediately certified by the Supreme Court to the circuit court of appeals of the circuit in which is located the district in which the suit was brought which court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal in such case, and it shall be the duty of the senior circuit judge of said circuit court of appeals, qualified to participate in the consideration of the case on the merits, to designate immediately three circuit judges of said court, one of whom shall be himself and the other two of whom shall be the two circuit judges next in order of seniority to himself, to hear and determine the appeal in such case and it shall be the duty of the court, so comprised, to assign the case for argument at the earliest practicable date and to hear and determine the same, and the decision of the three circuit judges so designated, or of a majority in number thereof, shall be final and there shall be no review of such decision by appeal or certiorari or otherwise.
> "If, by reason of disqualification, death or otherwise, any of said three circuit judges shall be unable to participate in the decision of said case, any such vacancy or vacancies shall be filled by the senior circuit judge by designating one or more other circuit judges of the said circuit next in order of seniority and, if there be none such available, he shall fill any such vacancy or vacancies by designating one or more circuit judges from another circuit or circuits, designating, in each case, the oldest available circuit judge, in order of seniority, in the circuit from which he is selected, such designation to be only with the consent of the senior circuit judge of any such other circuit.
> "This Act shall apply to every case pending before the Supreme Court of the United States on the date of its enactment."

Thereupon we certified the cause to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. 322 U. S. 716. That court heard the case, sustained charges of monopoly against Alcoa, reversed the judgment of dismissal, and remanded the cause for further proceedings not inconsistent with its opinion. 148 F. 2d 416. It left open the question of the remedies to be applied. Nearly five years had passed since the evidence was closed, war had intervened, new plants had been constructed by the government, and their disposition under the Surplus Property Act of 1944, 58 Stat. 765, 50 U. S. C. A. § 1611, would affect the competitive situation in the ingot market. Petitioner had asked for Alcoa's dissolution. But that question was deferred until Alcoa's position in the industry after the war was known. 148 F. 2d pp. 445-447.

On remand of the cause the District Court entered its judgment on the mandate on April 23, 1946. It enjoined certain practices and retained jurisdiction of the cause until after the Surplus Property Administrator shall have proposed a plan for disposition of the government owned aluminum plants or facilities, in order that the Attorney General might institute proceedings for the dissolution or partial dissolution of Alcoa or for the enforcement of such plan if it will establish competitive conditions in the industry or for such other relief as will establish them; "and for the purpose of enabling Aluminum Company to apply to this court for a determination of the question whether it still has a monopoly of the aluminum ingot market in the United States."

Pursuant to the quoted provision Alcoa filed a petition in the District Court praying that a final judgment be entered adjudicating that it no longer has a monopoly of the aluminum ingot market in the United States and that as a consequence competitive conditions in the industry have been restored. The motion of the United States to dismiss the petition was denied and the question whether Alcoa still had a monopoly was set for trial. The United States thereupon filed a petition for a writ of mandamus in the Circuit Court of Appeals to require the district judge to vacate so much of its judgment of April 23, 1946, as reserved jurisdiction to enable Alcoa to apply for a determination whether it still has a monopoly, and to dismiss the petition of Alcoa.

The Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed the petition for mandamus. 164 F. 2d 159. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari which we granted to settle the important question under the Act.

The Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that its power to issue the writ of mandamus exists only as an incident to its jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from a judgment of the District Court. It read the Act of June 9, 1944, as confining its jurisdiction to the determination of the appeal which it had heard under our certificate. Moreover, control over its mandate ended with the end of the term during which the mandate went down.[2] The court therefore concluded that it had no power to issue the writ.

[Circuit Court Has Jurisdiction]

We put to one side the question whether another appeal in the case would be decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals or by this Court, now that there is a quorum of Justices qualified to sit in it. No matter how that question were resolved, it is our opinion that the Circuit Court of Appeals has jurisdiction in this mandamus proceeding.

Section 262 of the Judicial Code, 28 U. S. C. § 377, provides that the federal courts "shall have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law." It was early recognized that the power to issue a mandamus extended to cases where its issuance was either an exercise of appellate jurisdiction or in aid of appellate jurisdiction. See Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 175; Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 190. That power protects the appellate jurisdiction which might be otherwise defeated and extends to support an ultimate power of review, though it not be immediately and directly involved. McClellan v. Carland, 217 U. S. 268. Ex parte United States, 287 U. S. 241, 246. In that category will often fall cases involving issuance of mandamus requiring the lower court to enforce the judgment of the appellate court. Delaware L. & W. R. Co. v. Rellstab, 276 U. S. 1, 5.

But the fact that mandamus is closely connected with the appellate power does not necessarily mean that the power to issue it is absent where there is no existing or future appellate jurisdiction to which it can relate. Cf. Chickaming v. Carpenter, 106 U. S. 663, 665. In re Washington & Georgetown R. Co., 140 U. S. 91, is a case in point. The lower court in violation of the mandate of this Court allowed interest on a judgment. The amount of the interest was too small to be the subject of a writ of error from this Court. It was held that mandamus was the proper remedy to enforce compliance with the mandate. And see City Bank v. Hunter, 152 U. S. 512, 515. It is, indeed, a high function of mandamus to keep a lower tribunal from interposing unauthorized obstructions to enforcement of a judgment of a higher court. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Rellstab, supra. That function may be as important in protecting a past exercise of jurisdiction as in safeguarding a present or future one. When Congress authorized "the case" to be certified to the Circuit Court of Appeals, it excepted none of the powers of that court which might be brought to bear on the litigation. Those powers include the power to issue mandamus to protect the mandate of the Circuit Court of Appeals, even though we assume arguendo that all further appeals in the case would come here.

[2] The term of court in which the mandate issued expired September 30, 1945, on which day the court lost power to change it except as to matters of form. See Fairmont Creamery Co. v. Minnesota, 275 U. S. 70.

The Circuit Court of Appeals seems to have been influenced to the other view by the feeling that the question presented by the mandamus cuts so wide a swathe in the litigation that it should hold its hand. Its position was that the issue raised by the petition for mandamus had an important relation to the reserved problem of dissolution, that the judgment on dissolution would in its view eventually come here on appeal, that any ruling by it on the mandamus would therefore limit our freedom to deal with the dissolution issue as, if, and when it got here.

[Reversed]

Those considerations may be of large importance in the totality of this proceeding, once we accept the premise of the Circuit Court of Appeals that it will have nothing to do with any other appeals in the case. But they do not seem to us germane to the question whether the Circuit Court of Appeals has the power to enforce obedience to its mandate. We think the Act of June 9, 1944, gave the Circuit Court of Appeals the full amplitude of judicial power to deal with the cause which we certified. That power does not contract with the importance or gravity of the question presented. The power to compel obedience with the mandate turns on whether the lower court has obstructed enforcement of it, not on the collateral repercussions which enforcement may entail.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY and MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[Concurring Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, concurring.

When this case originally came here by appeal, an extraordinarily rare, if not unique, situation in the history of the Court precluded its consideration for want of a qualified quorum. The impasse was met by the special jurisdictional Act of June 9, 1944, 58 Stat. 272, 15 U. S. C. § 29. For reasons that seem to me too obvious to need spelling out, that Act should be interpreted as transferring to the Circuit Court of Appeals the case and not merely a stage in its disposition if the Congressional language reasonably permits the Act to be so read. Since it can be so read I do so read it and conclude that the whole appellate process in this case was vested in the Circuit Court of Appeals, regardless of the piecemeal exercise of that process. I find such a construction of the Act of June 9, 1944, freer from difficulties than some of the technical questions pertaining to mandamus that arise on the view taken by the Court.

[¶ 62,257] Clark E. Rathke, doing business as Rathke and Company, and Clarke-Donelson Company, a corporation v. Yakima Valley Grape Growers Association, a corporation, Yakima County Processors, Inc., a corporation, Goebel-Pratt Co., a corporation, Randall S. Pratt and G. Franklin Jones.

In the Supreme Court of the State of Washington. No. 30441. Department Two. Filed April 8, 1948.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Sales Agreement—Payment of Brokerage to Buyer—Violation of Act.—A contract entered into by an association of grape growers and a food broker also selling food processing equipment, whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter agreed to buy, up to fifty per cent of the association's production of grape juice, at a price to equal the seller's wholesale price less broker's discount, an additional broker's discount when an outside broker is employed, and an advertising allowance, and whereby on request of the association, the buyer could secure orders for any portion of the remaining fifty per cent, on a brokerage basis, constitutes a contract to pay brokerage to a buyer, in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act. Such discounts and allowances would enable the buyer to undersell other purchasers from the association, and thus to engage in unfair trade practices prohibited by the Act. The sales agreement is illegal and unenforceable, and an action for specific performance of a purchase agreement for machinery and supplies, which is dependent upon the sales agreement, was properly dismissed.

See the Robinson-Patman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2214.30, 2215.

For appellant: Cheney and Hutcheson, Yakima, Washington.

For respondents: Oscar L. Boose, Sunnyside, Washington; Grady and Grady, Yakima, Washington; Barker and Day, and William J. Walsh, Jr., all of Seattle, Washington.

JEFFERS, J.: This action was instituted by Clark E. Rathke, doing business as Rathke & Company, and Clarke-Donelson Company, a corporation, against Yakima Valley Grape Growers Association, a corporation, Yakima County Processors, Inc., a corporation, Goebel-Pratt Company, a corporation, and the principal stockholders of the latter two corporations, Randall S. Pratt and G. Franklin Jones, to recover damages for an alleged breach of two contracts and to enforce specific performance of both contracts.

One contract was between Yakima Valley Grape Growers Association, as first party, and Clark E. Rathke, doing business as Rathke & Company, of Seattle, as second party. By the terms of this contract, denominated "Purchase Agreement," first party agreed to purchase from second party all the machinery, equipment, materials and supplies to be used in producing grape juice or other products at first party's plant at Grandview, Washington, for a period of ten years.

The other contract, called "Sales Agreement," was entered into between Yakima Valley Grape Growers Association, as first party, and Clarke-Donelson Company, as second party, and under its terms first party, for a period of ten years, agreed to sell to second party so much of first party's output of grape juice or other products as second party might from time to time require or order, subject to certain restrictions contained in the contract, among which was the right of the Association to sell fifty per cent of its own output.

Yakima Valley Grape Growers Association (which will be hereinafter referred to as the Association) appeared separately and filed an answer to the amended and supplemental complaint of plaintiffs, wherein it admitted entering into the above contracts, and subsequently entering into other contracts and a lease to Yakima County Processors, Inc., whereby the latter leased the plant of the Association at Grandview, and controlled the sale of its output, thereby interfering with plaintiffs' contractual relationship with the Association. Defendant Association denied the other material allegations of the complaint, and by way of an affirmative defense, pleaded certain acts and conduct on the part of plaintiffs in justification of any alleged breach of such sales and purchase agreements.

The remaining defendants, represented by separate counsel, entered a general denial to the material allegations of the complaint.

The cause came on for trial before the court on December 17, 1946. At the close of the taking of testimony, defendants contended and argued that plaintiffs should not prevail in the action, for three reasons: (1) That the Clarke-Donelson contract (sales agreement) was illegal and void under the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 13, subd. (a), (c), (d), p. 186, and § 13a, p. 200 (49 Stat. 1526 et seq.); (2) that the two contracts sued upon were unenforceable under the facts; and (3) that plaintiffs failed to prove any damages or any legal measure or standard by which damages could be determined.

The illegality of the contracts under the Robinson-Patman Act was not pleaded by defendants, but was raised for the first time after the conclusion of the testimony. The trial court concluded that the sales contract sued upon was in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act, and therefore illegal and void; that the purchase agreement was unenforceable, for reasons hereinafter shown; and that an action would not lie to enforce such contracts. The court therefore dismissed the action with prejudice, without deciding any of the other questions presented.

Plaintiffs' motion for judgment notwithstanding the decision, or, in the alternative, for a new trial, was denied, and this appeal by plaintiffs followed.

Appellants' assignments of error are that the trial court erred (1) in holding that the Robinson-Patman Act applies to these contracts and this action, and requires dismissal of the action; (2) in failing and refusing to enter judgment in favor of appellants; (3) in entering judgment dismissing the action with prejudice; (4) in denying appellants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the decision; and (5) in denying appellants' motion for a new trial.

If the Clarke-Donelson contract violated the Robinson-Patman Act, rendering that contract illegal, void and unenforceable, then, in our opinion, the purchase agreement contract would also be unenforceable, as the two contracts are dependent on each other, and the other questions presented would become immaterial.

In deciding whether or not the trial court was justified in concluding that the Robinson-Patman Act was violated in the instant case, the following factual situation should be considered.

Respondent Association is a Washington corporation, organized in 1934 as a cooperative association of independent grape growers, to act as a marketing agency to sell the growers' grapes in their natural form. The Association has been managed by Homer E. Evans since its inception. In 1938, due to an increased production of grapes, the Association began to realize that there was going to be a surplus of grapes for sale on the fresh grape market, their principal outlet. As long as the grape growers had to depend on the wineries alone to take the bulk of the late surplus grapes, there was a tendency to "ride the price down." The Association perceived that they would have to have some other outlet, such as a grape juice factory, to take the surplus Concords, if they were to maintain the price.

With funds contributed by the members, the Association purchased the Wright Winery, at Grandview, in the summer of 1940. Shortly thereafter, the Association's manager, Mr. Evans, was approached by L. M. Donelson, a machinery and food salesman for Rathke & Company (hereinafter referred to as Rathke Co.).

We think it might be well to here explain the nature of the business of Rathke Co., and its relationship to the Clarke-Donelson Company. Rathke Co., owned solely by Clark E. Rathke, is engaged in the business of selling food processing equipment, machinery and supplies, and since about 1939 it has engaged in the food brokerage business. At about that time, Rathke Co. had a contract with Pomona Products Company, for the sale of cider manufactured by it. Apparently Mr. Donelson was put in charge of the sale of the cider, on a brokerage basis, and the Clarke-Donelson Company was set up so that Mr. Donelson would have more of a financial interest in his sales. The Clarke-Donelson Company (hereinafter referred to as Donelson Co.) was incorporated on October 9, 1940, with its principal place of business located at Yakima, Washington.

In 1941, Clark E. Rathke was the president and majority stockholder of Donelson Co., the balance of the stock being owned by Donelson, who was manager, and Mrs. Ayers, the office manager of Rathke Co., its secretary. Donelson Co. finances and processes food packs, and sells and acts as broker for the sale of food products.

During his examination, Mr. Rathke was asked the following question:

> "Q. Clarke-Donelson Company and Rathke and Company are actually you, arn't they? A. Well, I imagine, to a certain extent."

Shortly after the Association had purchased the Wright Winery at Grandview, in the summer of 1940, Mr. Donelson, as machinery salesman for Rathke Co., approached Mr. Evans and attempted to sell him machinery for the winery. The Association at this time was without working capital, having spent the amount raised by contribution on the purchase of the winery. After several unsuccessful attempts to sell the Association, Mr. Donelson told Evans about a man named Carl Weisbrod, who had knowledge of a European process for making grape juice at a much cheaper cost than the method ordinarily employed. Donelson introduced Weisbrod to Evans, and Weisbrod explained his process, whereby the grape juice is processed in the regular manner, except that the means by which it is stored for sixty to ninety days to let the cream of tartar settle out is different. Instead of storing the grape juice in expensive five-gallon glass carboys under the orthodox system, Weisbrod claimed it could be stored in large wooden tanks. Weisbrod was confident that his system would work, and he persuaded the Association's board of directors to undertake the manufacture of grape juice by his process. Neither the board nor the Association's manager, Evans, had the technical knowledge required to make commercial grape juice, so Weisbrod was hired to proceed with the new undertaking. A contract was entered into between Weisbrod and the Association, under which Weisbrod was to install and put into operation the entire grape juice plant.

Weisbrod specified the equipment he needed, and on July 10, 1941, the Association, as first party, and Rathke Co., as second party, entered into the written contract hereinbefore referred to as "Purchase Agreement." This contract provided in part as follows:

> "2. First Party hereby agrees to purchase from Second Party all necessary or required additional machinery and equipment and replacements for its said plant at Grandview, Washington or any other plant, wherever located.
> "3. First Party further agrees to purchase from Second Party, all of the materials and supplies to be used by First Party in the operation of said plant or plants or any extension thereof, for producing grape juice or other products, including but not limited to, labels, crowns, bottles, cans, cartons, sugar, machinery and equipment, and incidental materials and supplies.
> "4. This entire agreement shall be in effect for a period of ten (10) years from the date hereof."

The method by which the purchase of the equipment was to be financed was covered by a written agreement, designated "Machinery Agreement," entered into the same day as the purchase agreement, which, among other things, provided:

> "9. A part of the consideration for the execution of this agreement shall be the execution of an agreement between First and Second Parties, wherein and whereby First Party agrees to purchase all of its machinery, equipment and supplies for the production of grape juice or other products from Second Party, at competitive prices, for a period of ten (10) years.
> "It is further agreed that an additional part of the consideration for this agreement is the execution of an agreement between First Party and Clarke-Donelson Company, a Washington corporation, wherein and whereby First Party shall give said Clarke-Donelson Company a selling agreement covering their requirements of grape juice and other products to be produced at First Party's said plant, for a period of ten (10) years." (Italics ours.)

On July 15, 1941, the Association, as first party, and appellant Donelson Co., as second party, entered into the written agreement hereinbefore referred to as "Sales Agreement." This is the agreement referred to in the preceding agreement. It is this sales agreement which respondent contends, and the court held, violated the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, and we shall therefore set it out in some detail.

> "1. It is agreed that a part of the consideration for the execution of this agreement is the prior agreement of said Clark E. Rathke to furnish certain machinery and equipment to First Party, under and pursuant to a certain written agreement now existing between the First Party and said Clark E. Rathke.
> "2. First Party agrees that during the life of this contract to-wit: for a period of ten years from the date of this contract, it will sell the Second Party so much of First Party's entire output of grape juice or other products as Second Party may from time to time require or order, subject to following restriction:
> "It is understood that First Party will itself endeavor to sell its products under its own name and brand, but it is agreed that First Party will, nevertheless, furnish to Second Party all of the grape juice or other products that Second Party may order or require, up to fifty per cent of First Party's total season's output or manufacture. It is intended that Second Party shall have the first call upon at least fifty per cent of First Party's entire output. It is agreed that First Party shall not be required to furnish to Second Party or upon Second Party's order more than 33⅓% of its total output under a private brand whether the same be Second Party's own brand or a buyer's private brand.
> "3. It is understood that Second Party intends to, and will establish its own brand name for such products, and will use its best efforts to develop and establish business in First Party's products. . . .
> "5. It is specifically agreed that when Second Party shall procure a buyer or purchaser, either as broker, wholesaler or jobber for First Party's products, under First Party's or Second Party's brand, then thereafter all such future sales to such buyer shall be subject to the terms of this agreement, and such buyer shall be considered Second Party's customer as long as Second Party continues to sell such buyer.

"6. Nothing in this contract contained shall prevent Second Party from making sales under 'buyer's brand,' and in such sales First Party shall bottle or pack as directed by Second Party.

"7. It is understood that Second Party will be advertising its brand and calling upon customers, and that it will be selling to brokers, wholesalers and others the same as First Party, and that therefore the fixing of prices to Second Party must be adjusted so that Second Party will always be able to sell on the same basis that First Party is able to sell to the trade, including Second Party's discounts or brokerage. Therefore, the price to be paid by Second Party for First Party's grape juice and other products, shall be determined as follows:

"a. The price to Second Party shall be First Party's established wholesale price at Spokane, Portland or Seattle, less the following per case deductions: (1) A broker's discount of five per cent (5%) net to Second Party; (2) Such cash discount as is usually allowed manufacturers, jobbers and brokers; (3) An additional broker's discount of three per cent (3%) when an outside broker is employed; (4) An advertising allowance of five per cent (5%), (to be increased to First Party's advertising allowance if First Party increases its advertising allowance). In the event that the parties hereto believe it is necessary to stimulate business in a particular area with a particular broker or buyer of Second Party by giving such buyer or broker an additional allowance, then such additional allowance shall be deducted from Second Party's said advertising allowance provided, however, that such deduction shall not be made for a period greater than sixty (60) days in any season.

"b. In the event that Second Party sells First Party's products under First Party's brand, then Second Party shall be paid the regular broker's commission of five per cent (5%) on the wholesale price, which commission shall be net to Second Party, and also an additional brokerage of three per cent (3%) if an outside broker is required in the sale. Such sales shall not be charged against Second Party's fifty per cent (50%) allotment as provided in paragraph two (2) above.

"c. In addition to all other discounts or allowances hereinabove provided for. there shall be paid to Second Party by First Party an additional commission of two and one-half per cent (2½%) on all sales made by Second Party during the period from the beginning of this contract until December 31, 1943, if during said period First Party makes sufficient profit from the sale of its grape juice to enable it to pay to the farmers who furnish the grapes the sum of twenty-eight dollars ($28.00) per ton for grapes furnished.

"First Party agrees that it will make its prices so that the same are reasonably competitive with like or similar products and if necessary will adjust its prices so as to meet special circumstances or conditions existing in any particular selling point or area, or strike such area from sales territory of its products. . . .

"9. This entire agreement shall be in effect for a period of ten (10) years from the date hereof." (Italics ours.)

These contracts were all duly approved by the board of directors of the Association.

It is undisputed that the Association did not have sufficient funds to finance the purchase of the equipment and machinery for the construction of its grape juice plant, and, as stated in the machinery agreement, appellants were interested in selling to respondent Association the needed equipment only upon the condition that an agreement be entered into giving Donelson Co. certain exclusive rights for the sale of the production of the Association's plant.

The machinery and equipment for the plant were purchased by the Association from Rathke Co., pursuant to two written conditional sales contracts. Among this equipment were thirty-four 2500-gallon redwood tanks, selected by Weisbrod. The process advocated by Weisbrod and as employed in Europe used oak tanks for storing the grape juice, but, oak tanks being unavailable at the time, Weisbrod substituted redwood tanks, which he thought would work just as well as the oak tanks.

The machinery was late in arriving, and production was not commenced until October 16, 1941, which is past the middle of the season. Within seventy-two hours after the first seven tanks had been filled with grape juice, the juice had all fermented. Weisbrod attributed this to the fact that the redwood tanks were not air-tight, and bacteria thus got into the grape juice, causing it to ferment.

Not having any satisfactory means available for storing the grape juice, the Association sold the fermented juice to a winery, and closed the plant for the balance of the 1941 season. As a result of the failure of this venture, the Association was placed in a very embarassing financial condition. In November, 1941, Rathke Co. commenced suit for the unpaid purchase price of the machinery, which it declared due when the Association failed to make an installment payment on its conditional sales contract. The suit was compromised and dismissed January 17, 1942, upon payment by the Association of $2,600, and the execution of a chattel mortgage by the Association. Rathke Co. in turn promised to remedy certain defects in the equipment sold to the Association. The purchase and sales agreements were extended for one year beyond their original expiration dates.

A large sum of money is required to finance a grape processing season on a profitable scale. The containers and supplies have to be purchased in advance, and the growers have to be paid a certain amount upon delivery of their grapes to the plant, so that they in turn can pay their laborers. With Rathke Co. having a chattel mortgage on the equipment, the Association was unable to obtain a loan from the bank to finance the 1942 operation.

In the summer of 1942, manager Evans contacted Randall S. Pratt, president of Goebel-Pratt Co., a Washington corporation, engaged in the food brokerage business, in an endeavor to have the last named company sell fifty per cent of the 1942 grape pack on a brokerage basis, and to aid the Association in financing the 1942 pack. The Goebel-Pratt Co., as stated by Mr. Pratt, "shied away" from the proposition of financing the Association, but did agree to sell fifty per cent of the 1942 pack, on a brokerage basis.

As the result of some assistance from Rathke Co. and the ability of the Association to obtain some supplies on credit, the Association in 1942 processed a small pack of 197 tons of grapes. Most of this was processed into frozen pulp. There was a total of 4,500 gallons of grape juice produced, which was sold to Safeway. Apparently Goebel-Pratt Co. sold half the pack on a brokerage basis, and Rathke Co. sold half. The portion of the 1942 pack sold by Rathke Co. was sold outside of the state, probably to the New York market. Rathke Co. was paid a brokerage of eight per cent on half the tonnage, and in addition a bonus of two and one-half per cent. Mr. Evans explained the brokerage of eight per cent as being made of five per cent plus three per cent for an outside broker, as provided for in the contract.

In the early part of 1943, Evans called upon Mr. Pratt for assistance. Mr. Pratt, being aware of the contracts the Association had with Rathke Co. and Donelson Co., was not willing to do anything for the Association, but suggested that Evans see an attorney. Apparently as a result of advice received from this attorney, and further contacts with Mr. Pratt, Evans persuaded respondent Goebel-Pratt Co. to lease the Association's plant, for which purpose Goebel-Pratt Co. organized respondent Yakima County Processors, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as Processors). Respondent G. Franklin Jones, Mrs. Patricia M. Calvert and respondent Randall S. Pratt each has a one-third interest in Processors.

On September 20, 1943, the Association leased its Grandview plant to Processors, and also entered into an agreement with Processors concerning the purchase of grapes and the sale of the manufactured product. Rathke Co. was first informed that the Association had leased its plant, by a letter written to it by Evans on October 5, 1943.

On April 30, 1945, the Donelson Co. contract (sales agreement) was assigned to Rathke Co.

As previously stated, respondents' defense, that the Donelson Co. contract is illegal and void under the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, was raised for the first time in the argument after the conclusion of the testimony. Appellants contend that the defense of illegality, to be available to respondents, must have been pleaded affirmatively, and cite and quote from Wolfe v. Philippine Investment Co., 175 Wash. 165, 27 P. (2d) 132. It may be admitted that in the cited case we stated that the appellant, who raised the question of the invalidity of the contract there involved, was not entitled to introduce evidence upon the matter, as he had not affirmatively pleaded such illegality. However, it is apparent from the opinion that, if the illegality of that contract had appeared from the evidence introduced by the respondent, who was contending for the validity of the contract, the above rule announced as to appellant would not have been applicable. We also held that Rem. Rev. Stat. § 7077, was not applicable to the facts in the cited case. The Wolfe case cites Maitland v. Zanga, 14 Wash. 92, 44 Pac. 117, and Vittucci Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ry. Co., 102 Wash. 686, 174 Pac. 981.

The opinion in Maitland v. Zanga, supra, was written by Judge Dunbar, and the rule therein announced is apparently the basis for the rule announced in the Wolfe and Vittucci cases, supra.

The Maitland case, supra, was an action for damages, founded on an agreement to convey land. The particular question with which we are here concerned was raised in that case by the appellant, Maitland, who claimed the court erred in giving the following instruction:

"'You are further instructed, gentlemen of the jury, that if you find from the evidence in this case that this contract or receipt was executed in pursuance of a contract that was entered into prior to the time of the defendant making his final proof upon this piece of land, and that he entered into a contract at that time to furnish him with supplies and money, and that this receipt was a part of and grew out of that contract, then you will find for the defendant, for such contract was void.'"

The opinion states:

"This instruction was duly excepted to by the appellant, for the reason that no issue was made by the pleadings that would justify such an instruction; that there was no allegation in the answer that the contract was made in violation of public policy or of the public laws. It is contended, however, by the respondent, that proof of the illegality of a contract may be admitted whether it is pleaded or not, and of course, if it were competent to admit testimony, it would be competent for the court to instruct upon its effect."

We quote further from the opinion:

"But, while it is true that the courts will not enforce illegal contracts, the fact that such contract is illegal must be determined like any other fact, and to be fairly determined by it must be made an issue by the pleadings, or be determined by the admission of the plaintiff or by testimony which, in the language of the supreme court of the United States, 'must necessarily prove the illegality of the contract,' as in the instance cited by the court, or where some public record was introduced which could not be disputed. . . .

"If, as in Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 261, the plaintiff sees fit, either by admissions of his attorney or by his own direct testimony, to bring to the notice of the court the accepted fact that the contract sued upon was an illegal one, of course he cannot be heard to complain that the question of the illegality of the contract was not raised by the pleadings, and that he has had no notice of such an issue in the cause, for he has seen fit to put the question in issue without notice." (Italics ours.)

From the cited cases, it may fairly be concluded that a defendant must plead affirmatively the illegality of a contract upon which suit is brought before he will be permitted to introduce evidence to establish such illegality. This, however, does not mean that, if a contract is illegal on its face, or if a plaintiff, by his evidence, brings to the notice of the court that the contract sued upon is illegal, the court cannot dispose of the case by dismissing the action.

Appellants also quote from 17 C. J. S. 1195, § 559, as follows:

". . . Evidence tending to show the illegality of the contract in suit cannot be given under a general denial or the general issue, if the contract is valid on its face, but that the defense must be specially pleaded, at least in the absence of anything in the complaint or petition disclosing illegality."

We continue the quotation where appellants left off:

"In some cases it has been held that if the invalidity of the contract is because of its contravention of a public statute intended for the protection of the parties, and the benefit of which may be waived, the defense of invalidity is not available under a general denial, but must be pleaded; but that where the general public is affected by a violation of the particular statute or the provisions of any public law, it is not necessarily essential to plead the illegality of a contract constituting such a violation."

Respondents contend that the rule is that ". . . when a contract is relied upon by a plaintiff and it appears either upon its face or from facts admitted or proven at the trial that it is an illegal contract it will not be enforced, that it matters not how its illegality is brought to the attention of the court and a plea of illegality is not necessary [citing Reed v. Johnson, 27 Wash. 42, 67 Pac. 381; Lewer v. Cornelius, 72 Wash. 124, 129 Pac. 911; Williams v. Great Northern R. Co., 108 Wash. 344, 184 Pac. 340; and Wright v. Corbin, 190 Wash. 260, 67 P. (2d) 868]."

In the Reed case, supra, the opinion states:

"The respondents by their cross complaint were asking for a specific performance of the contract, by decreeing a conveyance to them of the lands claimed by them under their contract. Before they are entitled to the relief of specific performance, it must appear that the contract which they seek to enforce has all the elements of an enforceable contract. If the contract is illegal and void for reasons of public policy, specific performance will not be enforced.

"'Equity will not assume jurisdiction to compel the specific performance of a contract that is illegal in any of its features. If the nature of the contract is such that its enforcement would be in violation of public policy, specific performance will not be granted. The least taint of illegality or want of equity will preclude a decree.' 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1014, par. 4. . . .

"It cannot be successfully urged that appellants have waived objection to the illegality of this contract by not specially pleading the same. The nonenforcement of illegal contracts is a matter of common public interest, and a party to such contract cannot waive his right to set up the defense of illegality in an action thereon by the other party. It is not necessary to specially plead the defense of illegality, but, when the same is made to appear to the court at any stage of the case, it becomes the duty of the court to refuse to entertain the action." (Italics ours.)

While Maitland v. Zanga, supra, is not cited in the Reed case, the latter case does cite Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 261, also cited in the Maitland case.

We shall not set out the facts in Lewer v. Cornelius, supra, for the reason that we think the following statement found in the opinion sufficiently explains the situation presented:

"A court will not knowingly aid in the furtherance of an illegal transaction. And in harmony with this principle, it does not concern itself as to the manner in which the illegality of a matter before it is brought to its attention. If such illegality appears in the pleadings of either party, it will not inquire into the technical accuracy of such pleading; if it appears in the statement of witnesses at the trial, it will not inquire into the technical admissibility of such statement as evidence, but will, in either case, start an inquiry of its own, and if it be found that the differences which it is called upon to adjudicate arise out of an illegal transaction it will leave the parties where it found them, to work out their differences as best they may." (Italics ours.)

In Williams v. Great Northern R. Co., supra, we stated:

"The real question here is something more than a question of ultra vires as a question of fact. The company was not required to plead in its answer that it intended to rely upon this statute rendering the contract void as a contract of permanent employment. The contract being void and unenforceable as a contract of permanent employment, and it being so determinable as a matter of law from the face of the contract without the determination of any issue of fact, the company was privileged to invoke such invalidity as a defense without specifically pleading it. The decision of this court in Reed v. Johnson, 27 Wash. 42, 67 Pac. 381, 57 L. R. A. 404, is in harmony with and lends support to this conclusion."

In Wright v. Corbin, supra, we stated:

"The contention of respondent, in his brief on his motion to dismiss the appeal, that this question [illegality of contract between respondent and appellant] was never raised nor presented to the lower court by appellant, is untenable. Such a question can be raised at any time and at any stage of the case, when it has been made to appear that a contract is illegal and unenforceable. Reed v. Johnson, 27 Wash. 42, 67 Pac. 381, 57 L. R. A. 404; 13 C. J. 507, § 455." (Italics ours.)

In 12 Am. Jur., § 223, pp. 741 et seq., will be found a discussion of the question here being considered. We quote only the following paragraph:

"But according to the weight of authority, the illegality of an agreement is available as a defense even though it is not pleaded. This is especially so where the agreement is contra bonos mores. [Citing, among other authority, Reed v. Johnson, supra.]

Without attempting to distinguish the cases decided by this court and hereinbefore discussed, we are of the opinion that, under the rules announced in Reed v. Johnson, supra, and the other cases cited by respondent, and under the rules announced in 12 Am. Jur., § 223, supra, if the grape juice contract (sales agreement) entered into between respondent Association and appellant Donelson Co. shows on its face that it is illegal and in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act, or if the illegality of such contract clearly appears from the contract and appellant's evidence, the trial court was justified in dismissing the action on that ground, notwithstanding that respondent had not pleaded the illegality of such contract.

We come then to the main question in the case, which is whether the trial court, in the light of the evidence, was justified in holding that the Donelson Co. contract was an illegal contract, under the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 13, subd. (c), which reads:

"It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid."

The Robinson-Patman Act of June 19, 1936, was an amendment of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act of October 15, 1914, 38 Stat. 730. Section 2 of the Clayton Act, which was the section amended, merely forbade discrimination in price, when the effect of such discrimination was to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly. The Robinson-Patman Act broadened the scope of this provision, conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission power to establish quantity differentials for the purpose of determining discrimination, and cast the burden of proof upon one charged with discrimination to justify any discrimination shown.

Section 13, of 15 U. S. C. A., supra, contains subdivisions (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f).

A brief discussion of § 13, contained in Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 106 F. (2d) 667, is, we think, helpful to a clear understanding of the overall purpose of the act. We quote:

"Paragraph (a) deals with the selection of customers and provides that it shall be unlawful to discriminate in price between them. Then follow the cost differential provisos upon which the petitioner relies. Paragraph (b) provides that the burden of rebutting a prima facie case of discrimination rests upon the person charged with a violation of the Section. Paragraph (c) prohibits the payment or acceptance of commission or brokerage or other compensation, except for services rendered, as we have indicated. Paragraph (d) provides that it shall be unlawful to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value for services or facilities unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in distribution of such products or commodities. Paragraph (e) prohibits the furnishing of services or facilities for processing or handling upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionately equal terms. Paragraph (f) prohibits persons from knowingly receiving a discrimination in price prohibited by Section 13."

It is clear that the above acts are forbidden as unfair trade practices, because "of their tendency to lessen competition and create monopoly, without regard to their effect in a particular case." Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra.

It is stated in Biddle Purchasing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 96 F. (2d) 687, 692:

"One of the main objectives of section 2 (c) [15 U. S. C. A., § 13 (c)] was to force price discriminations out into the open where they would be subject to the scrutiny of those interested, particularly competing buyers . . .

"Section 2 (c) was clearly intended to restore equality of opportunity in business by strengthening the anti-trust laws through protecting trade and commerce against unfair practices and unlawful price discrimination."

The act here under consideration is applicable only to transactions affecting interstate commerce. Body-Steffner Co. v. Flotill Products, 63 Cal. A. (2d) 555, 147 P. (2d) 84.

There is no question but that it clearly appears from the testimony of Mr. Rathke that the products of the grape juice plant sold by Donelson Co. would be sold to buyers outside of the state of Washington. We quote from Mr. Rathke's testimony:

"Q. Mr. Rathke, I think you said that the demand for the product you expected to receive from the Grape Growers was in excess of the supply? A. It was. Q. Now, where is this product sold, the pulp and the juice, that would have been purchased from the Grape Growers? A. Our market would have been the Middle West, the New York market in the New York area, and the California market. Q. Would any part of it have been resold in the state of Washington? A. There might have been a limited amount, but our large market was outside the state of Washington. Q. A very insubstantial amount, then, would be sold in Washington? A. With the exception of the juice . . . Q. But had you received any in 1941 and what you did receive in 1942, that was sold into foreign markets? A. That would have gone to the New York market. Q. Most of it to the New York market? A. Yes, we had one customer who would have taken the output. Q. I see. And what did you receive in 1942 was sold outside of the state? A. Yes."

In determining whether the sales agreement is a contract to pay brokerage to a buyer in violation of the Robinson-Patman Act, we must, of course, look to the provisions of the sales agreement. We have hereinbefore set out quite fully the provisions of this contract, and we will not again set it out, but we desire to call special attention to paragraphs 2, 3, 5 and 6, and particularly to paragraphs 7, 7a, 7b and 7c.

Appellants state in their brief:

"Moreover, here in any event appellants were brokers or agents rather than purchasers. The transaction was a marketing agency rather than a sale."

We think this contention is not in accord with the testimony of Mr. Rathke, which is to the effect that he was both a purchaser and a broker under the contract. We again quote from Mr. Rathke's testimony:

"Q. In your contract, sales, agreement, with reference to the juice, which is Plaintiffs' exhibit 2, that contract in effect provides for, first, the obligation of the Grape Growers Association to hold for and sell to you up to fifty per cent of their pack, the prices to be determined by a formula in the contract. Is that your understanding? A. That would be my understanding. Q. So, as far as that part of it is concerned, you would then be a purchaser of their manufactured product, would you not? A. We could either be that or we could sell it for their account, as I understand the contract. Q. But, the first part with reference to the fifty per cent, it is their agreement to sell to you— A. That's correct. Q. —such as you required? A. That's correct. Q. So, in that case, you would then be a purchaser of that part? A. Correct. Q. In addition to that, there was also the provision that, if they requested it, you could secure orders for any portion of the remaining fifty per cent and, if they accepted those orders, they would be on a brokerage basis? A. Correct."

As Mr. Rathke testified, and as the sales agreement states, Donelson Co. had the right to purchase up to fifty per cent of the Association's production of grape juice and other products, and under the contract, the Association would be required to sell Donelson Co. that amount. The contract very carefully distinguishes between the right to brokerage and the right to purchase the products. While Donelson Co. reserves the right to brokerage the products and receive brokerage commissions, the contract states:

"7b . . . Such sales shall not be charged against Second Party's fifty percent (50%) allotment as provided in paragraph two (2) above."

While the contract provides that Donelson Co. may act as a broker, it also provides that it may act as a purchaser for fifty percent of the manufactured products. In respect to that fifty percent, it would be a purchaser for its own account. In selling such goods to others under its own brand name, for which the contract makes provision, it would not be selling such goods for the Association, from whom it purchased them, but for itself. Donelson Co., in competing with other wholesalers, would set its own price. With the broker's discounts and advertising allowances which it would receive under the sales agreement, Donelson Co. could afford to undersell other purchasers from the Association, and thus engage in unfair trade practices, which, in our opinion, are the very evils sought to be remedied by the Robinson-Patman Act.

Appellants cite Irwin v. Pacific Fruit & Produce Co., 188 Wash. 572, 63 P. (2d) 382, and Body-Steffner Co. v. Flotill Products, supra, in support of their contention that under the contract they were brokers and not purchasers. We are unable to see that the cited cases are applicable in the instant case. In the Irwin case, the court held the contract was one of consignment and not of purchase. This construction was undoubtedly placed upon the contract for the following reason, as stated in the opinion:

"The contract was written upon a printed form so prepared that it could be filled out to accomplish either a contract of purchase or one of handling only. In the line left blank for the word which should designate the class of contract to be executed, plainly appears the written word 'handle.' This, of course, indicates that the contract was one of consignment and not of purchase."

In the Body-Steffner Co. case, the plaintiff received judgment on the theory that all six contracts involved were contracts of purchase and sale. The defendant contended that the contracts were in fact contracts of brokerage or agency. In support of this defense, the defendant attempted to show, by the cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses and by examination of its own witnesses, that in the trade this standard form of contract was always construed as a contract of agency and not one of sale where a provision for brokerage was inserted in the contract. Objection was sustained to all the questions and offer of proof. The court stated:

"In sustaining such objections we are convinced that the trial court committed prejudicial error."

No such situation is presented in the instant case.

It is our opinion there is no ambiguity in the contract here under consideration. Donelson Co. was given the right to purchase fifty per cent of the pack, and also the right to brokerage whatever they were able to, the contract not specifying any definite amount.

We are of the opinion that, under the plain terms of the contract, Donelson Co., as buyer, was given a brokerage. We are also of the opinion that the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. A., § 13 (c)) absolutely prohibits and forbids the paying, or granting, or receiving, or accepting anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, from seller to buyer. Oliver Bros. v. Federal Trade Commission, 102 F. (2d) 763; Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra; Jarrett v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 131 F. (2d) 674. We quote from the last cited case:

"It [Robinson-Patman amendment of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 13 (c)] prohibited receipt or payment of commissions or discounts in lieu thereof in sales transactions except for services rendered."

See, also Southgate Brokerage Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 150 F. (2d) 607, from which we quote:

"It is perfectly clear that this provision [Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 13 (c)] forbids the payment of brokerage on a sale or purchase of goods to the other party to the transaction. The seller may not pay the buyer brokerage on the latter's purchases for his own account. As said in the Report of the House and Senate Conference Committee with reference to this subsection (House Rep. 2951, 74th Cong. 2nd Sess.): 'This subsection permits the payment of compensation by a seller to his broker or agent for services actually rendered in his behalf; likewise by a buyer to his broker or agent for services in connection with the purchase of goods actually rendered in his behalf; but it prohibits the direct or indirect payment of brokerage except for such services rendered. It prohibits its allowance by the buyer direct to the seller, or by the seller direct to the buyer . . .'" (Italics ours.)

See, also, Merchants Service Corporation v. Libby, McNeill & Libby, 314 Ill. App. 121, 40 N. E. (2d) 835.

Appellants contend that the Robinson-Patman Act is a penal criminal statute, and that nowhere therein is there any provision, which Congress could well have included if it so desired, that a contract in violation thereof is illegal, void and unenforceable. Appellants argue that the courts have repeatedly held that violation of the Robinson-Patman Act is not available as a defense in an action based on the contract in a state court, citing and quoting extensively from Bruce's Juices v. American Can Co., 67 S. Ct. 1015, 91 L. Ed. (Adv. Op.) 875, wherein the United States supreme court affirmed the decision of the supreme court of Florida (155 Fla. 877, 22 So. (2d) 461). We are of the opinion the cited case is easily distinguished from the instant case.

The cited case was an action brought by the American Can Co. against Bruce's Juices, Inc., on renewal notes representing the purchase price of goods sold and delivered. The question presented was whether renewal notes representing the purchase of goods sold and delivered are uncollectible, if it be found that the vendor violated the Robinson-Patman Act. The United States supreme court held that while the act prescribes sanctions, it does not make uncollectibility of the purchase price one of them.

As the trial court in the instant case points out, there is a great difference between an action at law to recover on promissory notes and an action in equity to specifically enforce an illegal contract. The trial court in the instant case, in its memorandum opinion, quoted from the Bruce's Juices case:

"None the less, we are urged to supply judicially the sanction of invalidating obligations to pay for goods sold and delivered because it is said otherwise the courts become parties to the enforcement of a discrimination. If, in order to prove his own case, a plaintiff proves his violation of law, then no court will aid the plaintiff to recover." (Italics ours.)

Under note 4 is cited McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 19 S. Ct. 839, 43 L. Ed. 1117, wherein the court refused to enforce a partnership contract which was based on an illegal and fraudulent agreement to submit collusive bids for public construction.

In view of the authority hereinbefore cited, to the effect that a contract to pay a commission or brokerage or other compensation in violation of 15 U. S. C. A., § 13(c) is illegal and unenforceable, we do not deem it necessary to discuss other cases cited by appellants on this point.

We do, however, desire to quote the following statement found in 149 A. L. R. 677:

"A contractual promise to pay a commission or brokerage or other compensation in violation of subsection (c) is illegal and void. Neither the promisor nor the promisee is bound. The rule applies to contracts existing, but not yet performed, on the date when the Robinson-Patman Act went into effect. [Citing authority heretofore set out in this opinion.]"

The sales contract here under consideration is, in our opinion, illegal and void, and unenforceable in the instant case.

Appellants contend that the Robinson-Patman Act has no application to the purchase agreement entered into between the Association and Rathke Co. to buy machinery and supplies; that this agreement is separate, distinct and independent of the sales agreement. Appellants further contend that the Association is clearly obligated to purchase its additional machinery, equipment and supplies from appellant Rathke Co., irrespective of the enforceability of the sales agreement.

An examination of the two contracts will show that the one is dependent on the other. The sales agreement states that

"Whereas, First Party has, by a separate and independent agreement, arranged to obtain certain equipment for said grape juice plant from Clark E. Rathke, doing business as Rathke and Company, and in said written agreement it is provided that First Party herein shall enter into this agreement as a part of the consideration for Clark E. Rathke, executing said written agreement to furnish said equipment." (Italics ours.)

It seems to us that if the sales agreement is illegal and void and cannot be enforced, there is a failure of consideration of the purchase agreement.

The general rule in regard to illegality of consideration and its effect upon a contract is stated in Remington Rand, Inc. v. International Business Mach. Corp., 167 Misc. 108, 3 N. Y. S. (2d) 515, 523, as follows:

"It is well settled that a contract wholly based on an illegal consideration is wholly unenforceable. At times, however, a contract may be divisible by reason of its containing both legal and illegal provisions. A separation of the two will be attempted by the courts in a proper case, but where the illegality pervades the entire agreement, the courts will abstain from such separation and refuse affirmative relief. Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87; Arnot v. Pittston & Elmira Coal Co., 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190; Manson v. Curtis, 223 N. Y. 313, 119 N. E. 559, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 247."

We are of the opinion that, the sales agreement being illegal and unenforceable, the purchase agreement for the machinery and supplies, which is dependent upon it, is also unenforceable.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

In the New York Supreme Court, Special Term, Part III. 119 N. Y. L. J. 2011. May 28, 1948.

Feld-Crawford Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Act—Price Agreement Exempting Sales to Employees—Agreement Held Uniform and Non-discriminatory.—An agreement under the New York Fair Trade Act, fixing retail prices of plaintiff's products, and providing that the prices are not to apply to sales made to plaintiff's employees, to employees of distributors and dealers, to government agencies or to consumers buying for industrial use, is not discriminatory or lacking in uniformity, and the use of such an exemption clause does not constitute an abandonment or waiver by plaintiff of the protection of the Act. A motion by plaintiff for an injunction pendente lite in an action for injunctive relief under the Act is granted, and a motion by defendant to dismiss the complaint is denied.

See the Feld-Crawford Act annotations, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.20, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7220.

[Temporary Injunction Granted]

KOCH, J.: This is one of eight motions brought on by the same plaintiff seeking injunctive relief under the Feld-Crawford Act. There is an underlying question as to the sufficiency of the agreement relied upon. The determination made on this motion in this regard is intended to apply to all the other motions. The determination of any other questions raised will be made separately on each motion. The agreement fixing the retail prices of plaintiff's articles provided that the prices did not apply to sales made to plaintiff's employees, to employees of distributors and dealers, to government agencies or to consumers buying for industrial use. This defendant has submitted affidavits showing that two of its employees obtained articles below the market price by the simple expedient of having friends of theirs who were employees of consumers for industrial use make the purchases. Defendant's argument is that plaintiff by its exception clause has deprived the agreement of uniformity and rendered it discriminatory; that it has abandoned and waived the protection of the act, and that plaintiff is accordingly not entitled to equitable relief. Preliminarily, it is held that plaintiff's reliance on Bristol-Meyers v. Bamberger, (122 N. J. Eq., 559) is of no assistance to it. There the defendant was selling below cost to its own employees under a contract which did not contain an exemption clause. This distinction was made in Burroughs Wellcome & Company (U. S. A.), Inc., v. Weissbard, (20 Atl. 2d 445 [N. J. Chancery Court, 1941], aff'd without opinion, 23 Atl. 2d 396, 130 N. J. Eq. 60). There is nothing discriminatory in the agreement, nor is it lacking in uniformity. Under it defendant and others may sell below the fixed price to those coming within the exception clause. Were plaintiff or its subsidiary making sales to those described in the exception clause without giving defendant and others a similar opportunity to make such sales discrimination might be claimed. Defendant's contention that the sales by it were made to plaintiff's employees and so come within the exemption clause presents no ground for a denial of this motion. The affidavits strongly indicate that the defendant is mistaken in this regard, but the question of fact would only require determination if it were defendant's contention that these were isolated transactions. A reading of the answering papers discloses quite clearly, however, that defendant is not seeking the protection of the exemption clause but as a matter of policy objects to the price fixation. The transactions whereby defendant's employees obtained articles at less than the fixed price under the circumstances above described are not indicative of an abandonment or waiver of the protection of the act. Plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought. It has contracted with others to hold the price of its products. Under the applicable statutes it is accordingly entitled to the relief sought. There is no showing of any favoritism which would militate against defendant or others so situated. The application is accordingly granted. Settle order fixing the amount of the bond at $250.

[Motion to Dismiss Denied]

Motion to dismiss the complaint is denied. For the reasons stated in the disposition of the companion motion granting the injunction pendente lite the complaint is held to be sufficient. The alternative relief is granted to this extent: Defendant may examine plaintiff by its officer or employee as to its sales at retail of price fixed products and as to its agreements with others for the sale at retail of price fixed products, such examination to be limited to the time during which plaintiff has been engaged in the policy of fixing minimum retail sales prices. At such examination, books and records shall be produced for use pursuant to section 296, C. P. A.

[¶ 62,259] United States v. National City Lines, Inc., American City Lines, Inc., Pacific City Lines, Inc. et al.

In the United States Supreme Court. No. 544. June 7, 1948.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of California.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Venue—Forum Non Conveniens Doctrine Held Inapplicable.—In an action charging a conspiracy to acquire control of local transportation companies and to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce in motorbusses, petroleum supplies, tires, and tubes sold to those companies, in violation of the Sherman Act, the choice of forums given to the plaintiff by Section 12 of the Clayton Act is not subject to qualification by judicial application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens. The question of whether such a choice has been given is not to be answered by such inquiries as whether the venue or jurisdictional statute is labeled a "special" or a "general" one, but is rather to be decided on the basis of the legislative purpose. The legislative purpose, and the effect of the language used to achieve it, were to vest the power of choice in the plaintiff. Whenever Congress has vested courts with jurisdiction to hear and determine causes and has invested complaining litigants with a right of choice among the courts which is inconsistent with the exercise by those courts of discretionary power to defeat the choice so made, the doctrine of forum non conveniens can have no effect.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.101, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.10.

Rules of Criminal Procedure—Effect of Transfer of Criminal Case.—The transfer to the Illinois district of a criminal proceeding growing out of the same transactions is not controlling in a civil case. The dissenting opinion would affirm the decision of the lower court, inasmuch as the civil case, as well as the criminal action, was transferred "in the interest of justice."

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1610.101.

Reversing the decision of the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, 7 F. R. D. 456, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,617.

For appellee: C. Frank Reavis, Martin D. Jacobs.

MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE delivered the opinion of the Court.

In United States v. Scophony Corp., 333 U. S. 795, we recently considered the meaning and effect of § 12 of the Clayton Act,[1] providing for venue and service of process in civil antitrust proceedings against private corporations. This case brings before us another phase of the section's effect in like proceedings. The principal question, and [1] "Sec. 12. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found." 38 Stat. 736, 15 U. S. C. § 22.

the only one we find it necessary to consider, is whether the choice of forums given to the plaintiff by § 12 is subject to qualification by judicial application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens.

The suit was brought by the United States against nine corporations[2] for alleged violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2. The basic charge is that the appellees conspired to acquire control of local transportation companies in numerous cities located in widely different parts of the United States,[3] and to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce in motorbusses, petroleum supplies, tires and tubes sold to those companies, contrary to the Act's prohibitions.[4] Injunctive and other relief of an equitable nature was sought.[5]

The appellees filed various motions, including the one involved in this appeal. It sought dismissal of the complaint on the ground that the District Court for the Southern District of California was not a convenient forum for the trial. This motion was supported by a showing not only of inconvenience to the defendants of trial in the California district, but also that the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division (Chicago), would be the most convenient forum for them. The showing was by affidavits, executed by officers, attorneys and employees of the corporate defendants.[6] Counteraffidavits were filed in opposition on behalf of the Government.[7]

After oral argument, the District Court filed findings of fact and conclusions of law

[2] These, with the states of their incorporation and their principal places of business, are as follows:

Corporation	State of incorporation	Principal place of business
National City Lines, Inc.	Delaware	Chicago
American City Lines, Inc.	Delaware	Chicago
Pacific City Lines, Inc.	Delaware	Oakland, Calif.
Standard Oil Co. of California	Delaware	San Francisco
Federal Engineering Corp.	California	San Francisco
Phillips Petroleum Co.	Delaware	Bartlesville, Okla.
General Motors Corp.	Delaware	Detroit, Mich.
Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.	Ohio	Akron, Ohio
Mack Manufacturing Corp.	Delaware	New York

[3] Forty-four cities in sixteen states are included. The states are as widely scattered as California, Florida, Maryland, Michigan, Nebraska, Texas and Washington. The larger local transportation systems include those of Baltimore, St. Louis, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles and Oakland. The largest concentrations of smaller systems are in Illinois, with eleven cities; California with nine (excluding Los Angeles); and Michigan with four. The local operating companies were not named as parties defendant.

[4] The appellee companies fall into two groups. The largest, which may be called the supplier group, includes the six last named in note 2 above. Except Federal, they are engaged in producing and distributing the commodities purchased by the local operating companies, the sale of which is charged to be monopolized and restrained. Federal is a wholly owned subsidiary of Standard, engaged in managing investments for Standard.

The other group, including the first three companies listed in note 2, is collectively called City Lines. National is a holding company with operations directed from Chicago. American and Pacific are its subsidiaries. The three own, control or have substantial interests in the operating companies.

The complaint charges that the supplier appellees furnish capital to the City Lines for acquiring control of the local operating systems, upon the understanding that the City Lines cause all requirements of the local systems in busses, petroleum products, tires and tubes to be purchased from the supplier appellees and no other sellers.

[5] The prayer of the complaint sought complete divestiture of the supplier appellees' financial interests in City Lines; partial divestiture of City Lines' interests in local transportation companies; voiding of existing contracts between the supplier appellees and City Lines; and an injunction against purchases from those suppliers by City Lines or their operating companies, except in accordance with a competitive bidding plan to be included in the decree.

[6] In highly attenuated summary the showing was that the transactions creating the core of the charged conspiracy took place chiefly in or near Chicago; appellees' chief witnesses and documentary evidence are located there; their transportation to Los Angeles and extended presence there will cause great hardship; no defendant "resides" or has its principal office or place of business in the California district (cf. note 2); and two trials in distant cities, see text infra at note 41, will greatly magnify the hardship. See 7 F. R. D. 456, 465.

[7] The Government stresses that three of the five supplier defendants transact business and are "found," cf. note 1, in the California district; the volume of sales allegedly restrained is much greater on the Pacific Coast than elsewhere; substantial portions of the evidence, oral and documentary, will be produced from California, etc. Cf. 7 F. R. D. 456, 465.

together with a written opinion, substantially accepting appellees' showing and sustaining the motion. 7 F. R. D. 456. Accordingly it entered judgment dismissing the complaint, but without prejudice to the institution of a similar suit against the named defendants "in a more appropriate and convenient forum." This decision is brought to us for review on direct appeal pursuant to the statute applicable in such cases.[8]

It is not disputed that the District Court has jurisdiction in the basic sense of power to hear and determine the cause or that it has venue within the provisions of § 12.[9] Nor can it be questioned that any of the defendants can be brought personally within that court's jurisdiction by service of process made in accordance with the provisions of either § 12, or those of § 5 of the Sherman Act.[10] The only question presented concerning the court's power is whether, having jurisdiction and venue of the cause and personal jurisdiction of the defendants, the court also was authorized to decline to exercise its jurisdiction upon finding, without abuse of discretion, that the forum was not a convenient one within the scope of the non-statutory doctrine commonly, though not too accurately, labeled forum non conveniens.

It would serve no useful purpose to review in detail the reasoning or the authorities upon which the District Court ruled the doctrine applicable in such cases as this, or therefore the further groundings upon which it proceeded in holding the forum inconvenient. For the view has prevailed without qualification during the life of § 12, thirty-four years, that the choice of venues expressly given to the plaintiff is not to be qualified by any power of a court having venue under any of the section's alternatives to decline to exercise the jurisdiction conferred. None of the decisions on which the District Court relied suggested, much less decided, that such a power exists This therefore is a case of first impression, seeking departure from long-established practice. Moreover, the analogies drawn from other types of cases in which the doctrine has been applied[11] cannot survive in the face of the section's explicit terms and the patent intent of Congress in enacting it.

In the Scophony case we gave attention to the history of § 12, which as there related is as pertinent to the question now presented as it was to the issues then under consideration.[12] Reference to the Scophony opinion, Part I, 333 U. S. at 802-810, will avoid the necessity for repeating the history here in extenso. But its present applicability will be accentuated by recalling that we reaffirmed the ruling in Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359, namely, that § 12 of the Clayton Act had enlarged the venue provision of § 7 of the Sherman Act, with the intent and effect to give the plaintiff the right to bring antitrust proceedings not only in the districts where the corporate defendant "resides or is found," as § 7 had authorized, but also "in any district wherein it . . . transacts business."[13]

In the Eastman case, as the Scophony opinion emphasized, the Court had rejected the argument that the addition of "or transacts business" was no more than a redundant reformulation of "is found"; instead it gave the added words broader and less technical meaning than "is found" had acquired under prior decisions.[14] This was done, as the Eastman opinion stated, because accepting the contrary view would have rendered the addition meaningless and defeated the plain remedial purpose of § 12. 273 U. S. at 373. That section, the Court held, supplemented "the remedial provision of the Anti-Trust Act for the redress of injuries resulting from illegal restraints upon interstate trade, by re-

[8] 32 Stat. 823, 36 Stat. 1167, 15 U. S. C. § 29; 43 Stat. 938, 28 U. S. C. § 345.

[9] It is conceded that three of the defendants, Standard, General Motors, and Firestone, transact business within the Southern District of California. The others apparently were served either pursuant to the concluding clause of § 12 or pursuant to § 5 of the Sherman Act. See note 10 infra.

[10] "Sec. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under section four of this act may be pending, that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not; and subpoenas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof." 26 Stat. 210, 15 U. S. C. § 5. Section 4 of the Sherman Act (i. e., "this act") refers specifically to civil actions brought by the Government. Cf. Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359, 374.

[11] See note 46 infra.

[12] In the Scophony case we were concerned, not as here with any question of discretion to decline the exercise of jurisdiction, but in presently pertinent part with the tests of venue prescribed by the section and whether, on the facts presented, those tests had been met, so as to establish venue in the district of suit.

[13] See note 1.

[14] See United States v. Scophony Corp., 333 U. S. 795, Part I at 802-810.

lieving the injured person from the necessity of resorting for the redress of wrongs committed by a non-resident corporation, to a district, however distant, in which it resides or may be 'found'—often an insuperable obstacle—and enabling him to institute the suit in a district, frequently that of his own residence in which the corporation in fact transacts business, and bring it before the court by the service of process in a district in which it resides or may be 'found.'" (Italics added.) 273 U. S. at 373-374.

The Scophony opinion reaffirmed this view: "Thus, by substituting practical, business conceptions for the previous hair-splitting legal technicalities encrusted upon the 'found'—'present' — 'carrying-on-business' sequence, the Court yielded to and made effective Congress' remedial purpose. Thereby it relieved persons injured through corporate violations of the antitrust laws from the 'often insuperable obstacle' of resorting to distant forums for redress of wrongs done in the places of their business or residence. A foreign corporation no longer could come to a district, perpetrate there the injuries outlawed, and then by retreating or even without retreating to its headquarters defeat or delay the retribution due." 333 U. S. at 808.

These conclusions concerning the section's intent and effect are altogether inconsistent with any idea that the defendant corporation can defeat the plaintiff's choice of venue as given, by asking for and securing dismissal of the suit, either on the ground that the venue selected within the statutory limits is inconvenient for the defendant or that another authorized venue is more convenient for it.

No such discretionary power had been exercised by any court during the twenty years of the Sherman Act's application prior to the enactment of § 12, under the narrower range of choice afforded by § 7. None had been suggested, and uniform practice had established that the plaintiff's choice was conclusive, as was true later under § 12 until the deviation in this case.

When therefore Congress came to face the problem of making the nation's antitrust policy more effective through the Clayton Act's provisions, that body was not confronted with any problem of abuse by plaintiffs in selecting venue for antitrust suits; nor was it concerned with any question of providing means by which the defendants in such suits might defeat the plaintiff's choice to serve their own convenience. Congress' concern was quite the opposite. It was to provide broader and more effective relief, both substantively and procedurally, for persons injured by violations of its antitrust policy.[15] Insofar as convenience in bringing suit and conducting trial was involved, the purpose was to make these less inconvenient for plaintiffs or, as was said in the Eastman opinion, to remove the "often insuperable obstacle" thrown in their way by the existing venue restrictions.

To have broadened the choice of venue for the reasons which brought about that action, only to have it narrowed again by application of the vague and discretionary power[16] comprehended by forum non conveniens would have been incongruous, to say the least. In making the change Congress did not authorize plaintiffs to institute civil antitrust suits in the newly specified districts, merely in order to have them transferred back for trial to one of the districts comprehended by § 7. It intended trial to take place in the district specified by the statute and selected by the plaintiff.[17]

This conclusion is supported as strongly by the history of the legislative proceedings [15] The Clayton Act hardly can be regarded as a statute for the relief of corporate defendants in antitrust proceedings from either procedural or substantive abuses. See Levy, The Clayton Law—An Imperfect Supplement to the Sherman Law, 3 Va. L. Rev. 411.

[16] "Wisely, it has not been attempted to catalogue the circumstances which will justify or require either grant or denial of remedy. The doctrine leaves much to the discretion of the court to which plaintiff resorts, and experience has not shown a judicial tendency to renounce one's own jurisdiction so strong as to result in many abuses.

"If the combination and weight of factors requisite to given results are difficult to forecast or state, those to be considered are not difficult to name. An interest to be considered, and the one likely to be most pressed, is the private interest of the litigant. . . . The court will weigh relative advantages and obstacles to fair trial." Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501, 508.

[17] The Eastman opinion referred to the disadvantages suffered by plaintiffs under § 7 of the Sherman Act who were injured where they resided or conducted their business, only to be forced to seek out the wrongdoing company in a distant forum to secure venue and service of process, and therefore also to transport witnesses and incur other disadvantages in trial. 273 U. S. 359, 373-374. Likewise the legislative discussions hereinafter cited uniformly treat the problem as one involving both instituting the suit and trying it. There is no hint that it was contemplated the two phases of the litigation might be separated and conducted in different places. See, e. g., notes 31 and 32 infra.

relating to the enactment of § 12 as by the foregoing judicial constructions. Section 7 of the Sherman Act had limited venue, as we have noted, to districts in which the defendant "resides or is found." As originally introduced in the House, two sections of the Clayton Act, §§ 4 (then § 5) and 12 (then § 10) [18] perpetuated those provisions.[19] During discussion on the floor, however, various Representatives demanded broader choice of venue for plaintiffs. The demand related to both sections, and the discussion went forward now with reference to one, now the other, now both.

The basic aim of the advocates of change was to give the plaintiff the right to bring suit and have it tried in the district where the defendant had committed violations of the Act and inflicted the forbidden injuries.[20] At first they were not much concerned with the exact formulation of the language to accomplish this, several formulas being proposed from time to time.[21] But they were convinced that restricting the choice of venue to districts in which the defendant "resides or is found" was not adequate to assure that the suit could be brought where the cause of action arose, and therefore insisted on change in order to assure that result.[22]

The committee sponsoring the bill had no objection to this purpose; indeed its members expressly approved it.[23] But at first they opposed any amendment, because they thought the object fully achieved by the words "is found." [24] Over this difference

[18] Section 12 began as § 10, became § 11 in the Senate, and finally § 12 in conference. Similarly, § 4 began as § 5, changed first to § 3 and finally to § 4. Section 4 provides for recovery of treble damages in private antitrust proceedings and its venue provisions apply in terms only to such suits. Section 12 applies to "any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation." This literally is broad enough to include the suits comprehended by § 4.

[19] The original wording of the two sections in respect to venue was slightly different but the substance was identical, both following the pre-existing provisions of § 7 of the Sherman Act.

[20] E. g., Representative Dickinson urged that the language "be extended sufficiently to reach every contingency, so that these concerns may be sued in that jurisdiction where they commit the wrong, where the acts complained of may be committed, where the officers, agents, or employees, acting for their master corporation, may be found, setting aside the law, and where the witnesses are easily obtainable. . . ." 51 Cong. Rec. 9190. Later he stated that he wanted to "give the widest liberty of bringing suits where the damage is done and where the action arose." 51 Cong. Rec. 9417.

Representative Sumners spoke to the same effect: "Mr. Chairman, I believe this matter of venue is one of the most important connected with the whole subject of antitrust legislation. . . . The philosophy of legislation with regard to this subject should give the venue at the place wherein the cause of action arises." Id. 9467. See also id. 9414, 9415, 9608.

[21] "Why not at the end of the section, after the word 'found,' add other words, such as 'doing business, or violating the provisions of this law, or wherever it may do business or where its agents, officers, or employees may be found,' or other appropriate language. A dozen suggestions may be made in the way of amendment." Id. 9190. See also id. 9414-9417, 9466, 9607, 9663, 9682.

[22] "Mr. Scott. What is the gentleman's understanding of the word 'found'; what is its import as used in this section?

"Mr. Dickinson. I understand that there is some decision by some court that I am not very familiar with what may possibly cover the very thought suggested by my proposed amendment. I do not believe that it meets the situation, and if there be any doubt about it, in order that the Government may prosecute successfully and institute suits and actions and have trials the language ought to be clear and definite, and so plain that he who runs may read, so that there can not be two constructions." Id. 9415.

"Mr. Cullop. May I suggest . . . that every suit which has arisen under the Sherman antitrust law has been brought at the home of the corporation itself, or at its principal place of business, and therefore there was no occasion to construe this language, 'is found,' which is ambiguous and uncertain. If you are to construe 'is found,' you will have to construe that as the place of the residence of the corporation, because it is not migratory. You can not get service upon some person traveling throughout the country and hold your jurisdiction throughout that territory.

"Mr. Carlin. Why should not the suit be brought in the habitat of the corporation? We have been successful so far in that matter.

"Mr. Cullop. In this case for the very best reason, I think. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Carlin] now has disclosed the purpose of this language, and that is why I am combating it, and for the best of reasons, I think. I do not want to make a resident of California come to Trenton, N. J., to bring a suit for violation of this law, but I want him to sue at home in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose." Id. 9416. See also id. 9466-9467, 9607-9608, 9663-9664.

[23] E. g., Representative Floyd stated that the provisions were designed "to give the Government the widest possible scope in getting service in these cases, and the provision is right as it is written and ought not to be changed." Id. 9416.

[24] "Mr. Floyd. . . . The very broadest language that can be used in a statute of this kind conferring jurisdiction is to give the jurisdiction where the corporation resides or is found." Id. 9415. And "I think the provisions relating to service properly drafted as they appear in the bill, and that the proposed amendment and others suggested in the debate would narrow the scope of the provisions as drawn." Id. 9417. And see id. 9608.

the discussion went forward, as well as over various formulations of the proposed addition. Some were broader than was necessary to achieve the primary aim.[25] Indeed some were so broad that committee members thought their inclusion would jeopardize passage of the entire bill.[26]

To avoid this result and to satisfy those who insisted on amendment, the committee yielded and proposed a substitute amendment for one of those offered from the floor relating to § 4. The committee substitute added the words "or has an agent" after "is found" in the original committee version. 51 Cong. Rec. 9466. This amendment passed the House and later the Senate unchanged. Id. 9467. Section 4 thus became law in its present form, for the limited class of cases covered by its terms. Cf. note 18.

Since however the amendment affected only § 4, the problem concerning § 12 remained unresolved. Suggestions therefore were made at once for amending § 12 to bring it into conformity with § 4. Id. 9467, 9607. Although other proposals were again put forward, id. 9607, the conforming amendment was adopted by the House. Ibid.

After the bill passed the House, it was referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. That committee reported it out with § 12 altered by the substitution of "or transacts business" in place of "or has an agent," but leaving the latter clause in § 4 untouched.[27] The Senate committee reports and the debates in that body throw little light upon the reasons underlying the committee's alteration of § 12 and its failure to alter § 4 so as to make them uniform, except for the general statement that § 12 as reported "concerns venue or the place where suits to enforce the antitrust laws against corporations may be brought and liberalizes the Sherman law to some extent upon this subject."[28] The bill finally passed the Senate with § 12 substantially as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary,[29] and went to conference in that form. In conference the Senate version of § 12 prevailed over that of the House, and the bill was so enacted.[30]

The short outcome was that Congress expanded the venue provisions of the Sherman Act, § 7, in two ways, viz: (1) by adding to "resides or is found," in § 4 of the Clayton Act, the words "or has an agent"; (2) in § 12 by adding "or transacts business." Thus strict uniformity in the two sections' venue provisions was not achieved. But whatever their differences may be, each addition was designed to aid plaintiffs by giving them a wider choice of venues, and thereby to secure a more effective, because more convenient, enforcement of antitrust prohibitions.

Moreover the discussions in Congress, particularly in the House, disclose no other thought than that the choice of forums was given as a matter of right, not as one limited by judicial discretion. There was, in fact, common agreement upon this among both the advocates and the opponents of amendment.[31] No one suggested that the courts would have discretionary power to decline

[25] See, e. g., Representative Cullop's suggestion to confer jurisdiction on state courts without a right of removal to the federal courts. Id. 9662-9664.

[26] In opposing the suggestion to confer jurisdiction on the state courts, Representative Floyd argued, inter alia, that "any friend of this legislation, as I am sure the gentleman from Indiana [Representative Cullop] is, ought not to aid those who are fighting this legislation—the trusts and the combines of this country—by loading it down with questionable amendments that will tend to defeat it and destroy it in the end." Id. 9663.

[27] In place of the House amendment to § 12 of "or has an agent," the Senate committee substituted this language: "or transacts any business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found." Sen. Rep. No. 698, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 73.

[28] 51 Cong. Rec. 14214. See id. 14596, 15943, 16048-16052.

[29] An amendment providing for stockholder suits against officers of a corporation violating the antitrust laws was added by the Senate but deleted in conference. See the references cited in note 28.

[30] Sen. Doc. No. 583, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 9. Sen. Doc. No. 584, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 18.

[31] See notes 25, 26. The following are examples of the discussion on the plaintiff's right to choose: "Mr. Dickinson. . . . I do not ask to strike out any language of the committee, but simply to add to it, to make clear and definite and certain so that any person and any corporation may be sued not only where it has its residence as a corporation or individual, but that it can be sued wherever it is found doing business and the cause of action may arise.

"Mr. Stephens of Texas. . . . I thoroughly agree. . . ." 51 Cong. Rec. 9414.

"I will say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] that we are liberalizing the procedure in the courts in order to give the individual who is damaged the right to get his damages anywhere—anywhere you can catch the offender, as is suggested by a friend sitting near by." The quoted language is that of Representative Webb. 51 Cong. Rec. 16274. See id. 9467, 9607; also note 32.

to exercise the jurisdiction conferred. But since it was universally agreed that the choice of venue, to whatever extent it might be conferred, was to be given as a matter of right, several of the broader amendments were opposed and defeated as going too far.[32]

Congress therefore was not indifferent to possibilities of abuse involved in the various proposals for change. Exactly the opposite was true. For the broader proposals were not rejected because they gave the plaintiff the choice. They were rejected because the choice given was too wide, giving plaintiffs the power to bring suit and force trial in districts far removed from the places where the company was incorporated, had its headquarters, or carried on its business. In adopting § 12 Congress was not willing to give plaintiffs free rein to haul defendants hither and yon at their caprice. 51 Cong. Rec. 9466, 9467. But neither was it willing to allow defendants to hamper or defeat effective enforcement by claiming immunity to suit in the districts where by a course of conduct they had violated the Act with the resulting outlawed consequences. In framing § 12 to include those districts at the plaintiffs' election, Congress thus had in mind not only their convenience but also the defendant company's inconvenience, and fixed the limits within which each could claim advantage in venue and beyond which neither could seek it. Moreover, in § 12, though not in § 4, the right of choice conferred was given designedly to the Government as well as to private suitors.[33]

In the face of this history we cannot say that room was left for judicial discretion to apply the doctrine of forum non conveniens so as to deprive the plaintiff of the choice given by the section. That result, as other courts have concluded, would be utterly inconsistent with the purpose of Congress in conferring the broader range of choice. Tivoli Realty v. Interstate Circuit, 167 F. 2d 155; Ferguson v. Ford Motor Co., 77 F. Supp. 425.

In this view of Congress' action, numerous considerations of policy urged by the appellees as supporting the discretionary power's existence and applicability become irrelevant. Congress' mandate regarding venue and the exercise of jurisdiction is binding upon the federal courts. Const. Art. III, § 2. Our general power to supervise the administration of justice in the federal courts, cf. McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332, does not extend to disregarding a validly enacted and applicable statute or permitting departure from it, even in such matters as venue.

It is true that the appellees made a strong showing of inconvenience, albeit by interested persons, when that matter is considered on their presentation alone. On the other hand, the Government advanced strong reasons, apart from the question of power, for not applying the doctrine.[34] But in the view we take of § 12, we need not consider whether the appellees' showing on the facts sufficiently outweighed that of the Government to justify dismissal.[35]

Two important policy considerations were advanced by the Government, however, which not only bear strongly upon that question but affect the question of power, if Congress had not concluded it. The first is that permitting the application of forum non conveniens to antitrust cases inevitably would lengthen litigation already overextended in the time required for its final [32] "Mr. Scott. I could not conceive that anything would deprive the plaintiff of his right to choose the place of trial if he so desired, either in the district where found or where the corporation resides." Id. 9417.

"Mr. Scott. . . . The amendment enlarges the present interpretation of the word 'found' as applied to the corporate jurisdiction, and permits suit to be brought, with absolute discretion on the part of the plaintiff, in any district in which the defendant may have an agent, without defining the character of that agent." (Italics added.) Id. 9467.

[33] Representative Floyd remarked that the committee "language was used to make this section conform to the existing law and enable him [the Attorney General] to have greater liberty in bringing these suits." Id. 9415. And see note 23 supra.

[34] See notes 6 and 7.

[35] It should be noted, however, that "the mere balance of convenience" in favor of defendants would be insufficient to justify application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens. This has been true since the earliest Scottish and English cases applying the doctrine, although the test has been variously formulated. For example, dismissal has been authorized if suit is "vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the Court," or "only brought to annoy the defendant." See Braucher, The Inconvenient Federal Forum, 60 Harv. L. Rev. 908, 909-911. Cf. also note 16 supra.

disposition, and thus would violate Congress' declared policy of expediting this type of litigation.[36]

The argument has merit to support the conclusion we have reached upon the statute. Antitrust suits, even with all the expedition afforded them, are notoriously though often perhaps unavoidably long drawn out. The more complex and important cases seldom require less than three to five years to conclude,[37] except possibly where consent decrees are entered. Often the time necessary or taken is much longer. To inject into this overlengthened procedure what would amount to an additional preliminary trial and review upon the convenience of the forum could not but add approximately another year or longer to the time essential for disposing of the cases, indeed for reaching the merits.[38] Although some instances of inconvenience to defendants will arise from the absence of discretionary power, that will be unavoidably true in almost any event. And it may well be doubted that the sum total of inconvenience and injustice resulting will be as great as would follow, for both private plaintiffs and the public, from allowing the inescapable delay incident to the exercise of such a discretionary power. For once the power were found to exist, it is more than likely that injection of the issue would become a common incident of antitrust suits, and create the disadvantage of delay for all concerned.

This consideration is reinforced by another, namely, the difficulty of applying the doctrine in cases such as this, in which the violations charged are nationwide or nearly so in scope and effect, and the defendants are numerous companies widely scattered in the location of their places of incorporation, principal offices, and places of carrying on business and participating in the scheme. In such a case dismissal in one authorized district cannot reinstate or transfer the cause to another. Nor can the court, within the limits of the doctrine, specify the district in which the case shall be reinstituted and tried. It can only terminate the pending proceeding, as was done here, without prejudice to commencement of a like suit "in a more appropriate or convenient forum," with whatever consequences may follow from having to begin all over again.

Further, when it is done, the result well may be in some instances to have the action commenced again, only to precipitate the same issue and consequent delay in the second forum. Conceivably this could occur from forum to forum in succession, depending upon the number of corporations named as defendants and the variety, proximity, and degree of concentration of the locations of their principal offices, places of business, and the relative advantages of other available forums for the variously situated defendants. Accordingly, in an unknown number of such cases the practical result well might be to establish a merry-go-round of litigation upon the issue, which could be used to defer indefinitely consideration of the merits. The very possibility of such a tactic would greatly hamper the institution as well as the conclusion of antitrust proceedings. Indeed, for cases of this complex type, the uncertainty concerning the outcome of an effort to apply the doctrine might go far toward defeating the Act's effective application to the most serious and widespread offenses and offenders.[39]

[36] Congress has provided that the trial of these actions may, upon request of the Attorney General, "be given precedence over others and in every way expedited, and be assigned for hearing at the earliest practicable day. . . ." 32 Stat. 823, 15 U. S. C. § 28. The policy of expediting final decision of these cases is further implemented by authorizing direct appeals to this Court. 32 Stat. 823, 15 U. S. C. § 29.

[37] See, e. g., Schine v. United States, 334 U. S. 100; United States v. Griffith, 334 U. S. 100, which were instituted in 1939 and have recently been remanded for further proceedings in the trial courts. And the Eastman case, 273 U. S. 359, though begun in 1915, was not decided by this Court until 1927.

[38] In this case, although the proceedings have advanced without unwarranted delay at any one stage, more than a year has been consumed solely on the issue of forum non conveniens. The complaint was filed on April 10, 1947. Motions to dismiss, supported by affidavits to show inconvenience, were filed in August and September. The trial court made findings and entered judgment of dismissal on October 15 and allowed an appeal on December 3. The Government filed its statement as to jurisdiction in this Court on January 20, 1948; we noted probable jurisdiction on February 9, heard oral argument on April 28, and today we resolve the issue. But for the intervention of the motions, the consequent dismissal and appeal, the case with appropriate expedition might now be well on the way to final decision on the merits.

[39] In this case these possibilities have been discounted, largely upon the basis that the appellees had joined in stipulating that all regarded the Illinois forum "as the proper forum for the above action" and that, in case of dismissal in the California district and filing of a like suit in the Illinois district, the defendants would not move for dismissal of the new suit

Further, even if it is taken that the appellees' activities constituting the core of the violations charged were as fully concentrated in or near the Illinois district as appellees claim, such a concentration might or might not exist in other like proceedings. And in the latter event the problem of selecting the appropriate forum well might become a highly uncertain and difficult one.[40]

The appellees also strongly urge two other considerations which deserve mention. One is that a criminal prosecution against the appellees (together with seven individuals, officers of some of them), pending in the California district simultaneously with this cause and growing out of substantially the same transactions, had been transferred to the Illinois district shortly before the District Court entered its judgment of dismissal.[41] The transfer was ordered pursuant to Rule 21 (b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[42] That action was taken after the District Court had made findings of fact and conclusions of law founded upon and substantially adopting the appellees' showing, which was practically identical with their showing in this case. Consequently, as the cases now stand, the criminal cause is to be tried in the Illinois district while this civil suit founded upon practically the same transactions and affecting the same corporate defendants is to be tried in the California district.

Great emphasis is placed upon this as an impelling reason for holding forum non conveniens applicable here, and then sustaining the order of dismissal under that doctrine and the District Court's findings. But, for the reasons above stated, we think the matter has been concluded by the terms and intent of § 12. Moreover, it is at least doubtful whether the Government had a right to appeal from the order of transfer in the criminal case.[43] In any event, the validity of that order is not before us. We therefore express no opinion upon either of those questions. But the fact that we cannot do so goes far to nullify the effect of appellee's argument of hardship arising from the transfer. For that argument comes down, in the peculiar circumstances, to one on the ground of forum non conveniens. The stipulation perhaps would be effective in this case to avoid the complexities of repeated motions if suit were reinstituted in Chicago, but not if the Government should select any of the other venues open to it under § 12.

In any event the stipulation is wholly irrelevant to any question of the general effect of the doctrine's applicability upon antitrust proceedings. For once that were established, no defendant or group of defendants in subsequent cases would be bound, or perhaps likely, to execute such a stipulation.

[40] As the Government points out, in practically all of the more complex types of antitrust proceedings, the principal defendants are corporations doing a multistate business, and the combination or conspiracy charged seldom has a defined locus. In such situations, it is generally true that, whatever the forum chosen by the plaintiff, it will be inconvenient for some of the defendants and often for most of them. When there is such diffusion of possible venue, that fact of course would be basis for declining to apply the doctrine of forum non conveniens, even if applicable. It is also reason for declining to accept the view that the doctrine was intended to be applicable.

Thus, in this case, all but two of the appellees were incorporated and hence "reside" in Delaware. None are incorporated in Illinois, and only two have their principal places of business or headquarters in Chicago. The invariable practice for fifty-four years, first under § 7, then under § 12, has been that suit may be maintained and trial had at the plaintiff's election where the corporation "resides" or where it "is found." But if this suit had been brought in Delaware or at any of the principal places of business except Chicago, under the application of forum non conveniens made here the trial could not have proceeded in any of those other places. Cf. Tivoli Realty v. Interstate Circuit, 167 Fed. 2d 155. The statute, § 12, does not require trial to be had where the agreement in conspiracy takes place. Locus of coming to agreement is not the gist of the offenses proscribed.

[41] The indictment was returned on April 9, 1947; on August 14, 1947, defendants' motion to transfer the cause was granted. The civil complaint was filed on April 10, 1947, and dismissed on October 15, 1947.

[42] Rule 21 (b) provides: "Offense Committed in Two or More Districts or Divisions. The court upon motion of the defendant shall transfer the proceeding as to him to another district or division, if it appears from the indictment or information or from a bill of particulars that the offense was committed in more than one district or division and if the court is satisfied that in the interest of justice the proceeding should be transferred to another district or division in which the commission of the offense is charged." Cf. note 43 and text. In addition to the questions there reserved, we express no opinion on whether Rule 21 (b) applies to criminal antitrust prosecutions.

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure became effective March 21, 1946. It would be stretching very far the idea of utilizing legislative history, if criminal rules adopted twenty-two years after a civil statute was enacted were given any significance upon the meaning or effect of the statute.

[43] The precise point apparently has not arisen since the adoption of Rule 21 (b), but there would seem to be no statutory basis for appeal from an order of this type. See 18 U. S. C. § 682. See also Semel v. United States, 158 F. 2d 231, 232.

that because the District Court on appellees' application has transferred the criminal cause by a dubiously reviewable order, perforce of that action it should also dismiss this civil cause and we should sustain the dismissal.

In practical effect the outcome of accepting such an argument as ground for sustaining both the power and the dismissal would be to make Rule 21 (b) controlling in civil as well as criminal cases involving the same transactions and parties, thus overriding § 12, and at the same time depriving the plaintiff in the civil cause of anything more than perfunctory review of the District Court's order of dismissal.[44]

Hardly can it be taken that Rule 21 (b) was intended so to override the provisions of § 12, to confer power on the District Courts to do so, or to nullify the plaintiff's right of appeal from an order depriving it of the statutory privilege of choosing the venue. Yet these would be the practical results, if the consideration that the court has ordered transfer of the criminal case is to be controlling or highly influential, as it undoubtedly would be in most cases, in applying the doctrine of forum non conveniens in the civil cause. If matters of policy were material, these possible consequences would add force to the view that the doctrine is not applicable.

Moreover, if the transfer should result in hardship to the appellees,[45] insofar as the hardship arises from that cause it is one which was avoidable by them and will be incurred as a result of their own action in applying for it. That they have voluntarily incurred it is no good reason for depriving the plaintiff of its statutory right of choice under the terms and policy of § 12 in the entirely distinct civil suit.

Finally, both appellees and the District Court have placed much emphasis upon this Court's recent decisions applying the doctrine of forum non conveniens and in some instances extending the scope of its application.[46] Whatever may be the scope of its previous application or of its appropriate extension, the doctrine is not a principle of universal applicability, as those decisions uniformly recognize. At least one invariable, limiting principle may be stated. It is that whenever Congress has vested courts with jurisdiction to hear and determine causes and has invested complaining litigants with a right of choice among them which is inconsistent with the exercise by those courts of discretionary power to defeat the choice so made, the doctrine can have no effect. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Kepner, 314 U. S. 44; Miles v. Illinois Central R. Co., 315 U. S. 698. The question whether such a right has been given is usually the crux of the problem. It is one not to be answered by such indecisive inquiries as whether the venue or jurisdictional statute is labeled a "special" or a "general" one. Nor is it to be determined merely by the court's view that applicability of the doctrine would serve the ends of justice in the particular case. It is rather to be decided, upon consideration of all the relevant materials, by whether the legislative purpose and the effect of the language used to achieve it were to vest the power of choice [44] All that defendants would have to do, in any practical sense, in order to secure dismissal, would be to convince the District Court that transfer of the criminal cause should be made, and then demonstrate the self-evident fact that trial of the two causes in different districts would be inconvenient.

[45] In view of our decision in this civil case, there would be nothing to prevent appellees from making a motion under Rule 21 (b) of the Criminal Rules to have the criminal cause retransferred to the Southern District of California, if in the changed outlook arising from this decision that should be their pleasure.

The Government argues further that as a practical matter there is little likelihood that appellees will be forced to defend both actions. For its distinctly footnote value we quote from its brief:

"When the Government believes that there has been a violation of the Sherman Act, it sometimes seeks corrective relief by way of a civil suit filed after, or simultaneously with, the return of a criminal indictment, but when companion proceedings are thus instituted it is only rarely that both are ultimately brought to trial. If it is held on the present appeal that dismissal of the civil complaint was erroneous, the Government will not seek to bring the criminal and the civil cases to trial simultaneously and, in any event, it is highly unlikely that it will be found necessary to bring both cases to trial.

"If the Government obtains a decree in a civil suit, the defendants in a related criminal case usually file pleas of nolo contendere. If the criminal case is tried first and verdicts of guilty are returned, there is nothing left for trial in the civil case except the question of relief (Local 167 v. United States, 291 U. S. 293, 298-299), and the parties are customarily able to reach an agreement on this question and dispose of the civil case by the entry of a consent decree."

in the plaintiff or to confer power upon the courts to qualify his selection.

This is a case in which the pertinent factors make clear that the courts were given no such power. Accordingly the judgment is Reversed.

[Concurring Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring.

I agree with the conclusion of the Court but arrive at it by a shorter and different route.

We have just had occasion to review and to decide, by a divided Court, cases involving the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U. S. 501; Koster v. Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Co., 330 U. S. 518. We there held that, in cases where the plaintiff was in court in an ordinary civil suit only by reason of the venue statutes that apply generally, the court could exercise discretion in dismissing complaints to prevent imposition on its jurisdiction if the circumstances of the particular case showed an abuse of the option vested in plaintiff by the general venue statutes. But we also pointed out that, where the choice of forum was authorized by a special venue statute, this discretion to dismiss would not be implied. The distinctions there made between general and special venue statutes may have been overly simple from the viewpoint of the dialectician. But as working tools of everyday craftsmen they do serve to point out a difference that I think governs here.

Congress made some rather unusual provisions as to venue in antitrust cases. Had it stopped there, it might have been permissible for the courts to devise their own limitations to prevent abuse of their process. But Congress did not stop there. Not only once but three times it has enacted almost identical provisions which check any abuse or oppression from compelling defendants to defend in places remote from their habitat. 15 U. S. C. § 5 (1890), 15 U. S. C. § 10 (1894), 15 U. S. C. § 25 (1914).

The scheme of the statutes, as I see it, is that the Attorney General may lay the venue in any district where he may properly serve one or more of his defendants. He may go ahead with his action against them, whether he is allowed to bring in others or not. Before he can bring in other parties than those properly served in the district, i. e., those "inhabitant," "transacting business," or "found" there, it must be made to appear to the court that the ends of justice require that they be brought before the court, in which case they may be summoned from any district.

Congress has here provided a practice by which any defendant, who has not subjected himself to suit in the district, may obtain the same protections which the forum non conveniens doctrine would afford.

In this case, the defendants, who might be entitled to urge the doctrine, have not resisted or contested the order bringing them into the suit. It was by so doing that they could have shown that the ends of justice would not be served by such action. Instead, they desire to submit to being brought in and then use their position to throw the whole case out. This, I think, cannot be done.

The special provision Congress has made, both to establish venue and to protect against its abuse, whether the exact equivalent of forum non conveniens or not, seem to me to preclude its application by the courts to this class of cases.

For this reason I concur in the result.

[Dissenting Opinion]

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, dissenting.

This is an equity suit for violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Law brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California. The same defendants were indicted in the same court for the same transactions under the criminal provisions of the Sherman Law. That court transferred the criminal proceedings from the Southern District of California to the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois because it was "in the interest of justice" to order the transfer. In doing so, the court below was obedient to Rule 21 (b)[1] of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, formulated by this Court and having the force of law. 327 U. S. 823 et seq. With convincing particularity the District Court set forth its reasons for making this transfer.[2] After the transfer of the criminal case, the court granted the motion now before us, dismissing the equity suit "in the interest of justice, just as the same facts in the companion criminal prosecution required its transfer to another district." 7 F. R. D. 456, 465.

[1] "The court upon motion of the defendant shall transfer the proceeding as to him to another district or division, if it appears from the indictment or information or from a bill of particulars that the offense was committed in more than one district or division and if the court is satisfied that in the interest of justice the proceeding should be transferred to another district or division in which the commission of the offense is charged."

Is it not incongruous that that which "the interest of justice" demanded in the criminal prosecution is beyond the power of a court in a civil suit against the same defendants on the same transactions?[3]

Of course Congress may leave no choice to a court to entertain a suit even though it is vexatious and oppressive for the plaintiff to choose the particular district in which he pursues his claim. But such limitation upon the power of courts to administer justice ought not to be lightly drawn from language merely conferring jurisdiction. The manner in which jurisdictional provisions are appropriately to be read is illustrated by our decision in Massachusetts v. Missouri, 308 U. S. 1, where this Court recognized "considerations of convenience, efficiency and justice" even when a State invoked the Court's original jurisdiction in what was concededly a justiciable controversy. 308 U. S. at 19. I do not find in the scheme of the anti-trust acts and of their relevant legislative history the duty to exercise jurisdiction so imperative as to preclude judicial discretion in refusing to entertain a suit where "the interest of justice" commands it.

Defendants in an anti-trust suit may no doubt attempt to resort to delaying tactics by motions claiming unfairness of a particular forum. Neither must we be indifferent to the potentialities of unfairness in giving the Government a wholly free hand in selecting its forum so long as technical requirements of venue are met. See, e. g., The Railway Shopmen's Strike case, 283 F. 479. All parties to a litigation tend to become partisans, and confidence in the fair administration of justice had better be rested on exacting standards in the quality of the federal judiciary. Federal judges ought to be of a calibre to be able to thwart obstructive tactics by defendants and not be denied all power to check attempted unfairness by a too zealous Government.

I find nothing in the anti-trust acts comparable to the considerations which led this Court to conclude that the provisions of the Federal Employers Liability Act were designed to give railroad employees a privileged position in bringing suits under that Act. See, especially, concurring opinion in Miles v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 315 U. S. 698, 705.

I am of opinion that the District Court had power to entertain the motion on the basis of which it entered the judgment.

MR. JUSTICE BURTON joins this dissent. here.

[¶ 62,260] United States v. Columbia Steel Company, Consolidated Steel Corporation, United States Steel Corporation and United States Steel Corporation of Delaware.

In the United States Supreme Court. No. 461. June 7, 1948.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Delaware.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Acquisition By Major Steel Company of Steel Fabricating Company—No Unreasonable Restraint of Trade.—The proposed acquisition, by a subsidiary of a major steel company, of a company engaged in steel fabrication will not unreasonably restrain trade, and is not an attempt to monopolize trade, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The conclusions of the District Court that the competition between the unit being acquired

[2] "I do not question the motive of the Government in instituting the prosecution in this district.

"But I am satisfied that a trial here would impose unnecessary hardships on the defendants and entail unjustifiable expense which it is the object of the new rules of criminal procedure, and especially of the rule under discussion, to avoid. Altogether the facts spell out the vexatiousness and oppressiveness which the Supreme Court has warned us to eschew in matters of this character." 7 F. R. D. 393, 402-403.

[3] Cf. L. Hand, J., in United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 429: "In United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U. S. 219, 61 S. Ct. 463, 85 L. Ed. 788, a later statute in pari materia was considered to throw a cross light upon the Anti-trust Acts, illuminating enough even to override an earlier ruling of the court."

and units of the parent corporation which are engaged in comparable fabrication is too insubstantial to render the removal of such competition prejudicial to the public interest, and that the loss of the acquired unit as a potential customer for steel products of competitors in the field of steel production is too insubstantial to constitute a restraint of trade or attempted monopoly, are held supported by the evidence. The so-called vertical integration resulting from the acquisition does not unreasonably restrict the opportunities of the competitor producers of rolled steel to market their product. On the basis of the situation here presented, the court is unwilling to hold that possibilities of interference with future competition are serious enough to justify it in declaring that the merger will bring about unlawful restraint. The government has failed to establish a specific intent to monopolize by means of the proposed merger. Mr. Justice Douglas, with whom three Justices concur, states in the dissenting opinion that the requisite purpose or intent to monopolize is present if monopoly or restraint of trade results as a direct and necessary consequence of the acts done, and that the effect of the proposed acquisition is to give to the parent corporation control of a market for which it has in the past had to compete, and which will result in the elimination of competition in that market.

See the Sherman Act Annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1210.201.

Affirming the decision of the United States District Court for the District of Delaware, reported in '44-'47 Court Decisions Supp. at ¶ 57,639.

For appellant: Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General; John F. Sonnett, Assistant Attorney General.

For appellee: Alfred Wright, Los Angeles, California; Aaron Finger, Wilmington, Delaware.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

The United States brings this suit under § 4 of the Sherman Act to enjoin United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries from purchasing the assets of the largest independent steel fabricator on the West Coast on the ground that such acquisition would violate §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.[1] The complaint, filed on February 24, 1947, charged that if the contract of sale between United States Steel and Consolidated Steel Corporation were carried out, competition in the sale of rolled steel products and in fabricated steel products would be restrained, and that the contract indicated an effort on the part of United States Steel to attempt to monopolize the market in fabricated steel products. After a trial before a single judge in the district court, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the government brought the case hereby direct appeal. 32 Stat. 823, 15 U. S. C. § 29.

The underlying facts in the case are set forth in the findings of the trial court, and with a few exceptions those findings are not disputed by the government. We rely chiefly on the findings to indicate the nature of the commerce here in question and the extent to which competition would be affected by the challenged contract.

[1] Sections 1, 2 and 4, 15 U. S. C., read, so far as applicable, as follows:

§ 1. "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal: . . . Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy declared by sections 1-7 of this title to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

§ 2. "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

§ 4. "The several district courts of the United States are invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of sections 1-7 of this title; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. . . ."

The steel production involved in this case may be spoken of as being divided into two stages: the production of rolled steel products and their fabrication into finished steel products. Rolled steel products consist of steel plates, shapes, sheets, bars, and other unfinished steel products and are in turn made from ingots by means of rolling mills. The steel fabrication involved herein may also be divided into structural fabrication and plate fabrication. Fabricated structural steel products consist of building framework, bridges, transmission towers, and similar permanent structures, and are made primarily from rolled steel shapes, although plates and other rolled steel products may also be employed. Fabricated plate products, on the other hand, consist of pressure vessels, tanks, welded pipe, and similar products made principally from rolled steel plates, although shapes and bars are also occasionally used. Both plate and structural fabricated products are made to specifications for a particular purpose; fabricated products do not include standard products made by repetitive processes in the manufacture of general steel merchandise such as wire, nails, bolts, and window frames. The manufacture of such standardized finished products is not involved in this case. The facilities required for structural fabrication are quite different from those required for plate fabrication; the former require equipment for shearing, punching, drilling, assembling, and riveting or welding structural shapes whereas the latter require equipment for bending, rolling, cutting, and forming the plates which go into the finished product.

The complaint lists four defendants: Columbia Steel Company, Consolidated Steel Corporation, United States Steel Corporation, and United States Steel Corporation of Delaware. United States Steel and its subsidiaries engage in the business of producing rolled steel products and in structural fabrication, but do no plate fabrication work. Consolidated Steel, the sale of whose assets the government seeks to enjoin, is engaged only in structural fabrication and plate fabrication. United States Steel with its subsidiaries is the largest producer of rolled steel products in the United States, with a total investment of more than a billion and a half dollars. During the ten-year period 1937-1946 United States Steel produced almost exactly a third of all rolled steel products produced in the United States, and average sales for that period were nearly a billion and a half dollars. In the five-year period 1937-1941, average sales were a little over a billion dollars. Consolidated, by contrast, had plants whose depreciated value was less than ten million dollars. During the five-year period 1937-1941, Consolidated had average sales of only twenty million dollars, and the United States Steel committee which negotiated the terms of the purchase of Consolidated estimated that Consolidated's sales in the future would run to twenty-two million dollars annually and agreed with Consolidated on a purchase price of slightly in excess of eight million dollars. During the war Consolidated produced over a billion and a half dollars worth of ships with government furnished facilities. Consolidated no longer possesses any facilities for building ships.[2]

Columbia Steel, a wholly-owned subsidiary of United States Steel, has been the largest rolled steel producer in the Pacific Coast area since 1930, with plants in Utah and California, and has also served as selling agent for other rolled steel subsidiaries of United States Steel, and for two subsidiaries of that company engaged in structural fabrication, the American Bridge Company at Pittsburgh and the Virginia Bridge Company at Roanoke, Virginia, though neither it nor any other subsidiary of United States Steel in the Consolidated market area was a fabricator of any kind. National Tube Company, another United States Steel subsidiary, sells pipe and tubing. Consolidated has structural fabricating plants near Los Angeles and at Orange, Texas, and plate fabricating facilities in California and Arizona. Consolidated has sold it products during the past ten years in eleven states, referred to hereafter as the Consolidated market: Arizona, California,

[2] An uncontested statement of Consolidated's ship building activities during the war years appears in Consolidated's brief:

"During the war years, acting under Government sponsorship, Consolidated constructed ships for defense and war purposes for various Government procurement agencies but it is no longer engaged in this field. Consolidated's war work was confined to ship and ordnance construction with Government furnished facilities, all of which have now been abandoned. Consolidated Shipyards, Inc., a Consolidated subsidiary operating a small boat yard, has disposed of its plant to a group of real estate speculators. There is, therefore, no competition between U. S. Steel and Consolidated in the shipbuilding business."

Idaho, Louisiana, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Texas, Utah and Washington. It is that market which the government views as significant in determining the extent of competition between United States Steel and Consolidated. It is not the usual Pacific and Mountain States groups employed by the Census.[3] United States Steel Corporation of Delaware is a subsidiary of United States Steel which renders technical assistance to other subsidiaries engaged in steel production.

Rolled steel products have traditionally been sold on a basing point system.[4] Prior to World War II rolled steel was sold on the West Coast at a price computed on the basis of eastern basing points, even though both United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel produced rolled steel products in California. Fabricators such as Consolidated thus did not get the full benefit of their proximity to the western market. The competitive disadvantages under which western fabricators worked is illustrated by the fact that United States Steel has been the largest seller of fabricated structural steel in the Consolidated market, even though it has no fabricating plants in the area. During the ten-year period ending in 1946, 100 different concerns bid successfully in competition with United States Steel for the sale of fabricated structural products in the Consolidated market; 50 of those concerns are located outside the area. United States Steel's principal competitor as measured on a national basis, Bethlehem Steel, does have fabricating facilities in California, however, and prior to World War II United States Steel had prepared plans for the erection of fabricating facilities in California. The war made it necessary to postpone the plans. This use of eastern basing points makes past figures on rolled steel product sales from producers in the Consolidated market unreliable in determining effective competition for the future sales of rolled steel in that market. United States Steel now uses Geneva as a basing point.

The urgent wartime demand for steel prompted the government to construct new rolled steel plants in the West. The largest of these plants was erected at Geneva, Utah, at a cost of nearly $200,000,000, and was designed, constructed, and operated by United States Steel for the account of the government. The plant had an annual capacity of more than 1,200,000 tons if ingots, which in turn could be employed to make 700,000 tons of plates and 250,000 tons of shapes. Another large plant was erected by the government at Fontana, California. This is now operated through arrangements of private parties with the government. In January 1945 United States Steel considered the acquisition of the Geneva plant, but because of the speculative nature of the venture and attacks by people within and without the government, United States Steel decided not to submit a bid and notified the Defense Plant Corporation to that effect on August 8, 1945. Shortly thereafter the Surplus Property Administrator wrote to Benjamin F. Fairless, President of United States Steel, advising him that a bid by United States Steel would be welcomed. On May 1, 1946, United States Steel submitted a bid for the Geneva plant of $47,500,000. The terms of the bid provided that United States Steel would spend not less than $18,000,000 of its own funds to erect additional facilities at Geneva, and $25,000,000 to erect a cold-reduction mill at Pittsburg, California, to consume 386,000 tons of hot rolled coils produced at Geneva.[5] The bid estimated that a sufficient market could be found to absorb an annual production ranging from 456,000 to [4] In 1924 the Federal Trade Commission entered an order which concluded that United States Steel had violated § 2 of the Clayton Act and § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act by its so-called "Pittsburgh plus" method of pricing, according to which all rolled steel products were sold at a delivered price including freight from Pittsburgh to the destination, regardless of the actual point of shipment. Matter of United States Steel Corp., 8 F. T. C. 1. United States Steel was ordered to cease and desist from selling its products on that basis, or from employing any basing point other than the point of manufacture or shipment. In 1938 United States Steel filed a petition tor eview that order in the Third Circuit Court of Appeals admitting that United States Steel had never complied with the latter part of the order. No decision has yet been reached in that proceeding.

[5] Cold rolling is the name given to the process of rolling steel products at temperatures ranging from 50° F. to 240° F. Coils which have been produced by the hot rolling process are fed into a cold-reduction mill and rolled into strip and sheets which are of much higher quality than hot rolled strip and sheets. See Camp and Francis, The Making, Shaping and Treating of Steel (5th ed., 1940), pp. 1227-1245.

600,000 tons. The bid stipulated that Geneva products would be sold with Geneva as a basing point. This would offer possibilities for a reduction in the price of rolled steel products to West Coast purchasers and their customers. The variation between 456,000 and 600,000 tons depended on the consumption of rolled steel products by users other than United States Steel's new Pittsburg plant. The bid noted that additional steel consuming manufacturing plants might be located in the West which would provide a market for additional rolled steel products. Apart from the cold-reduction mill to be erected at Pittsburg, the bid was silent as to the acquisition of fabricating facilities by United States Steel to provide a market for Geneva products.

On May 23, 1946, the War Assets Administration announced that the bid of United States Steel was accepted. An accompanying memorandum discussed in detail the six bids which had been received, and concluded that United States Steel's bid was the most advantageous. The other bids were found unacceptable for a number of reasons; either the bidder could offer no assurance of his financial responsibility or his ability to operate the plant, or the price offered was too low, or the bidder requested the government to lend the bidder large sums for the erection of additional facilities or to erect such facilities at government expense.[6] The memorandum noted that the successful bid would "foster the development in the West of new independent enterprise" by encouraging the location of steel-consuming manufacturing plants in the Western states.

On June 17, 1946, the Attorney General advised the War Assets Administration that the proposed sale did not in his opinion constitute a violation of the antitrust laws, and the sale was consummated two days thereafter. The opinion of the Attorney General was requested in accordance with § 20 of the Surplus Property Act of 1944, 58 Stat. 765, 775, which requires such procedure when government plants costing more than $1,000,000 are being sold. That section provides that nothing in the Surplus Property Act "shall impair, amend, or modify the antitrust laws or limit and prevent their application to persons" who buy property under the Act. The Attorney General noted that the ingot capacity of United States Steel had declined from 35.3 per cent of the total national capacity in 1939 to 31.4 per cent in 1946, and that if the Geneva plant were acquired, the percentage would be increased to 32.7 per cent. Considering only the Pacific Coast and Mountain states, the acquisition of Geneva, the Attorney General said, would increase United States Steel's percentage of capacity in that area from 17.3 per cent to 39 per cent. United States Steel, however, estimated that on acquisition of Geneva it would have 51 per cent of ingot capacity in the Pacific Coast area. On the basis of these figures construed in the light of United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, and American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, the Attorney General concluded that the proposed sale, as such, would not violate the antitrust laws. The letter added that no opinion was expressed as to the legality of any acts or practices in which United States Steel might have engaged or in which it might engage in the future. See for a comparable situation United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417, 446.

Prior to the sale of the Geneva plant, Alden G. Roach, President of Consolidated, approached Fairless of United States Steel and indicated that he would like to sell the business of Consolidated. Roach also had conversations with representatives of Bethlehem and Kaiser with regard to the same end. Roach mentioned the subject again to Fairless in February or March of 1946, and Fairless replied that United States Steel was restudying its decision not to bid on the Geneva plant, and did not want to discuss the purchase of Consolidated until the Geneva issue was decided. After the sale of Geneva was affected in June, Fairless spoke again with Roach and arranged to have a committee from United States Steel make an investigation of the Consolidated plants in August. The committee reported that it would cost $14,000,000 and take three years to construct plants equivalent to those owned by Consolidated, and that the Con-

The bid of Pacific-American Steel Iron Corp. proposed that the government lend the bidder $25,000,000 for the erection of a tin-plate mill. solidated properties had a depreciated value of $9,800,000. After further negotiations the parties agreed on a price of approximately $8,250,000, and a purchase agreement was executed on December 14 according to which Columbia agreed to buy the physical assets of Consolidated and four subsidiaries. Fairless testified on the witness stand that United States Steel's purpose in purchasing Consolidated was to assure a market for plates and shapes produced at Geneva, and Roach testified that Consolidated's purpose was to withdraw the stockholders' equity from the fabrication business with its cyclical fluctuations at a time when a favorable price could be realized.

I.

The theory of the United States in bringing this suit is that the acquisition of Consolidated constitutes an illegal restraint of interstate commerce because all manufacturers except United States Steel will be excluded from the business of supplying Consolidated's requirements of rolled steel products, and because competition now existing between Consolidated and United States Steel in the sale of structural fabricated products and pipe will be eliminated. In addition, the government alleges that the acquisition of Consolidated, viewed in the light of the previous series of acquisitions by United States Steel, constitutes an attempt to monopolize the production and sale of fabricated steel products in the Consolidated market. The appellees contend that the amount of competition which will be eliminated is so insignificant that the restraint effected is a reasonable restraint not an attempt to monopolize and not prohibited by the Sherman Act.[7] On the record before us and in agreement with the trial court we conclude that the government has failed to prove its contention that the acquisition of Consolidated would unreasonably lessen competition in the three respects charged, and therefore the proposed contract is not forbidden by § 1 of the Sherman Act. We further hold that the government has failed to prove an attempt to monopolize in violation of § 2.

We turn first to the charge that the proposed purchase will lessen competition by excluding producers of rolled steel products other than United States Steel from supplying the requirements of Consolidated. Over the ten-year period from 1937 to 1946 Consolidated purchased over two million tons of rolled steel products, including the abnormally high wartime requirements. Whatever amount of rolled steel products Consolidated uses in the future will be supplied insofar as possible from other subsidiaries of United States Steel, and other producers of rolled steel products will lose Consolidated as a prospective customer.

The parties are in sharp dispute as to the size and nature of the market for rolled steel products with which Consolidated's consumption is to be compared. The appellees argue that rolled steel products are sold on a national scale, and that for the major producers the entire United States should be regarded as the market. Viewed from this standpoint, Consolidated's requirements are an insignificant fraction of the total market, less than ½ of 1 per cent. The government argues that the market must be more narrowly drawn, and that the relevant market to be considered is the eleven-state area in which Consolidated sells its products, and further that in that area by considering only the consumption of structural and plate fabricators a violation of the Sherman Act has been established. If all sales of rolled steel products in the Consolidated market are considered, Consolidated's purchases of two million tons represent a little more than 3 per cent of the total of 60 million tons. The figure is not appreciably different if the five-year period 1937-41 or 1946 alone are used as the measuring periods.[8] If the comparable market is construed even more narrowly, and is restricted to the consumption of plates and shapes in the Consolidated market, figures for 1937 indicate that Consolidated's consumption of plates and shapes was 13 per cent of the total. Data are offered by the government for 1946 which are too uncertain to furnish a reliable guide.[9]

[7] This was not a purchase of stock of a competing company. See § 7, Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, 731; Federal Trade Comm'n v. Western Meat Co., 272 U. S. 554. It must be assumed, however, that the public policy announced by § 7 of the Clayton Act is to be taken into consideration in determining whether acquisition of assets of Consolidated by United States Steel with the same economic results as the purchase of the stock violates the prohibitions of the Sherman Act against unreasonable restraints. See Handler, Industrial Mergers and the Anti-Trust Laws, 32 Col. L. Rev. 179, 266.

In 1941 the Temporary National Economic Committee proposed that § 7 be amended to apply to acquisition of assets and to require prior approval by the Federal Trade Commission. See Comment, 57 Yale L. J. 613, for a description of the bills which have been introduced before Congress to carry out these recommendations.

The government realizes the force of appellees' argument that rolled steel products are sold on a national scale, and attempts to demonstrate that during the non-war years 80 per cent of Consolidated's requirements were produced on the West Coast; Consolidated resorts to data not in the record to demonstrate that in fact only 26 per cent of Consolidated's rolled steel purchases were produced in plants located in the Consolidated market area.[10] Whether we accept the government's or Consolidated's figures, however, they are of little value in determining the extent to which West Coast fabricators will purchase rolled steel products in the eastern market in the future, since the construction of new plants at Geneva and Fontana and the creation of new basing points on the West Coast will presumably give West Coast rolled steel producers a far larger share of the West Coast fabricating market than before the war.

Another difficulty is that the record furnishes little indication as to the propriety of considering plates and shapes as a market distinct from other rolled steel products. If rolled steel producers can make other products as easily as plates and shapes, then the effect of the removal of Consolidated's demand for plates and shapes must be measured not against the market for plates and shapes alone, but for all comparable rolled products. The record suggests, but does not conclusively indicate, that rolled steel producers can make other products interchangeably with shapes and plates, and that therefore we should not measure the potential injury to competition by considering the total demand for shapes and plates alone, but rather compare Consolidated's demand for rolled steel products with the demand for all comparable rolled steel products in the Consolidated marketing area.

We read the record as showing that the trial court did not accept the theory that the comparable market was restricted to the [9] The government notes that United States Steel in its bid for the Geneva plant estimated that the postwar market in seven Western states would be 227,000 tons of plates and 213,000 tons of shapes per year, and compares with these figures the 1946 purchases of Consolidated of 107,128 tons of plates and 43,770 tons of shapes. Apart from the fact that the figures for estimated consumption included only seven states as against eleven in the Consolidated market, Consolidated's purchases in 1946 were principally devoted to finishing up war contracts. The figures for estimated consumption were based on the assumption that the level of activity would be considerably lower than during the war.

[10] The table from which the government derives this figure of 80 per cent is inconclusive. It refers to "Purchases from West Coast Producers" and does not indicate whether the producers themselves produced the rolled steel products or were acting as agents of eastern producers. There is no challenge to Consolidated's statement that during the years 1937-41 and 1946 deliveries to it from the rolled steel production of the West Coast totaled 208,093 tons as against 495,848 tons from eastern producers.

demand for plates and shapes in the Consolidated area, but did accept the government's theory that the market was to be restricted to the total demand for rolled steel products in the eleven-state area. On that basis the trial court found that the steel requirements of Consolidated represented "a small part" of the consumption in the Consolidated area, that Consolidated was not a "substantial market" for rolled steel producers selling in competition with United States Steel, and that the acquisition of Consolidated would not injure any competitor of United States Steel engaged in the production and sale of rolled steel products in the Consolidated market or elsewhere. We recognize the difficulty of laying down a rule as to what areas or products are competitive, one with another. In this case and on this record we have circumstances that strongly indicate to us that rolled steel production and consumption in the Consolidated marketing area is the competitive area and product for consideration.

In analyzing the injury to competition resulting from the withdrawal of Consolidated as a purchaser of rolled steel products, we have been considering the acquisition of Consolidated as a step in the vertical integration of United States Steel. Regarded as a seller of fabricated steel products rather than as a purchaser of rolled steel products, however, the acquisition of Consolidated may be regarded as a step in horizontal integration as well, since United States Steel will broaden its facilities for steel fabrication through the purchase of Consolidated. In determining the extent of competition between Consolidated and the two structural fabrication subsidiaries of United States Steel in the sale of fabricated steel products, we must again determine the size of the market in which the two companies may be said to compete. The parties agree that United States Steel does no plate fabrication, and that competition is restricted to fabricating structural steel products and pipe. Consolidated makes pipe by bending and welding plates, whereas National Tube, a United States Steel subsidiary, makes seamless pipe through a process which the parties agree does not fall under the heading of steel fabrication.

We turn first to the field of fabricated structural steel products. As in the case of rolled steel, the appellees claim that structural fabricators sell on a national scale, and that Consolidated's production must be measured against all structural fabricators. An index of the position of Consolidated as a structural fabricator is shown by its bookings for the period 1937-1942, as reported by the American Institute of Steel Construction. During that period total bookings in the entire country were nearly 10,000,000 tons, of which Consolidated's share was only 84,533 tons. The government argues that competition is to be measured with reference to the eleven-state area in which Consolidated sells its products. Viewed on that basis, total bookings for the limited area for the six-year period were 1,665,698, of which United States Steel's share was 17 per cent and Consolidated's 5 per cent. The government claims that Consolidated has become a more important factor since that period, and alleges that bookings for 1946 in the Consolidated market were divided among 90 fabricators, of which United States Steel had 13 per cent and Consolidated and Bethlehem Steel each had 11 per cent. The next largest structural fabricators had 9 per cent, 6 per cent and 3 per cent of the total.[11] Although the appellees challenge the accuracy of the government's 1946 figures, and the district court made no reference to them in the findings, we accept them as sufficiently reliable for our present purpose. The figures on which the government relies demonstrate that at least in the past competition in structural steel products has been conducted on a national scale. Five out of the ten structural fabricators having the largest sales in the Consolidated market perform their fabrication operations outside the area, including United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel. Purchasers of fabricated structural products have been able to secure bids from fabricators throughout the country, and therefore statistics showing the share of United States Steel and Consolidated in the total consumption of fabricated structural products in any prescribed area are of little probative value in ascertaining the extent to which consumers of these products would be injured through elimination of competition between the two companies.

As in the case of rolled steel products, however, wartime developments have made prewar statistics of little relevance. The appellees urge three reasons why eastern fabricators will be at a competitive disadvantage with western fabricators for the western market: the availability of rolled steel products from the Geneva plant and other West Coast plants at a lower price, the increase in commercial freight rates on fabricated products, and the abolition of land grant rates. The increase in freight rates has made it less profitable for eastern fabricators to sell in the West, and the elimination of land grant rates on government shipments has made it less profitable for eastern fabricators to sell to government agencies in the West. Whatever competition may have existed in the past between Consolidated and the two bridge company subsidiaries of United States Steel, the appellees urge, will exist to a much lesser extent in the future.[12] Consequently, even though the government may be correct in claiming that the eleven-state area is the proper market for measuring competition with Consolidated, the government may not at the same time claim that prewar statistics as to United States Steel's share of that market are of major significance.

Apart from the question of the geographical size of the market, the appellees urge that the bookings for fabricated structural steel products are of little significance because Consolidated and United States Steel make different types of structural steel products. In view of the fact that structural steel jobs are fabricated on an individual basis, it is difficult to compare the output of United States Steel with that of Consolidated, but the appellees argue that in general Consolidated does only light and medium fabrication, whereas United States Steel does heavy fabrication. The appellees support their argument with an elaborate statistical analysis of bids by the two companies. Those figures show that Consolidated and United States Steel submitted bids for the same project in a very small number of instances.[13] Such figures are not conclusive of lack of competition; the government suggests that knowledge that one party has submitted a bid may discourage others from bidding. The government has introduced very little evidence, however, to show that in fact the types of structural steel products sold by Consolidated are similar to those sold by United States [12] The trial court found that the fabricating subsidiaries of United States Steel would be eliminated from the West Coast market in the future except for specialized products which they are equipped to fabricate economically and which sell at higher prices per ton of product.

Since the record was made up in this case, United States Steel has announced that the mill price for Geneva steel products has been reduced $3 per ton, effective May 1, 1948. That amount represented the previously existing mill price differential of Geneva steel products over products produced at Pittsburgh, Chicago, Gary, and Birmingham. U. S. Steel Quarterly, Vol. 2, No. 2, May 1948, p. 6.

[13] During the ten-year period ending in 1946 United States Steel bid on 2,409 jobs in the Consolidated area and was successful in 839. Consolidated bid on 6,377 jobs and was successful in 2,390. There were only 166 jobs, however, on which both companies bid. Forty of these jobs on which both companies bid were awarded to United States Steel, 35 were awarded to Consolidated, and 91 were awarded to competitors. Reducing these figures to a tonnage basis, United States Steel was awarded bids covering 499,605 tons out of a total tonnage on which bids were submitted of 1,273,152 tons. Consolidated bid on jobs involving 578,847 tons and was awarded 157,997 tons. The tonnage involved in the 166 common bids was 122,353 tons, of which United States Steel's share was 38,920, Consolidated's 24,162, and other competitors 59,271.

The above figures indicate that Consolidated customarily bid on lighter types of work; the average tonnage for Consolidated's bids was 90 tons, whereas the average tonnage for United States Steel was 528 tons. The 166 jobs on which both companies submitted bids were considerably larger in volume, averaging 737 tons.

Steel. The appellees further urge that only a small proportion of Consolidated's business fell in the category of structural steel products, and that as to plate fabrication and miscellaneous work there was no competition with United States Steel whatsoever. The trial court found on this issue that 16 per cent of Consolidated's business was in structural steel products and 70 per cent in plate fabrication. On the basis of the statistics here summarized, the trial court found that competition between the two companies in the manufacture and sale of fabricated structural steel products was not substantial.

The government also argues that competition will be eliminated between Consolidated and National Tube in the sale of pipe. In this field we have no difficulty in determining the geographical scope of the market to be considered in determining the extent of competition, since the government claims that Consolidated and National Tube compete on a nation-wide scale in the field of large diameter pipe for oil and gas pipelines. Other types of pipe made by the two concerns are apparently not competitive as the government does not contest this assertion of the appellees.[14] Consolidated in the past has specialized in comparatively light walled pipe for low pressure purposes, such as irrigation and water transmission, whereas National Tube has made a heavy walled pipe for high pressure purposes which is used chiefly in the oil and gas industry. National Tube pipe is substantially cheaper to produce. The record does show, however, that in the last few years Consolidated has supplied large diameter pipe for oil and gas pipelines on at least four occasions in three of which National Tube also supplied part of the pipe requirements.[15] Although the record does not show the extent of Consolidated's business in this field, one of the witnesses estimated that Consolidated's contract to furnish 90 per cent of the pipe for the Trans-Arabian pipeline would run to almost $30,000,000. The appellees seek to minimize the importance of competition in this field by pointing out that the pipe to be used for the Trans-Arabian pipeline is 30 and 31 inches in diameter, which is too large a size to be made by the seamless process employed by National Tube. The record is barren on the comparative production between Consolidated and its competitors, other than United States Steel, in the manufacture of large pipe. The record does show that other major companies, not connected with any of the parties to this proceeding, do manufacture welded and seamless pipe.[16] The appellees further claim that under normal circumstances Consolidated and National Tube would not compete in this field because Consolidated pipe sells for $30 a ton more than National Tube pipe, and that Consolidated is able to sell its pipe only because of the inability of National Tube and other concerns to take on additional orders. The government argues in reply that Consolidated may be able to [14] The following extract from the record summarizes the evidence on this question:

"A. The type of pipe made by Consolidated is electric weld pipe known as fusion weld or arc weld pipe in sizes from 4-inch up to say 30-inch. We don't make any electric weld pipe. The pipe that Consolidated make other than the pipe larger than 26-inch is made primarily for and sold to the water works industry, and our pipe is sold primarily to the oil and gas industry. We don't make the same type of pipe, and the sizes which we manufacture and the gages and the lengths are in general quite different from those made by Consolidated Steel. They only overlap at a very small part of the field insofar as the physical dimensions of the pipe are concerned.

"Q. You have spoken of pipe made by Consolidated for water conveyance. Are those what have been referred to as penstocks?

"A. No, sir. Well, yes, to a certain extent penstocks, and many other types of low-pressure water pipe. It is true that penstocks are included in that as far as Consolidated is concerned. National Tube Company do not make any penstock pipe. They have not made any for ten years.

"Q. And none of what you term light-pressure pipe?

"A. We don't compete with that. We make high-pressure pipe only."

[15] Roach testified that the first order which Consolidated had filled for such pipe was for the Southern Counties and Southern California gas line, but he did not indicate the size or date of the order. The president of National Tube testified that Consolidated contracted in 1946 to furnish 100 miles of 26-inch pipe for the El Paso Natural Gas Co., National Tube contracted to supply 230 miles, and a third competitor 400 miles. The same witness also testified that National Tube contracted in 1946 to supply a small amount of 24-inch pipe to the Pacific Gas and Electric Co., and that Consolidated in 1947 also agreed to furnish a quantity of pipe for the same pipeline. As of November 30, 1946, Consolidated had unfilled orders for "heavy pipe" of $9,830,079, a figure which does not include the Pacific Gas and Electric or Trans-Arabian order.

[16] E. g., Republic Steel Corp., A. O. Smith Corp., Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. There are other producers in the West.

reduce its costs of production if a sufficiently large volume of orders is obtained, but no evidence is adduced to support such a conclusion.

The opinion of the trial court summarized the facts outlined above, and concluded that there was no substantial competition between National Tube and Consolidated in the sale of pipe; one of the findings went even further, stating that the two companies "do not compete" in the sale of their pipe products.

The trial court also concluded that the government had failed to prove that United States Steel had attempted to monopolize the business of fabricating steel products in the Consolidated market in violation of § 2. The trial judge apparently was of the opinion that since the purchase of Consolidated did not constitute a violation of § 1, it could not constitute a violation of § 2, since every attempt to monopolize must also constitute an illegal restraint. In his findings the trial judge concluded that the purchase agreement was entered into "for sound business reasons" and with no intent to monopolize the production and sale of fabricated steel products.

II.

In support of its position that the proposed contract violates § 1 of the Sherman Act, the government urges that all the legal conclusions of the district court were erroneous. It is argued that without regard to the percentages of consumption of rolled steel products by Consolidated just considered, the acquisition by United States Steel of Consolidated violates the Sherman Act. Such an arrangement, it is claimed, excludes other producers of rolled steel products from the Consolidated market and constitutes an illegal restraint per se to which the rule of reason is inapplicable. Or, phrasing the argument differently, the government's contention seems to be that the acquisition of facilities which provide a controlled market for the output of the Geneva plant is a process of vertical integration and invalid per se under the Sherman Act. The acquisition of Consolidated, it is pointed out, would also eliminate competition between Consolidated and the subsidiaries of United States Steel in the sale of structural steel products and pipe products, and would eliminate potential competition from Consolidated in the sale of other steel products. We also note that the acquisition of Consolidated will bring United States for the first time into the field of plate fabrication.

A. We first lay to one side a possible objection to measuring the injury to competition by reference to a market which is less than nation-wide in area. The Sherman Act is not limited to eliminating restraints whose effects cover the entire United States; we have consistently held that where the relevant competitive market covers only a small area the Sherman Act may be invoked to prevent unreasonable restraints within that area. In United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, we sustained the validity of a complaint which alleged that the defendants had monopolized the cab operating business in four large cities.[37] It is the volume in the area which the alleged restraints affect that is important. In United States v. Griffith, — U. S. —, we found restraint of trade by a chain of motion picture exhibitors covering a small area. Although our previous discussion has indicated the difficulties in accepting the eleven-state area in which Consolidated sells its products as the relevant competitive market, we accept for the purposes of decision the government's argument that this area is the one to be considered in measuring the effect on competition of the withdrawal of Consolidated as a market for other rolled steel producers and of the bringing together under common control of Consolidated and

"Likewise irrelevant is the importance of the interstate commerce affected in relation to the entire amount of that type of commerce in the United States. The Sherman Act is concerned with more than the large, nation-wide obstacles in the channels of interstate trade. It is designed to sweep away all appreciable obstructions so that the statutory policy of free trade might be effectively achieved. As this Court stated in Indiana Farmer's Guide Co. v. Prairie Farmer Co., 293 U. S. 268, 279, 'The provisions of §§ 1 and 2 have both a geographical and distributive significance and apply to any part of the United States as distinguished from the whole and to any part of the classes of things forming a part of interstate commerce.' It follows that the complaint in this case is not defective for failure to allege that CCM has a monopoly with reference to the total number of taxicabs manufactured and sold in the United States. Its relative position in the field of cab production has no necessary relation to the ability of the appellees to conspire to monopolize or restrain, in violation of the Act, an appreciable segment of interstate cab sales. An allegation that such a segment has been or may be monopolized or restrained is sufficient."

the fabricating subsidiaries of United States Steel.

B. The government relies heavily on United States v. Yellow Cab Co., supra, to support its argument that the withdrawal of Consolidated as a possible consumer for the goods of other rolled steel producers constitutes an illegal restraint. The complaint in the Yellow Cab case charged that there was a plan, an intent, to monopolize the cab business, from manufacture through operation in the four large cities, by acquiring cab operating companies or interests therein; tying those companies into a cab manufacturing company and requiring the operating companies to purchase their cabs from the manufacturer at a price above the prevailing market. There was no allegation that the volume of cab production which was thus excluded as a market for rival cab manufacturers was a substantial proportion of the total volume of cabs produced, and the government concludes that the case stands for the proposition that it is illegal per se for a manufacturer to preempt any market for his goods through vertical integration provided that an "appreciable" amount of interstate commerce is involved.[18]

We do not construe our holding in the Yellow Cab case to make illegal the acquisition by United States Steel of this outlet for its rolled steel without consideration of its effect on the opportunities of other competitor producers to market their rolled steel.[19] In discussing the charge in the Yellow Cab case, we said that the fact that the conspirators were integrated did not insulate them from the act, not that corporate integration violated the act. In the complaint the government charged that the defendants had combined and conspired to effect the restraints in question with the intent and purpose of monopolizing the cab business in certain cities, and on motion to dismiss that allegation was accepted as true. Where a complaint charges such an unreasonable restraint as the facts of the Yellow Cab case show, the amount of interstate trade affected is immaterial in determining whether a violation of the Sherman Act has been charged. A restraint may be unreasonable either because a restraint otherwise reasonable is accompanied with a specific intent to accomplish a forbidden restraint or because it falls within the class of restraints that are illegal per se. For example, where a complaint charges that the defendants have engaged in price fixing,[20] or have concertedly refused to deal with nonmembers of an association,[21] or have licensed a patented device on condition that unpatented materials be employed in conjunction with the patented device,[22] then the amount of commerce involved is immaterial because such restraints are illegal per se. Nothing in the Yellow Cab case supports the theory that all exclusive dealing arrangements are illegal per se.

A subsidiary will in all probability deal only with its parent for goods the parent can furnish. That fact, however, does not make the acquisition invalid. When other elements of Sherman Act violations are present, the fact of corporate relationship is material and can be considered in the determination of whether restraint or attempt to restrain exists. That this is the teaching of the Yellow Cab case is indicated by the following quotation:

> "And so in this case, the common ownership and control of the various corporate appellees are impotent to liberate the [18] The government relies particularly on the following excerpt, 332 U. S. at 226-27:

"Nor can it be doubted that combinations and conspiracies of the type alleged in this case fall within the ban of the Sherman Act. By excluding all cab manufacturers other than CCM from that part of the market represented by the cab operating companies under their control, the appellees effectively limit the outlets through which cabs may be sold in interstate commerce. Limitations of that nature have been condemned time and again as violative of the Act. . . . In addition, by preventing the cab operating companies under their control from purchasing cabs from manufacturers other than CCM, the appellees deny those companies the opportunity to purchase cabs in a free, competitive market. The Sherman Act has never been thought to sanction such a conspiracy to restrain the free purchase of goods in interstate commerce."

[19] The general language of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act has been construed as prohibiting only unreasonable restraints, not all possible restraints of trade. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1. In this it differs somewhat from the more specific language of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, or the Federal Trade Commission Act, 38 Stat. 717. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Morton Salt Co., No. 464, 1947 Term, slip opinion p. 7, and Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U. S. 346, 356.

alleged combination and conspiracy from the impact of the Act. The complaint charges that the restraint of interstate trade was not only effected by the combination of the appellees but was the primary object of the combination. The theory of the complaint, to borrow language from United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 57, is that 'dominating power' over the cab operating companies 'was not obtained by normal expansion to meet the demands of a business growing as a result of superior and enterprising management, but by deliberate, calculated purchase for control.' If that theory is borne out in this case by the evidence, coupled with proof of an undue restraint of interstate trade, a plain violation of the Act has occurred." 332 U. S. at 227-28.

That view is in accord with previous decisions of the Court.[23]

The legality of the acquisition by United States Steel of a market outlet for its rolled steel through the purchase of the manufacturing facilities of Consolidated depends not merely upon the fact of that acquired control but also upon many other factors. Exclusive dealings for rolled steel between Consolidated and United States Steel, brought about by vertical integration or otherwise, are not illegal, at any rate until the effect of such control is to unreasonably restrict the opportunities of competitors to market their product.

In United States v. Paramount Pictures, — U. S. —, we were presented with a situation in which the government charged that vertical integration was illegal under the Sherman Act. We held that control by the major producer-distributors over nearly three-quarters of the first-run theaters in cities with population over 100,000 was not of itself illegal, and we remanded the case to the district court for further findings. In outlining the factors which we considered to be significant in determining the legality of vertical integration, we emphasized the importance of characterizing the nature of the market to be served, and the leverage on the market which the particular vertical integration creates or makes possible. A second test which we considered important in the Paramount case was the purpose or intent with which the combination was conceived. When a combination through its actual operation results in an unreasonable restraint, intent or purpose may be inferred; even though no unreasonable restraint may be inferred; even though no unreasonable restraint may be achieved, nevertheless a finding of specific intent to accomplish such an unreasonable restraint may render the actor liable under the Sherman Act. Compare United States v. Griffith, — U. S. —, —.[24]

It seems clear to us that vertical integration, as such without more, cannot be held violative of the Sherman Act. It is an in-

[23] Compare our statement in United States v. Paramount Pictures, — U. S. —, —, slip opinion, p. 36:

"Exploration of these phases of the cases would not be necessary if, as the Department of Justice argues, vertical integration of producing, distributing and exhibiting motion pictures is illegal per se. But the majority of the Court does not take that view. In the opinion of the majority the legality of vertical integration under the Sherman Act turns on (1) the purpose or intent with which it was conceived, or (2) the power it creates and the attendant purpose or intent. First, it runs afoul of the Sherman Act if it was a calculated scheme to gain control over an appreciable segment of the market and to restrain or suppress competition, rather than an expansion to meet legitimate business needs."

The legality of contractual arrangements for exclusive dealing was sustained in United States v. Bausch & Lomb Co., 321 U. S. 707, 728-29. Compare Federal Trade Comm'n v. Curtis Publishing Co., 260 U. S. 568.

[24] Slip opinion, pp. 6-7:

"Anyone who owns and operates the single theatre in a town, or who acquires the exclusive right to exhibit a film, has a monopoly in the popular sense. But he usually does not violate § 2 of the Sherman Act unless he has acquired or maintained his strategic position, or sought to expand his monopoly, or expanded it by means of those restraints of trade which are cognizable under § 1. For those things which are condemned by § 2 are in large measure merely the end products of conduct which violates § 1. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 61. But that is not always true. Section 1 covers contracts, combinations, or conspiracies in restraint of trade. Section 2 is not restricted to conspiracies or combinations to monopilize but also makes it a crime for any person to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize any part of interstate or foreign trade or commerce. So it is that monopoly power, whether lawfully or unlawfully acquired, may itself constitute an evil and stand condemned under § 2 even though it remains unexercised. For § 2 of the Act is aimed, inter alia, at the acquisition or retention of effective market control. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F. 2d 416, 428, 429. Hence the existence of power 'to exclude competition when it is desired to do so' is itself a violation of § 2, provided it is coupled with the purpose or intent to exercise that power. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781, 809, 811, 814."

definite term without explicit meaning. Even in the iron industry where could a line be drawn—at the end of mining the ore, the production of the pig-iron or steel ingots, when the rolling mill operation is completed, fabrication on order or at some stage of manufacture into standard merchandise? No answer would be possible and therefore the extent of permissible integration must be governed, as other factors in Sherman Act violations, by the other circumstances of individual cases. Technological advances may easily require a basic industry plant to expand its processes into semi-finished or finished goods so as to produce desired articles in greater volume and with less expense.

It is not for courts to determine the course of the Nation's economic development. Economists may recommend, the legislative and executive branches may chart legal courses by which the competitive forces of business can seek to reduce costs and increase production so that a higher standard of living may be available to all. The evils and dangers of monopoly and attempts to monopolize that grow out of size and efforts to eliminate others from markets, large or small, have caused Congress and the Executive to regulate commerce and trade in many respects. But no direction has appeared of a public policy that forbids, per se, an expansion of facilities of an existing company to meet the needs of new markets of a community, whether that community is nation-wide or country-wide. On the other hand, the courts have been given by Congress wide powers in monopoly regulation. The very broadness of terms such as restraint of trade, substantial competition and purpose to monopolize have placed upon courts the responsibility to apply the Sherman Act so as to avoid the evils at which Congress aimed. The basic industries, with few exceptions, do not approach in America a cartelized form. If businesses are to be forbidden from entering into different stages of production that order must come from Congress, not the courts.

Applying the standards laid down in the Paramount case, we conclude that the so-called vertical integration resulting from the acquisition of Consolidated does not unreasonably restrict the opportunities of the competitor producers of rolled steel to market their product. We accept as the relevant competitive market the total demand for rolled steel products in the eleven-state area; over the past ten years Consolidated has accounted for only 3% of that demand, and if expectations as to the development of the Western steel industry are realized, Consolidated's proportion may be expected to be lower than that figure in the future. Nor can we find a specific intent in the present case to accomplish an unreasonable restraint, for reasons which we discuss under heading III of this opinion.

[Acquisition of Competitors]

C. We turn now to a discussion of the significance, as to possible violation of the Sherman Act, of the fact that Consolidated has been a competitor of United States Steel in structural steel fabrication and in the manufacture of pipe. The same tests which measure the legality of vertical integration by acquisition are also applicable to the acquisition of competitors in identical or similar lines of merchandise. It is first necessary to delimit the market in which the concerns compete and then determine the extent to which the concerns are in competition in that market. If such acquisition results in or is aimed at unreasonable restraint, then the purchase is forbidden by the Sherman Act. In determining what constitutes unreasonable restraint, we do not think the dollar volume is in itself of compelling significance; we look rather to the percentage of business controlled, the strength of the remaining competition, whether the action springs from business requirements or purpose to monopolize, the probable development of the industry, consumer demands, and other characteristics of the market. We do not undertake to prescribe any set of percentage figures by which to measure the reasonableness of a corporation's enlargement of its activities by the purchase of the assets of a competitor.[26] The relative effect of percentage command of a market varies with the setting in which that factor is placed.

The United States makes the point that the acquisition of Consolidated would preclude and restrain substantial potential competition in the production and sale of other steel products than fabricated structural steel and pipe. Force is added to this contention by the fact, adverted to above at pages 3 and 15, that United States Steel does no plate fabrication while Consolidated does. By plate fabrication Consolidated produces many articles not now produced by United States Steel. We mention, as examples, boilers, gas tanks, smoke stacks, storage tanks and barges. Attention is also called to the war activities of Consolidated in steel shipbuilding as indicative of its potentialities as a competitor. We have noted, page 2, supra, that this construction was under government direction and financing. We agree that any acquisition of fabricating equipment eliminates some potential competition from anyone who might own or require such facilities. We agree, too, with the government's position that potential competition from producers of presently non-competitive articles as well as the possibility that acquired facilities may be used in the future for the production of new articles in competition with others may be taken into consideration in weighing the effect of any acquisition of assets on restraint of trade.[26]

The government's argument, however, takes us into highly speculative situations. Steel ship construction for war purposes was an enterprise undertaken at government expense. We know of nothing from the record that would lead Consolidated or United States Steel to branch out into the peacetime steel ship industry at their own risk. The necessary yards have been sold. It is true that United States Steel might go into plate fabrication. The record shows nothing as to production or demand in the Consolidated trade area for plate fabricated articles. Nothing appears as to the number of producers of such goods in that territory. What we have said in other places in this opinion as to the growing steel industry in this area is pertinent here. Eastern fabricators will find it difficult to meet competition from western fabricators in the western market. Cheaper western rolled steel and freight rates are a handicap to eastern fabricators. Looking at the situation here presented, we are unwilling to hold that possibilities of interference with future competition are serious enough to justify us in declaring that this contract will bring about unlawful restraint.

We conclude that in this case the government has failed to prove that the elimination of competition between Consolidated and the structural fabricating subsidiaries of United States Steel constitutes an unreasonable restraint. If we make the doubtful assumption that the United States Steel could be expected in the future to sell 13 per cent of the total of structural steel products in the Consolidated trade area and that Consolidated could be expected to sell 11 per cent, we conclude that where we have the present unusual conditions of the western steel industry and in view of the facts of this case as developed at pages 15 to 19, of this opinion, it can not be said there would be an unreasonable restraint of trade. To hold this does not imply that additional acquisitions of fabricating facilities for structural steel would not become monopolistic. Notwithstanding some differences as to the business of Consolidated and United States Steel in respect to the character of structural steel products fabricated by each, there is competition between the two for both light and heavy work. The western steel industry is developing. Fontana and Geneva as well as other producers are making available for fabricators larger supplies of rolled steel so that the West is becoming less dependent on eastern suppliers. We are of the opinion, moreover, in view of the number of West Coast fabricators (see page 6) and the ability of out-of-the-area fabricators to compete because of the specialized character of structural steel production in regard to orders and designs, that this acquisition is permissible.

We likewise conclude that the elimination of competition between Consolidated and National Tube (a United States Steel subsidiary) does not constitute an unreasonable restraint. Competition at the time of the contract was restricted to the sale of large diameter pipe for oil and gas pipelines, see pages 19 to 21, supra, and the only indication in the record that competition in pipe would exist in a broader field in the future is contained in the suggestion, without proof or specification that Consolidated, through technological advances or business expansion might produce a wider range of pipe sizes and types. This is not enough to persuade us that the purchase will unduly restrain trade in pipe. The record does show that in three instances Consolidated and National Tube each supplied pipe for a new pipeline. It is clear that these line pipe contracts were obtained by Consolidated in a seller's market. We are given nothing as to the national production of oil and gas trunkline pipe or the relation of the pipe sold by Consolidated and National Tube to this production. The government does not contest appellees' statement that Consolidated pipe for this purpose is substantially more expensive than seamless pipe, and in the absence of a showing that welded pipe has advantages over seamless pipe to compensate for the increased cost or that Consolidated's production costs may be expected to decline with an increase in volume, it does not seem to us that it has been shown that competition in this field between the parties to this contract is so substantial that its elimination under these circumstances constitutes an unreasonable restraint.

The government cites four antitrust cases involving railroads to support its argument that control by one competitor over another violates the Sherman Act, even though the percentage of business for which they compete may be small.[27] The appellees cite cases from this Court and lower courts in which acquisition by one competitor of another was held not to violate the antitrust laws.[28] We do not stop to examine those cases to determine whether we would now approve either their language or their holdings. The factual situation in all those cases is so dissimilar from that presented here that they furnish little guidance in determining whether the competition which will be eliminated through the purchase of Consolidated is sufficient to warrant injunctive relief requested by the government.[29]

III.

We turn last to the allegation of the government that United States Steel has attempted to monopolize the production and sale of fabricated steel products in the Consolidated market. We think that the trial court applied too narrow a test to this charge; even though the restraint effected may be reasonable under § 1, it may constitute an attempt to monopolize forbidden by § 2 if a specific intent to monopolize may be shown.[30] To show that specific intent the government recites the long history of acquisition of United States Steel and argues that the present acquisition when viewed in the light of that history demonstrates the existence of a specific intent to monopolize. Although this Court held in 1920[31] that United States Steel had not violated § 2 through the acquisition of 180 formerly independent concerns, we may look to those acquisitions as well as to the eight acquisitions from 1924 to 1943 to determine the intent of United States Steel in acquiring Consolidated.

We look not only to those acquisitions, however, but also to the latest acquisition—the government-owned plant at Geneva. We think that last acquisition is of significance in ascertaining the intent of United States Steel in acquiring Consolidated.[32] The bid of United States Steel for the Geneva plant emphasized the importance of erecting finishing facilities to assure a market for Geneva's production, and we think it a fact of weight that many of the other bids were conditioned upon the government lending money or making grants for erecting such facilities at no cost to the bidder. No objection was interposed when United States Steel indicated that it proposed to spend $25,000,000 to erect a cold reduction mill at Pittsburg, and it is doubtful whether objections could be raised if United States Steel proposed to build instead of to buy from a competitor fabricating facilities similar to those possessed by Consolidated. The reasons given by Consolidated and United States Steel for the purchase and sale of the assets here involved seem not to involve any action condemned by the Sherman Act. Granting that the sale will to some extent affect competition, the acquisition of a firm outlet to absorb a portion of Geneva's rolled steel production seems to reflect a normal business purpose rather than a scheme to circumvent the law. United States Steel, despite its large sales, many acquisitions and leading position in the industry, has declined in the proportion of rolled steel products it manufacturers in comparison with its early days. In 1901 it produced 50.1 per cent; in 1911, 45.7 per cent; in 1946, 30.4 per cent.[33] For the period 1937-1946, it produced 33.2 per cent.[34] Its size is impressive. Size has significance also in an appraisal of alleged violations of the Sherman Act. But the steel industry is also of impressive size and the welcome westward extension of that industry requires that the existing companies go into production there or abandon that market to other organizations.

We have dealt with the objections to this purchase because of the exclusion of other rolled steel producers from supplying Consolidated's demand for that product and because of the alleged restraint of trade involved in the extension of United States Steel's fabricating and pipe commerce. It has been necessary to treat these arguments separately so as to isolate the facts and figures which convince us that these objections do not rise to the level of proving a violation of law. It only need be added that we have also considered the various items of objection in the aggregate and in the light of the charge of intent to monopolize. But even from that point of view, the government has not persuaded us that the proposed contract violates our public policy as stated in the Sherman Act.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

Mr. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom Mr. JUSTICE BLACK, Mr. JUSTICE MURPHY, and Mr. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE, concur, dissenting.

This is the most important antitrust case which has been before the Court in years. It is important because it reveals the way of growth of monopoly power—the precise phenomenon at which the Sherman Act was aimed. Here we have the pattern of the evolution of the great trusts. Little independent units are gobbled up by bigger ones. At times the independent is driven to the wall and surrenders. At other times any number of "sound business reasons" appear why the sale to or merger with the trust should be made.[1] If the acquisition were the result of predatory practices or restraints of trade, the trust could be required to disgorge. Schine Chain Theatres Inc. v. United States, 333 U. S. —. But the impact on fu-

[33] The figures for 1901 and 1911 are taken from United States v. United States Steel Corp., 223 Fed. 55, 67.

[34] The record includes an unchallenged table showing the proportion of total national production of steel ingots and steel for casting attributable to United States Steel from 1901 through 1946. It is taken from the statistical reports of the American Iron and Steel Institute and United States Steel. It may be summarized by saying it shows an irregular reduction from over 60 per cent to less than 33⅓ per cent.

[1] The most frequent reasons given for mergers are that they prevent waste and promote efficiency, reduce overhead, dilute sales and advertising costs, spread risks, etc. Compare, New Mergers, New Motives, Business Week, Nov. 10, 1945, p. 68; Growth of Business Units: Effect of War and Shortages, United States News, May 10, 1946, p. 48. But that these advantages are largely illusory has long been recognized. See, e. g., Relative Efficiency of Large, Medium-sized, and Small Business (TNEC Monograph 13, 1941) pp. 111, 128, 132, 398. The theory was never more forcefully exploded than by Brandeis in The Curse of Bigness:

"The only argument that has been seriously advanced in favor of private monopoly is that competition involves waste, while the monopoly prevents waste and leads to efficiency. This argument is essentially unsound. The wastes of competition are negligible. The economies of monopoly are superficial and delusive. The efficiency of monopoly is at the best temporary.

"Undoubtedly competition involves waste. What human activity does not? The wastes of democracy are among the greatest obvious wastes, but we have compensations in democracy which far outweigh that waste and make it more efficient than absolutism. So it is with competition. The waste is relatively insignificant. There are wastes of competition which do not develop, but kill. These the law can and should eliminate, by regulating competition.

"It is true that the unit in business may be too small to be efficient. It is also true that the unit may be too large to be efficient, and this is no uncommon incident of monopoly." P. 105.

". . . no monopoly in private industry in America has yet been attained by efficiency alone. No business has been so superior to its competitors in the processes of manufacture or distribution as to enable it to control the market solely by reason of its superiority." P. 114-15.

"The Steel Trust, while apparently free from the coarser forms of suppressing competition, acquired control of the market not through greater efficiency, but by buying up existing plants and particularly ore supplies at fabulous prices, and by controlling strategic transportation systems." P. 115.

"But the efficiency of monopolies, even if established, would not justify their existence unless the community should reap benefit from the efficiency; experience teaches us that whenever trusts have efficiency, their fruits have been absorbed almost wholly by the trusts themselves. From such efficiency as they have developed the community has gained substantially nothing. For instance: . . . The Steel Trust, a corporation of reputed efficiency. The high prices maintained by it in the industry are matters of common knowledge. In less than ten years ture competition and on the economy is the same though the trust was built in more gentlemanly ways.

We have here the problem of bigness. Its lesson should by now have been burned into our memory by Brandeis. The Curse of Bigness shows how size can become a menace—both industrial and social. It can be an industrial menace because it creates gross inequalities against existing or putative competitors. It can be a social menace—because of its control of prices.[2] Control of prices in the steel industry is powerful leverage on our economy. For the price of steel determines the price of hundreds of other articles. Our price level determines in large measure whether we have prosperity or depression—an economy of abundance or scarcity. Size in steel should therefore be jealously watched.[3] In final analysis, size in steel is the measure of the power of a handful of men over our economy. That power can be utilized with lightning speed. It can benign or it can be dangerous. The philosophy of the Sherman Act is that it should not exist. For all power tends to develop into a government in itself. Power that controls the economy should be in the hands of elected representatives of the people, not in the hands of an industrial oligarchy. Industrial power should be decentralized. It should be scattered into many hands so that the fortunes of the people will not be dependent on the whim or caprice, the political prejudices, the emotional stability of a few self-appointed men. The fact that they are not vicious men but respectable and social minded is irrevelant. That is the philosophy and the command of the Sherman Act. It is founded on a theory of hostility to the concentration in private hands of power so great that only a government of the people should have it.

The Court forgot this lesson in United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U. S. 417, and in United States v. International Harvester Co., 274 U. S. 693. The Court today forgets it when it allows United States Steel to wrap its tentacles tighter around the steel industry of the West.

This acquisition can be dressed up (perhaps legitimately) in terms of an expansion to meet the demands of a business which is growing as a result of superior and enterprising management.[4] But the test under the Sherman Act strikes deeper. However the acquisition may be rationalized, the effect is plain. It is a purchase for control, a purchase for control of a market for which United States Steel has in the past had to compete but which it no longer wants left to the uncertainties that competition in the West may engender. This in effect it concedes. It states that its purpose in acquiring Consolidated is to insure itself of a market for part of Geneva's production of rolled steel products when demand falls off.

But competition is never more irrevocably eliminated than by buying the customer for whose business the industry has been competing. The business of Consolidated amounts to around $22,000,000 annually. The competition purchases by Consolidated are over $5,000,000 a year. I do not see how it is possible to say that $5,000,000 of commerce is immaterial. It plainly is not de minimis. And it is the character of the restraint which § 1 of the Act brands as illegal, not the amount of commerce affected. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38; United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 225, n. 59; United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U. S. 218, 225. At least it can be said here, as it was in International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 396, that the volume of business restrained by this contract is not insignificant or insubstantial. United States Steel does not consider it insignificant, for the aim of this well-conceived project is to monopolize it. If it is not insubstantial as a market for United States Steel, it certainly is not from the point of view of the struggling western units of the steel industry.

It is unrealistic to measure Consolidated's part of the market by determining its proportion of the national market. There is no safeguarding of competition in the theory that the bigger the national market the less protection will be given those selling to the it accumulated for its shareholders or paid out as dividends on stock representing merely water, over $650,000,000." Pp. 120-121.

[2] See Relative Efficiency of Large, Medium-sized, and Small Business (TNEC Monograph 13, 1941) p. 132.

[3] In 1911 when the original antitrust suit against United States Steel was instituted, the company had already absorbed 180 formerly independent concerns. See United States v. United States Steel Corp., 223 F. 55, 162. Since then it has absorbed at least 8 additional independent companies, including Columbia which prior to 1930 was operated by an independent producer and maintained the only integrated steel operation west of the Rockies.

[4] See note 1, supra.

smaller components thereof. That theory would allow a producer to absorb outlets upon which small enterprises with restricted marketing facilities depend. Those outlets, though statistically unimportant from the point of view of the national market, could be a matter of life and death to small, local enterprises.

The largest market which must be taken for comparison is the market actually reached by the company which is being absorbed. In this case Consolidated's purchases of rolled steel products are a little over 3 per cent of that market. By no standard—United States Steel's or its western competitors—can that percentage be deemed immaterial. Yet consideration of the case from that viewpoint puts the public interest phase of the acquisition in the least favorable light. A surer test of the impact of the acquisition on competition is to be determined not only by consideration of the actual markets reached by Consolidated but also by the actual purchases which it makes. Its purchases were predominantly of plates and shapes—76 per cent from 1937-1041. This was in 1937 13 per cent of the total in the Consolidated market. That comparison is rejected by the Court or at least discounted on the theory that competitors presently selling to Consolidated can probably convert from plates and shapes to other forms of rolled steel products. But a surer test of the effect on competition is the actual business of which competitors will be deprived. We do not know whether they can be sufficiently resourceful to recover from this strengthening of the hold which this giant of the industry now has on their markets. It would be more in keeping with the spirit of the Sherman Act to give the benefits of any doubts to the struggling competitors.

It is, of course, immaterial that a purpose or intent to achieve the result may not have been present. The holding of the cases from United States v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525, 543, to United States v. Griffith, 333 U. S. —, is that the requisite purpose or intent is present if monopoly or restraint of trade results as a direct and necessary consequence of what was done. We need not hold that vertical integration is per se unlawful in order to strike down what is accomplished here. The consequence of the deliberate, calculated purchase for purpose of control over this substantial share of the market can no more be avoided here than it was in United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 57, and in United States v. Yellow Cab Co., supra. I do not stop to consider the effect of the acquisition on competition in the sale of fabricated steel products. The monopoly of this substantial market for rolled steel products is in itself an unreasonable restraint of trade under § 1 of the Act.

The result might well be different if Consolidated were merging with or being acquired by an independent west coast producer for the purpose of developing an integrated operation. The purchase might then be part of an intensely practical plan to put together an independent western unit of the industry with sufficient resources and strength to compete with the giants of the industry. Approval of this acquisition works in precisely the opposite direction. It makes dim the prospects that the western steel industry will be free from the control of the eastern giants. United States Steel, now that it owns the Geneva plant, has over 51 per cent of the rolled steel or ingot capacity of the Pacific Coast area. This acquisition gives it unquestioned domination there and protects it against growth of the independents in that developing region. That alone is sufficient to condemn the purchase. Its serious impact on competition and the economy is emphasized when it is recalled that United States Steel has one-third of the rolled steel production of the entire country.[5] The least I can say is that a company that has that tremendous leverage on our economy is big enough.[6]

[6] "United States Steel is the giant of the industry. Its manufacturing capacity is 'greater than that of all German producers combined. It is more than twice that of the entire British steel industry and more than twice that of all the French mills combined.' In addition to its facilities for producing pig iron, steel ingots, and all forms of finished and semifinished steel products, the corporation owned and operated through some 150 subsidiaries, in 1937, nearly 2,000 oil and natural gas wells, 89 iron ore mines, 79 coal mines, some 40 limestone, dolomite, cement rock, and clay quarries, a number of gypsum and fluorspar mines, 2 zinc mines, a manganese ore mine in Brazil, over 5,000 coking ovens, several water-supply systems with reservoirs, filtration plants, and pumping stations, over 100 ocean, lake and river steamers, 500 barges and tugs, railroads, fire brick plants, and mills producing 12,000,000 barrels of cement. By virtue of its tremendous size and its high degree of integration, the corporation is in a position to dominate the field." In the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Central Division. No. 6159-Y Civil. Filed June 7, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Exclusive Dealing Contracts—Service Stations—Contracts in Restraint of Trade.—Agreements between a corporation engaged in the business of producing, transporting, refining and marketing petroleum and petroleum products in eight Western states and operators of independent service stations in those states, which agreements confine the operators to the purchase, use and re-sale of the products of the petroleum corporation, and of automotive accessories handled or sponsored by it constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade, in violation of the Sherman Act, and result in a substantial lessening of competition and tend to create a monopoly, in violation of the Clayton Act. The agreements are found to lock out dealers from sources of competitive products originating in interstate commerce, to deny to dealers access to such competitive products, to deny to manufacturers or suppliers of such products access to the outlets controlled by the independent contractors who operate the stations, and to affect a substantial number of outlets and a substantial amount of products. Such agreements are held to be illegal in their effect and are ordered enjoined.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.521, and the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2023.36.

For plaintiff: William C. Dixon, W. Alan Thody, Special Assistants to the Attorney General; Lawrence W. Somerville, Theodore Driscoll, Special Attorneys, Antitrust Division; Tom C. Clark, Attorney General; James M. Carter, United States Attorney.

[Nature of Action]

YANKWICH, D. J.: By this suit in equity, the Government seeks a decree adjudging that certain practices engaged in by the defendants and certain contracts entered into by them, unreasonably restrain interstate trade and commerce in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act,[1] and substantially lessen competition and tend to create a monopoly in a line of commerce, in violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act.[2] The Government asks us to declare the exclusive supply provisions in the contracts and the practices flowing from them to be void and of no effect.

In addition, we are asked to enjoin the defendants, in perpetuity, from entering into or enforcing any contract, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, with any independent service station operator or garage operator, or from inducing or compelling, or attempting to induce or compel, any such person from entering into any contract, agreement or understanding, which has any of the following requirements:

(a) That the Independent Service Station Operator or Garage Operator shall secure all his requirements of petroleum products from defendant Standard, or shall not handle the petroleum products of any other company;

(b) That the Independent Service Station Operator, or Garage Operator shall secure all his requirements of any one or more types of automobile accessories from or through defendants Standard and Standard Stations, Inc., or will not handle accessories competitive with those distributed or sponsored by defendants, Standard and Standard Stations, Inc.

(c) That the sale of any petroleum product or automotive accessories to any Independent Service Station Operator, or Garage Operator shall be conditional on the sale of other petroleum products or automotive accessories.

The action was instituted on January 2, 1947. Many proceedings have taken place before the trial and an extensive file has been built up. However, as a case of this character must be determined on the basis of facts existing at the time of the trial, it is not necessary to give a detailed analysis of the pleadings in the case or the proceedings before the court.

The Proved Facts

Notwithstanding the lengthy trial and the large number of exhibits introduced, the issues in the case are rather narrow, as will appear further on in the opinion when we expound the legal principles which control the case.

There is, therefore, no need to review elaborately the facts proved. A brief summary will suffice.

The defendant Standard Oil Company of California is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business at San Francisco, California. It is engaged in the business of producing, transporting, refining and marketing petroleum and petroleum products, principally in the states of California, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Idaho and Utah.

The defendant Standard Stations, Incorporated, is a corporation organized under the laws of Delaware with its principle place of business at San Francisco. It is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Standard Oil Company of California, and is engaged in the business of managing service stations in the seven states just mentioned. The number of these stations is 1063.

As the issues have narrowed themselves by the proof, no further reference need be made to these stations so operated which have been referred to in the evidence as "employe operated stations." The Government does not question (indeed, it could not) the right of the Standard Oil Company of California to operate its own stations and sell therein any product it manufactures or distributes. Hence when we refer to "Standard" in what follows, it will be understood that the reference is to Standard Oil Company of California, the parent company, actually engaged in what, for brevity, we shall call "the oil business."

The evidence in the cases shows that, as of March 12, 1947, Standard, in addition to the company operated service stations, had contractual arrangements with 7145 stations in the area. The relationship of Standard to these stations was governed by the five types of agreements entered into with the operators of the stations. They were:

(1) "Dealer Agreements," of which there were 1656, containing the following clause:

> "1. Standard Oil Company of California, a corporation hereinafter called 'Company' agrees to sell to ...... hereinafter called 'Dealer,' and Dealer agrees to buy from Company, all of Dealer's requirements of petroleum products used or sold or bought to be used or sold by Dealer at .... The petroleum products to meet Dealer's requirements hereunder shall be those brands of gasoline, lubricating oils, and other petroleum products sold by Company to its dealers generally in Dealer's vicinity."

(2) "Distributor Agreements," of which there were 556, containing the following:

> "Company agrees to sell to Distributor, and Distributor agrees to buy from Company and stock and offer for sale all of Distributor's requirements of petroleum products used or sold or bought to be used or sold by Distributor in the conduct of his business on the premises hereinafter described. The petroleum products to meet Distributor's requirements hereunder shall be those brands of gasoline, lubricating oils and other petroleum products currently sold at service stations operated by Standard Stations, Inc. in Distributor's vicinity, and Distributor agrees not to store, handle, distribute, or sell any other brand or brands of petroleum products at or from the station."

(3) "Petroleum Products and Equipment Agreements," of which there were 912, containing this clause:

> "1. Standard Oil Company of California, a corporation, hereinafter called 'Company,' agrees to sell to ..... hereinafter caller 'Dealer,' and Dealer agrees to buy from Company, all of Dealer's requirements of petroleum products used or sold or bought to be used or sold by Dealer at ..... The petroleum products to meet Dealer's requirements hereunder shall be those brands of gasoline, lubricating oils, and other petroleum products sold by Company to its dealers generally in Dealer's vicinity."

(4) "Dealer Agreement TBA," of which there were 2221, having this clause:

> "1. Standard Oil Company of California, hereinafter called 'Company,' agrees to sell to ...... hereinafter called 'Dealer,' and Dealer agrees to buy from Company, all Dealer's requirements of petroleum products used, sold, or bought to be used or sold, by Dealer at ......, hereinafter called 'said premises.' The petroleum products to meet Dealer's requirements hereunder shall be those brands of such products generally sold by Company to its Dealers."

(5) "Sublease Agreements," of which there were 1800, containing the following clause:

"Lessee shall handle and sell on the leased premises only such petroleum products as are sold Lessee by Lessor, and Lessee agrees not to store, handle, sell, or distribute on or from said premises any petroleum products of any description other than those petroleum products sold to Lessee by Lessor. The price payable by Lessee to Lessor for said petroleum products shall be Lessor's posted price for the same or similar products to its Dealers generally in Lessee's vicinity at time and place of delivery."

The choice of the type of agreement was the dealer's. And the agreements were terminable by him on six months' notice. Each of these agreements contained provisions which, both by the language used and the limitations of liability, stressed the character of the agreement as seeking to establish the dealer as an independent contractor. Dealer Agreements (Class I) contained the most elaborate provisions. They are here given in full:

"6. Dealer acknowledges that he has thoroughly inspected the pumps, tankage, containers, pipers, and other facilities on the premises and that the same are in good condition, and while this agreement is in force Dealer agrees to so keep the same at Dealer's own cost and expense; provided, however, that Company may, at its discretion, maintain and repair said facilities. Dealer further agrees to protect, defend, and hold harmless the Company against all claims for damage to property (including Dealer's property), or injury to or death of persons, directly or indirectly resulting from any acts or omissions of Dealer or Dealer's employees in or about said premises, either in the maintenance or operation of the tanks, containers, pipes, pumps and other facilities thereon, or in the vending therefrom of the products and goods handled by Dealer hereunder.

"7. In the performance of this agreement Dealer is engaged in an independent business and nothing contained shall be construed as reserving to Company any right to control Dealer with respect to his conduct in the performance of this agreement. Company reserves no right to exercise any control over any of Dealer's employees and all employees of the Dealer shall be entirely under the control and direction of Dealer who shall be responsible for their actions and omissions. Dealer will, at his own expense, during the term hereof, maintain full insurance under any Workmen's Compensation Laws effective in said state covering all persons employed by and working for him in connection with the performance of this agreement, and upon request shall furnish Company with satisfactory evidence of the maintenance of such insurance. Dealer accepts exclusive liability for all contributions and payroll taxes required under Federal Social Security Laws and State Unemployment Compensation Laws as to all persons employed by and working for him in connection with the performance of this agreement.

"8. Any tax, or the amount thereof, now or hereafter imposed, levied, or assessed by any governmental authority upon, measured by, incident to, or as the result of the transaction herein provided for, or the transportation, production, or manufacture of the goods, the subject matter of this agreement, shall, if collectible or payable by the Company, be paid by the Dealer on demand by the Company, as tax collectible or as an increase in the prices otherwise herein provided for."

The other types of agreement aimed to achieve the same result.

The history of the use of the various types of agreement shows that, in 1938, the dealer agreements begun to supersede the authorized distributor agreements which had obtained before that date, and that, beginning with the year 1944, Type 4 (TBA) came into almost exclusive use. There is duplication of agreements in that a single station may operate under several types of agreement. Hence the actual number of gas station outlets is 5197. The number of stations operating under Form 2 has since been reduced to 232. In addition to this, Standard had 742 open accounts and 1063 company-operated stations, or, as they have been called in this case, employe-operated stations.

The evidence in the record shows beyond cavil that the effect of these agreements was to limit the dealer operating under any of them to the handling of petroleum products of Standard and also to the marketing of tires, tubes, batteries and accessories controlled or handled by Standard. If they handled others, they did not do so openly. The agreements were so interpreted by those operating them, as various operators from various states testified. Indeed, witnesses of the defendant very forthrightly stated that the operators were expected to confine themselves to Standard products and accessories, the exception being only those rare cases—especially during the War —when they were unable to supply the quantity asked, in which event, the supervising employes of Standard would "shut their eyes" to the infractions.

The record also shows that, as to tires, tubes, batteries and accessories, Standard reserved the right to determine the amounts it would furnish. As to the other accessories,—which included spark plugs, sun visors, fan belts, hub caps, and all small parts of automobiles, which can easily be replaced at a service station—the requirement was up to the dealer himself. Tires, tubes and batteries were not, as a rule, sold to operators of stations other than those under contract with Standard,—especially during the time of shortage. Its petroleum products and accessories were sold to other station operators, particularly after the war scarcity ended. The representatives of other companies manufacturing petroleum products, tires, tubes, batteries and other accessories, testified that they could not sell their products to stations under contract with Standard, except in rare instances, and that, surreptitiously. When a station was converted into a Standard station, whatever custom in non-Standard products they had before ceased. To maintain the goodwill of the operators of the stations, Standard assisted them financially, made loans which were later discounted, furnished many valuable services, and expended large sums of money in advertising, in educating the operators in the manner of handling the products, in building the stations, adding facilities to them, repairing and improving them,—all of which meant large expenditures of money. As a result, Standard has a sixteen and one-half million dollar capital investment in the dealer stations.

When salesmen or supervisors of Standard found competitive products, they "urged," —as they testified—or, as the operators testified, showed their displeasure, and, practically "ordered" their discontinuance or substitution. Many of the competitive products so offered for sale and shut out of the stations under contract with Standard were produced outside of the States in which the stations were located, or were shipped in interstate commerce.

So there cannot be any question that, at least so far as these products are concerned, the practice of which the Government complains, affected the flow of goods and products in interstate commerce.[3] The character of the result and its legality, as well as the legality of the restrictive clauses themselves are questions of law.

To them we now direct our attention.

II

The Law Today

(A) Exclusive Supply Provisions: The case does not require an extended review of the principles which courts have evolved in interpreting the Sherman Anti-Trust and Clayton Acts. I have had occasion to discuss the scope and nature of anti-trust legislation and its application both to activities which are local and to those which transcend state limits, in several opinions.[3]

There is another reason for confining ourselves to the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court: They have modified, to a great extent, some of the legal norms declared in prior cases.[4] And the problem in this case can be narrowed down to two rather simple inquiries. They are: (a) Are agreements of the type involved in this case, as summarized briefly in the preceding portion of the opinion violative of either or both the statutes. Which, in reality, comes down to this: Is an agreement by an oil company, engaged in the production and distribution of petroleum products, and the sponsoring and distribution of automobile parts and accessories, which obligates a gasoline station operator to supply his full requirements of petroleum products, tires, tubes, batteries, and other accessories, from the company, of itself, a violation of either of the Acts? If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the inquiry is at an end. (b) If in the negative, we must determine whether the effect of the agreement as a restraint on commerce makes it invalid under either or both Acts.

Seeking an answer to these inquiries, I begin with the assumption that the General

Supp. 57.

Motors exclusive supply case [5] is still the law. Which means that, at least under the Clayton Act, an agreement by a dealer, in consideration of being permitted to deal in a certain product, that he will not sell or offer to sell any products not manufactured or handled by the particular manufacturer, is not per se illegal. The opinion in the General Motors case states the question involved tersely. The Court had before it an agreement which, not only indirectly forbade the handling of the products of other manufacturers, but prohibited specifically their use or sale in these words:

> "'Dealer agrees that he will not sell, offer for sale, or use in the repair of Chevrolet motor vehicles and chassis second-hand parts or used parts or any parts not manufactured by the Chevrolet Motor Company. . . .'" [6]

This eliminated not only parts not manufactured by them, but also second-hand and used parts. A complete monopoly was achieved. At the same time, the dealer was not granted exclusive selling rights in new parts and accessories. General Motors was, therefore, free to grant to other dealers in the same territory the same rights. The trial court dismissed the bill for want of equity. Affirming the decree, the Supreme Court said:

> "Upon the evidence adduced at the trial the District Court found that the effect of the clause had not been in any way substantially to lessen competition or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." [7]

I take this language to mean that, even when we are confronted with a contract which shuts out competition, we must, under the Clayton Act, determine its effect on the line of commerce.

Under the Sherman Act, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the restraint is, —since the first Standard Oil decision in 1911, —an element to be considered.[8] Both are questions of fact, the solution of which rests upon the conditions obtaining in each particular case.

The Socony-Vacuum case [9] and other cases which followed it expressed the view that the economic wisdom or unwisdom, or the economic benefit or detriment, of a restriction on commerce is not material, especially when we are dealing with a practice, such as price-fixing, which is illegal per se. But, at the same time, economic effect becomes material if we are dealing with a restraint other than price-fixing, a restraint which is monopolistic. Because, when this is the situation, it must appear that there is substantial lessening of competition or monopoly under the Clayton Act, before we can place a judicial interdict on it. We find this language in the Socony-Vacuum case:

> "Secondly, the fact that sales on the spot markets were still governed by some competition is of no consequence. For it is indisputable that that competition was restricted through the removal by respondents of a part of the supply which but for the buying program would have been a factor in determining the going prices on those markets. But the vice of the conspiracy was not merely the restriction of supply of gasoline by removal of a surplus. As we have said, this was a well-organized program. The timing and strategic placement of the buying orders for distress gasoline played an important and significant role. Buying orders were carefully placed so as to remove the distress gasoline from weak hands. Purchases were timed. Sellers were assigned to the buyers so that regular outlets for distress gasoline would be available. The whole scheme was carefully planned and executed to the end that the distress gasoline would not overhand the markets and depress them at any time. And as a result of the payment of fair going market prices a floor was placed and kept under the spot markets. Prices rose and jobbers and consumers in the midwestern area paid more for their gasoline than they would have paid but for the conspiracy.
> "Competition was not eliminated from the markets; but it was clearly curtailed, since restriction of the supply of gasoline, the timing and placement of the purchases under the buying programs and the placing of a floor under the spot markets obviously reduced the play of the forces of supply and demand.
> "The elimination of so-called competitive evils is of no legal justification for such buying programs. The elimination of such conditions was sought primarily for its effect on the price structures. Fairer competitive prices, it is claimed resulted when distress gasoline was removed from the market. But such defense is typical of the protestations usually made in price-fixing cases. Ruinous competition, financial disaster, evils of price-cutting and the like, appear throughout our history as ostensible justifications for price-fixing. If the so-called competitive abuses were to be appraised here, the reasonableness of prices would necessarily become an issue in every price-fixing case. In that event, the Sherman Act would soon be emasculated; its philosophy would be supplanted by one which is wholly alien to a system of free competition; it would not be the charter of freedom which its framers intended." [10]

(B) Effect of Restriction: What Mr. Justice Douglas says applies with greater force to a restrictive practice other than price-fixing. The fact that it may be beneficial is not material, if, in effect, it is an unreasonable restraint.[11]

Judge Learned Hand stressed these very points in the Fashion Originators' Guild case,[12] He applied the reasoning of the Socony-Vacuum case to a case not involving price-fixing. And, with that clarity of language so characteristic of his writing, he showed that economic benefits cannot be taken into consideration if, in fact, there be substantial restriction of commerce. The opinion says:

> ". . . Many trade combinations which affect competition are lawful, when they are designed to prevent trade 'abuses'; they are 'reasonable' though perhaps to say so is no more than to state the problem. Appalachian Coals, Inc. v. United States, 288 U. S. 344, 374, 53 S. Ct. 411, 77 L. Ed. 825; Sugar Institute v. United States, 297 U. S. 553, 598, 56 S. Ct. 629, 80 L. Ed. 859. Certainly it is not true that the lawfulness of every combination depends upon whether it 'reasonably' corrects trade 'abuses'; there are some combinations that nothing will excuse. The accepted rubric for this is that when the means are unlawful per se, the purpose of the confederates will not justify them. Sugar Institute v. United States, supra, 297 U. S. 553, page 599, 56 S. Ct. 629, 80 L. Ed. 859. The most recent example of this is the Supreme Court's reaffirmation of the unconditional illegality of price-fixing in spite of the probability that the combination in fact benefited the industry. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 210 U. S. 150, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129. However grave the industrial disorders, that remedy was not permissible; the industry may restore itself by many devices, but not by all. * * * Price-fixing is not, however, the only means unlawful *per se. The interest of the consumer is not all that determines the 'reasonableness' of a contract 'in restraint of trade'. It is also unlawful to exclude from the market any of those who supply it —assuming that there is no independent reason by virtue of their conduct to justify their exclusion—and it is no excuse for doing so that their exclusion will result in benefits to consumers, or to the producers who remain. There is another reason supporting this conclusion. A successful combination among a part of the producers to exclude others, even when not accompanied by an agreement fixing prices, puts into their hands collectively the power to control the supply and with it the price. The fact that the power is not at the moment exercised is of no assurance that it may not be; if the effort succeeds and the combination is not disrupted, it may at any time be used, and there will then be no protection to the consumer.

reproductions of a given design is to attempt to create a monopoly, as at once appears from the fact that a copyright for it—and a fortiori a design patent upon it—would be ranked as a monopoly. It is true that the sanction of that monopoly may be very weak; it depends upon the design's attractions above other designs, often not a very important margin of advantage. But the same is true of nearly all monopolies, for there are substitutes for most goods. As to each design therefore the Guild is seeking to establish a monopoly; and it is unimportant whether its gross sales are large or small, as compared with those of all women's dresses. For these reasons, the combination was unlawful per se; the commission was right in refusing to hear any evidence in its excuse, for it could have no excuse; the case is the same as Millinery Creators' Guild v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, 2 Cir., 109 F(2) 175." [13]

The teaching of these cases is this: When we are dealing with price fixing, we are dealing with a contract which is invalid per se and violative of the Act. However, when we consider any other restrictions, their legality must be determined by the nature of the contract in relation to the line of commerce which it may affect. A contract by a manufacturer of a product which binds an agent who is used as an outlet to the exclusive use of his product is not necessarily a violation of either the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act. But it may be so under the Sherman Act, if it result in an unreasonable restraint of trade, and under the Clayton Act, if it result in a monopoly in a line of commerce or lessens competition substantially.[14]

The more recent decisions of the Supreme Court reaffirm these principles.[15] To quote from Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Company: [16]

"The statute requires no more than that the effect of the prohibited price discriminations 'may be substantially to lessen competition . . . or to injure, destroy or prevent competition.' After a careful consideration of this provision of the Robinson-Patman Act, we have said that 'the statute does not require that the discrimination must in fact have harmed competition, but only that there is a reasonable possibility that they "may" have such an effect.' Corn Products Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 324 U. S. 726, 742. Hence the Commission found what would appear to be obvious, that the competitive opportunities of certain merchants were injured when they had to pay respondent substantially more for their goods than their competitors had to pay. The findings are adequate.

"Fourth. It is urged that the evidence is inadequate to support the Commission's findings of injury to competition. As we have pointed out, however, the Commission is authorized by the Act to bar discriminatory prices upon the 'reasonable possibility' that different prices for like goods to competing purchasers may have the defined effect on competition. That respondent's quantity discounts did result in price differentials between competing purchasers sufficient to influence their resale price of salt was shown by evidence."

The following quotation from the American Crystal Sugar case is also enlightening:

"The statute does not confine its protection to consumers, or to purchasers, or to competitors, or to sellers. Nor does it immunize the outlawed acts because they are done by any of these. Cf. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150; American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U. S. 781. (C) The Meaning of "Unreasonable" and "Substantial": What precedes calls for a further inquiry into what is or what is not unreasonable restraint and what is or what is not a substantial lessening of competition.

The words "reasonable" or "unreasonable" do not occur in the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.[17] They were read into the Act by the decisions of the Supreme Court.[18]

The phrases which forbid practices which result in substantial lessening of competition or monopoly occur in the Clayton Act.[19]

All these terms have a pragmatic content. The Courts, in applying them, have sought to evolve concrete criteria by which the effect of a particular practice on competition should be gauged. Their scope and limit was stated by the Court in Fashion Originators' Guild of America v. Federal Trade Commission:

"If the purpose and practice of the combination of garment manufacturers and their affiliates runs counter to the public policy declared in the Sherman and Clayton Acts, the Federal Trade Commission has the power to suppress it as an unfair method of competition. From its findings, the Commission concluded that the petitioners, 'pursuant to understandings, arrangements, agreements, combinations and conspiracies entered into jointly and severally' had prevented sales in interstate commerce, had 'substantially lessened, hindered and suppressed' competition, and had tended 'to create in themselves a monopoly.' And paragraph 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 14) declares 'It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, . . . to . . . make a sale or contract for sale of goods, . . . on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the . . . purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, . . . of a competitor or competitors of the . . . seller, where the effect of such . . . sale, or contract for sale . . . may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.' The relevance of this section of the Clayton Act to petitioners' scheme is shown by the fact that the scheme is bottomed upon a system of sale under which (1) textiles shall be sold to garment manufacturers only upon the condition and understanding that the buyers will not use or deal in textiles which are copied from the designs of textile manufacturing Guild members; (2) garment manufacturers shall sell to retailers only upon the condition and understanding that the retailers shall not use or deal in such copied designs. And the Federal Trade Commission concluded in the language of the Clayton Act that these understandings substantially lessened competition and tended to create a monopoly. We hold that the Commission, upon adequate and unchallenged findings, correctly concluded that this practice constituted an unfair method of competition.

"Not only does the plan in the respects above discussed thus conflict with the principles of the Clayton Act; the findings of the Commission bring petitioners' combination in its entirety well within the inhibition of the policies declared by the Sherman Act itself. Section 1 of that Act make illegal every contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states; Sec. 2 makes illegal every combination or conspiracy which monopolizes or attempts to monopolize any part of that trade or commerce. Under the Sherman Act 'competition not combination should be the law of trade.' National Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas, 197 U. S. 115, 129. And among the many respects in which the Guild's plan runs contrary to the policy of the Sherman Act are these: it narrows the outlets to which garment and textile manufacturers can sell and the sources from which retailers can buy. (Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 45; Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20, 48-49); subjects all retailers and manufacturers who decline to comply with the Guild's program to an organized boycott (Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Assn. v. United States, 234 U. S.

600, 609-611); takes away the freedom of action of members by requiring each to reveal to the Guild the intimate details of their individual affairs (United States v. American Linseed Oil Co., 262 U. S. 371, 389); and has both as its necessary tendency and as its purpose and effect the direct suppression of competition from the sale of unregistered textiles and copied designs (United States v. American Linseed Oil Co., supra, at 389). In addition to all this, the combination is in reality an extra-governmental agency, which prescribed rules for the regulation and restraint of interstate commerce, and provides extra-judicial tribunals for determination and punishment of violations, and thus 'trenches upon the power of the national legislature and violates the statute.' (Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 242.)

"Nor is it determinative in considering the policy of the Sherman Act that petitioners may not yet have achieved a complete monopoly. For 'it is sufficient if it really tends to that end and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from free competition.' (United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1, 16; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 237." [20]

The approach to the problem has changed, as later cases indicate.[21] But the test of reasonableness is the same which the court laid down in the first case.[22] As there stated, while the Act defines the boundaries which could not be transgressed, it leaves the application of the standard laid down

"to be determined by the light of reason guided by the principles of law and the duty to apply and enforce the public policy embodied in the statute, in every given case whether any particular act or contract was within the contemplation of the statute." [23]

And the test under the Clayton Act is equally practical. The validity or invalidity of a contract or practice is determined by a consideration of the methods of restraint which the particular contract or practice impose and effect which they may have.[24] The more recent cases interpret the language of the statute to include not only probable effects but also possible effects.[25]

In summary, when we are asked to determine unreasonableness of restraint under the Sherman Act, or substantiality in lessening competition or tendency to create a monopoly in a line of commerce under the Clayton Act, we must envisage the entire situation affected by the practices, and relate it to the object of both statutes, which is to maintain freedom in interstate commerce and trade and to prevent all attempts to monopolize them.[26] At times, courts speak of the "detriment" to the public resulting from a practice.[27] But they do not intend to legalize restraints which may be beneficial to the public. As said by Judge Learned Hand:

"Be that as it may, that was not the way that Congress chose; it did not condone 'good trusts' and condemn 'bad ones'; it forbade all. Moreover, in so doing it was not necessarily actuated by economic motives alone. It is possible, because of its indirect social or moral effect, to prefer a system of small producers, each dependent for his success upon his own skill and character, to one in which the great mass of those engaged must accept the direction of a few. These considerations which we have suggested only as possible purposes of the Act, we think the decisions prove to have been in fact its purposes. It is settled, at least as to Sec. 1, that there are some contracts restricting competition which are unlawful, no matter how beneficent they may be; no industrial urgency will justify them; they are absolutely forbidden. Chief Justice Taft said as much of contracts dividing a territory among producers, in the often quoted passage of his opinion in the Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 6 Cir., 85 Fed. 271, 46 L. R. A. 122.[28]

The harm to the public is gauged by the effect of the practices on the free flow of goods in interstate commerce of the practices on the free flow of goods in interstate commerce and the maintenance of competition in that field. Consequently, practices which are likely to curtail or affect injuriously a measurable or sizeable part of commerce are prohibited under both Acts. As I understand the pleadings, and the Government's position at the beginning of the trial, a judgment is sought decreeing that the clause in the contracts which, by its language and actual effect, as shown by the evidence, restricts the stations not employe-operated to the sale and use of petroleum products and accessories produced or supplied by standard is illegal per se. We cannot agree. To the contrary, as we read the cases, exclusiveness of outlet is not, in itself, illegal. It becomes illegal only if it results in a substantial lessening of competition or the creation of monopoly in the line of commerce.[29] Indeed, the opinion of the Court in one of the latest cases on the subject indicates clearly that, to use the language of Mr. Justice Douglas,—

"the use of monopoly power, however lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful." [30]

The phrase "line of commerce" in the Clayton Act is to be given a broad and not a narrow meaning. It should be interpreted, not with relation to a particular outlet, but with relation to the entire "picture," —if one may be permitted to use the best colloquial equivalent to the German word gestalt (configuration). So the determination of monopoly in any "line of commerce" cannot be made to rest solely on the fact that certain outlets are closed. For, without indulging in a reductio ad absurdum, if we say that interfering with any outlet is, in itself, a monopoly, we find ourselves in the position of contending that, assuming one controlled one station outlet, we have a monopoly as to it. To amplify: It is common knowledge that national merchandising firms like Sears, Roebuck & Company, or Montgomery Ward, own establishments the country over. It is also well known that they control the type of goods which are sold in the branches, which they use as outlets, and which they own. But, assume that they did not own the branches, and that they operated some of them, under one of these various contract arrangements used here,—say a TBA contract. To my mind, it would be unrealistic to contend that, under such circumstances, the control of one or several such outlets would constitute a monopoly. For this reason, I take the words "in any line of commerce" to mean a complete line of activity, not a small segment. This interpretation finds support in the following language of the Supreme Court:

"The exercise of Congressional power under the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, or the National Motor Theft Act, has never been thought to be constitutionally restricted because in any particular case the volume of the commerce affected may be small. The amount of the commerce regulated is of special significance only to the extent that Congress may be taken to have excluded commerce of small volume from the operation of its regulatory measure by express provision or fair implication." [31]

We must, therefore, ascertain the actual effect of the challenged clause on interstate commerce.

(D) Intrastate and Interstate Activities: Before doing so, we refer to the contention that the activities of Standard are local in character. Recent cases have obliterated the rigid distinction between intrastate and interstate activities. Activities purely local which interfere with interstate commerce come under the interdiction of the anti-trust statutes.[32] The control of a commodity originating in interstate commerce, although exercised after it comes to rest in a state, does not take it out of the purview of the Sherman or Clayton Acts, if the flow is continuous, and if the restrictions affect it.[33] The latest decisions give effect to the broad definition of commerce contained in one of the older and leading cases on the subject:

> "The evidence shows that they and other defendants conspired to burden the free movement of live poultry into the metropolitan area. It may be assumed that some time after delivery of carload lots by interstate carriers to the receivers the movement of the poultry ceases to be interstate commerce. Public Utilities Comm'n v. Landon, 249 U. S. 237, 245; Missouri v. Kansas Gas Co., 265 U. S. 298, 309; East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Comm'n, 283 U. S. 465, 470-471. But we need not decide when interstate commerce ends and that which is intrastate begins. The control of the handling, the sales and the prices at the place of origin before the interstate journey begins or in the State of destination where the interstate movement ends may operate directly to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce." [34]

Without detailing the distributive system used by Standard, it is evident that there is constant interstate flow of the products it produces and distributes. And the interstate origin of the many competitive products, automobile supplies and accessories is also established.[35]

This satisfies fully the requirement of the statutes. For, if the exclusive supply agreements complained of by the Government be unreasonable or monopolistic in effect, they would affect the flow of commerce in several ways: (1) by channeling the products of Standard, regardless of interstate or intrastate source, through an exclusive group of outlets; (2) by denying to dealers the right to buy them; and (3) by denying to manufacturers of competitive products the right to sell to the controlled outlets.

Whether they actually have such effect is our final inquiry.

III

The Consequences of the Exclusive Supply Provisions

(A) The "Appreciable Segment" Test: In the Associated Press case[36], the Supreme Court has set out criteria for determining the forbidden character of restrictive outlets under the Sherman Act, which are pertinent to the facts in this case:

> "The restraint on trade in news here were no less than those held to fall within the ban of the Sherman Act with reference to combinations to restraint trade outlets in the sale of tiles, Montague & Co. v. Lowery, 1932 U. S. 38; or enameled ironware, Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co. v. United States, 226 U. S. 20, 48-49; or lumber, Eastern States Lumber Dealers' Ass'n v. United States, 234 U. S. 600, 611; or women's clothes, Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Commission, supra; or motion pictures, United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173. Here as in the Fashion Originators' Guild case, supra, 465, 'the combination is in reality an extragovernmental agency, which prescribes rules for the regulation and restraint of interstate commerce, and provides extrajudicial tribunals for determination and punishment of violations, and thus "trenches upon the power of the national legislature and violates the statute."' Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, supra, 612, 613."[37]

This is anticipatory of the criterion of "appreciable segments" as a test of unreasonableness or monopolistic substantiality, established in later cases.[38]

Some writers have expressed the view that the more recent decisions, and especially the Yellow Cab decision,[39] substitutes a new and uniform concept or standard of illegality for the older ones under the Sherman Act, which considers the effect on "an appreciable segment" of commerce the test. They see in this the abandonment of the older, "quantitative" postulate which related the amount of the commerce involved to the whole commerce in the nation.[40] But I find the nucleus of this norm not only in the Associated Press case[41], but in older cases.[42] Thus, in a case involving control of advertising media in a certain field as the basis for a damage action under the Sherman Anti-Trust law, the Supreme Court held that it was invalid, although it applied to a limited geographic area or to a part of the commerce only. The Court used this language:

"The record contains no suggestion by respondents or by either court that petitioner's allegations are not sufficient to charge a violation of Sec. 1 and 2. Its right to recover does not depend upon the proportion that respondents control of the total farm paper advertisements in the entire country, and it was not required to prove that respondents imposed a restraint or attempted monopolization that would affect all commercial advertisements in all farm papers wherever published or circulated. The provisions of Secs. 1 and 2 have both a geographical and distributive significance and apply to any part of the United States as distinguished from the whole and to any part of the classes of things forming a part of interstate commerce. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 61."[43]

And there is one lower court, well considered decision which found an illegal restriction in a limitation to a particular large customer,—the United States Government.[44]

It was insisted at the oral argument that the late cases, especially the Yellow Cab case,[45] having arisen under the Sherman Act, do not control here. Granted that these rulings interpret that Act, they are, nontheless, applicable to the present case for the obvious reason that the violations which the Government in this case charges are violations of both the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

As a rule, language used in interpreting one statute is not conclusive of the meaning of other kindred statutes. However, the history of Anti-Trust legislation shows that less is required to prove illegality under the Sherman Act than under the Clayton Act. Rightly. For the object of the Clayton Act was to declare illegal, in their incipiency, acts which would only be illegal under the Sherman Act in their full fruition. Differently put, what, in its result, is an unreasonable restraint under the Sherman Act is, in its beginning, a substantial restraint under the Clayton Act, if it is of a nature likely to achieve such result.

It is argued that to apply this criterion would result in anomalous situations: If the operators of stations, instead of agreeing to buy their "requirements" of petroleum products, agreed to buy a definite quantity over a period of time, sufficient to satisfy their needs, this arrangement would, just as effectively, shut out competition. And yet, it is insisted that, although such arrangement would achieve the same result, it would not fall within any of the prohibitions of the anti-trust statutes.

But there is a distinction between the two situations. When a dealer agrees to take a specific amount of a product, there is a likehood that he may, in case of failure of the supplier to comply with the agreement, or unexpected shortages or increased demands, or a desire to anticipate such shortages or demands, by overstocking,—seek competitive products. There is thus a possibility of access by competitors to the particular outlets.

Under the "requirements" contracts, the chance is completely cut off. Briefly stated, without a "requirements" contract, competitors may, in time, induce dealers to handle their products. With a contract, they never can. There is opportunity to deal with the competitors, and, hence, possibility, nay, probability, of freedom of action, when there is no restrictive contract. There is complete and final absence of freedom of dealing during the life of a contract, when it calls for exclusion. The shut-out is just as effective as an agreement to boycott products originating in interstate commerce.[46] Both "restraint or control the supply entering and moving in interstate commerce".[47]

(B) Restraint: Entire or Fractional:

(1) Comparative Figures:

The turn which our consideration of the case has taken calls for a statement of additional facts which, in fairness to the defendants, should be referred to, because they are the foundation for the contention that the practices here under attack do not violate either statute. They also serve to point to the fact that, in this case, the problem which confronts the court is to determine, in the light of the latest cases of the Supreme Court, which of the two methods of assaying specific facts which, in the main, are not in dispute, should control.

The facts to be alluded to present one facet of the problem. The practices which the Government seeks to prohibit are not of recent origin. To the contrary, they have been in effect for over 15 years. They are employed not only by Standard, but by its competitors in the Western Area, especially the "majors,"—Associated, Shell, General Petroleum, Texas Co., Union Oil Co., Richfield,—as their representatives have so forthrightly admitted. The following statistical data, culled from the record, shows the comparative position of Standard in relation to its major competitors, omitting, for brevity, the comparative number of stations:

Certain general inferences were drawn from these facts, at the argument. They are: The actual increase in the sale of petroleum products corresponds to the rise in the whole industry. The number of outlets over a period of ten years has been reduced from an average of 7650 to 6000. Between 1936 and 1946, Standard sales of gasoline increased 58.8 per cent. The industry increase for the same period was 64.7 per cent. For lubricating oil, Standard's increase was 62.9 per cent, the industry increase, 104.8 per cent. As to batteries, the increase in units for Standard was 46.5 per cent, for the industry, 41.8 per cent. The comparative figures, as to the increase for some of the other companies are: Gasoline: Union Oil Company, 90 per cent; General Petroleum, 165 per cent; and Tidewater Associated, 34 per cent. Lubricating Oil: Union Oil Company, 98.2 per cent; General Petroleum, 174.9 per cent; and Tidewater Associated, 54.8 per cent.

Macmillan dispense their lubricating oil through some 10,000 accounts in the seven Western states. For Pennoil Company, the outlets in 1916 were 2000, in 1946, 12,000. For Arthur Haven Company, the outlets were 3500 in 1946, in 1947, 7,000. During this period, the number of outlets for Standard was 5197. During the same period, the number of independent stations which handle gasoline of different companies, or, what has been referred to as "split pump" accounts, has increased, although they represent only 1.6 per cent of all the stations. Between 1931 and 1941,—a ten-year period,—Standard constructed only 8 per cent of the newly constructed service stations upon vacant sites. Between 1942 and 1947, Standard's proportion of new construction was 8.7 per cent.

(2) The Other Side of the Shield:

The other aspect of the problem must take into consideration the following facts: The gallonage of gasoline marketed has risen and the value of the commerce in petroleum and other products was $68,000,000.00 in 1947. The following statistical data bear on the extent of this commerce.

(3) The Inconclusiveness of Comparative Figures

Over the Government's objection, I allowed many comparative statistics, of which the foregoing are examples, to go into the record. This was consistent with the view that in resolving the issues of this case, the potential or actual effect of the agreements is important in determining reasonableness of restraint under the Sherman Act and substantiality of restraint or tendency to create monopoly under the Clayton Act.

But, while the comparative figures bear on the question, they are not determinate. Substantiality of restraint or tendency to create monopoly is established by (a) the market foreclosed,—here represented by the controlled units,— and (b) the volume of controlled business, totalling here in value $68,000,000.00.

Fractionally speaking, the business done by the competitors with their own outlets or with those under contract is much greater than the business of Standard,—both in volume and in money value. Nevertheless, the business of Standard is considerable. In effect, it amounts to a substantial lessening of competition and a monopoly of a sizeable segment of a line of commerce in a definite area—the seven Western states. What has the tendency to achieve such result become, in actual effect, an unreasonable restraint? Even before adopting the "appreciable segment" test[48], the Supreme Court sought to avoid a rigid formula for finding reasonableness or unreasonableness. In the Trenton Potteries case, Mr. Justice Stone stated:

> "Reasonableness is not a concept of definite and unchanging content. Its meaning necessarily varies in the different fields of the law, because it is used as a convenient summary of the dominant considerations which control in the application of legal doctrines. Our view of what is a reasonable restraint of commerce is controlled by the recognized purpose of the Sherman Law itself. Whether this type of restraint is reasonable or not must be judged in part at least in the light of its effect of competition, for whatever difference of opinion there may be among economists, as to the social and economic desirability of an unrestrained competitive system, it cannot be doubted that the Sherman Law and the judicial decisions interpreting it *are based upon the assumption that the public interest is best protected from the evils of monopoly * * * by the maintenance of competition.*"[49]

It follows that there is illegal restraint here under both Acts, whether the commerce be considered quantitatively or comparatively.

(4) Application to Sub-leases and Open Accounts

We need not dwell at length on the contention that the stations operated under a sub-lease or on open account must be omitted from consideration. It is true that the Clayton Act[50] speaks of leases of goods. And it may be conceded that the statute does not apply to leases on real property. And, generally speaking, a sub-lease is not a lease. But, as I stated at the oral argument, the designation which the parties have given to an instrument is not conclusive. We are dealing with an important governmental policy of long duration, established by a statute which became effective on July 2, [48] See Part III, (A) and cases cited in Footnotes 36 to 45.

[49] United States v. Trenton Potteries, 1926, 273 U. S. 392, 397. (Italics added.)

[50] 15 U. S. C. A., Sec. 14; Curtis Publishing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 1921, 3 Cir., 270 Fed. 881, 906; Associated Oil Co. v. Meyers, 1933, 217 Cal. 297, 304-306.

1890,[51] and implemented by a subsequent statute, which became effective on October 14, 1914.[52] Our duty is to give effect to it. If the practices involved in the case are contrary to the provisions of either statute, the character of the instrument in which they are contained is not important. The Sherman Act refers to contracts.[53] The Clayton Act refers to leases, sales or contracts. But, in setting the boundaries of illegality, it speaks of conditions, agreements, or understandings that the lessee or purchaser shall not use or deal in competitive goods, and which may result in the restraints condemned by the statute.[54] The Complaint is drawn under both statutes. Ordinarily, a lease deals with the term, the rent to be paid, and the type of business to be conducted on the premises. But, if, in addition, it says whose goods or products should be handled on the premises, we have a condition, agreement or understanding which has nothing to do with the lease proper, and which is within the scope of our inquiry. And if the exclusive supply undertaking, whether contained in a lease, or lurking behind an open account, has the effect condemned by the statute, it is within its prohibitions.[55]

(5) Source of Products

For the purpose of distributing the petroleum products, both in bulk and packaged, supplied by the California refineries of Standard, the territory is divided into twenty-three distributive areas. These areas are supplied bulk products by tank cars or tank trucks from various points, which, in turn, are supplied by tanker from the refineries.

Package goods are supplied by box cars and package trucks from the various refineries. For this purpose, the territory is divided into four areas. The accessories are supplied from eight accessory warehouses, their location and the dealers they serve being:

San Francisco—serves Central and Northern California; also dealers in Northwestern Nevada; also Lakeview District in Southern Oregon.

Salt Lake City—serves all Utah, Arizona, North of Grand Canyon, Eastern and Northern Nevada and Southeastern Idaho.

Phoenix—confined to the State of Arizona and Needles across the Colorado River in California.

Los Angeles—Southern California and Southern Nevada.

Fresno—within the State of California.

Portland—Oregon, Southern Washington and Southwestern Idaho.

Seattle—Washington only.

Spokane—Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho.

The point is pressed that some of the products, such as gasoline, are supplied to California stations exclusively from California refineries. And it is argued that, so far as the California stations are concerned, their dealings in gasoline are beyond the purview of interstate commerce.

We are not dealing here with commerce in different articles. We are dealing with contracts and practices which are alleged to be illegal under the Anti-Trust Acts. These contracts, which have been epitomized in the first part of this opinion[56] cover specifically all petroleum products and tires, tubes and batteries. They also affect dealings in other accessories. We need not, therefore,—nay, we cannot—make a segregation, so as to exclude any item which may have both state provenance and destination in the Western area. The contract is an entirety and cannot be split. More, under the Clayton Act, if a contract has a tendency to lessen competition substantially, or to create a monopoly, the fact that it may also affect the movement of goods in intrastate commerce does not validate it, if its whole effect is likely to be a lessening of competition or monopoly in a sizeable and measurable segment of interstate commerce. In interpreting statutes of this character, and, generally, any legislation which aims to carry into effect the plenary power of the Congress to regulate commerce, it is accepted constitutional doctrine that the power to control is not destroyed by the mere fact that purely intrastate activities may also be reached by it.[57]

More, as already shown, there is a constant flow in interstate commerce of these products and supplies.[58] The contracts affect, and the transactions under them are in the course of, interstate commerce. And the practice must also be considered from the effect on the dealers and the competitive suppliers. If, as to them, it results in an effective lock-out of a considerable supply of goods of interstate source, the contracts which carry the practice into effect are invalid.

Conclusion and Findings

(1) Summary of conclusions: So we come to the end of our discussion. Grant that, on a comparative basis, and in relation to the entire trade in these products in the area, the restraint is not integral. Admit also that control of distribution results in lessening of costs and that its abandonment might increase costs. Despite all this, there confronts us the inescapable fact that such "balanced distribution"—as counsel for the defendants characterize it,—calls for concentration of representation, which, in turn, results in an unreasonable restriction of trade, and a substantial lessening of competition, so far as the 5197 outlets, their independent operators and those who seek to supply them, are concerned. As the restriction corners a market of the value of $68,000,000.00, it is illegal, even considered on a comparative basis. Concede further, that the arrangement was entered into in good faith, with the honest belief that control of distribution and consequent concentration of representation were economically beneficial[59] to the industry and to the public, that they have continued for over fifteen years openly, notoriously and unmolested, by the Government, and have been practiced by other major oil companies competing with Standard, that the number of Standard outlets so controlled may have decreased, and the quantity of products supplied to them may have declined, on a comparative basis. Nevertheless, as I read the latest cases of the Supreme Court, I am compelled to find the practices here involved to be violative of both statutes. For they affect injuriously a sizeable part of interstate commerce, or,—to use the current phrase—"an appreciable segment" of interstate commerce.

(2) Specific Findings: So the facts proved and the legal principles applicable command the following findings:

1. The exclusive supply agreements relate to interstate commerce.

2. They affect, and the transactions under them are, in the course of, interstate commerce.

[58] United States v. Trenton Potteries, 1926, 273 U. S. 392, 397; and see cases cited in Footnotes 9 to 13. General statements on discontinuity as an element in fixing the intrastate character of a transaction, such as those quoted and relied on, from Jewel Tea Co. v. Williams, 1941, 10 Cir., 118 F. (2) 203, 206-207, are not very helpful. They must be evaluated only in relation to the situation under review in the particular case, and in the light of the later Supreme Court decisions, which have modified greatly the concept they seek to perpetuate. The case in which they are found was decided in 1941. In Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 317 U. S. 564, decided in 1944, the Supreme Court refused to apply rigidly the formula of pause or stoppage. The Court said:

"The record reveals, however, that the goods in both of these two categories are ordered pursuant to a preexisting contract or understanding with the customer. It is not clear whether the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals includes these two types of transactions in the group of prior orders which it held were covered by the Act. We think they must be included. Certainly they cannot be distinguished from the special orders which respondent receives from its customers. Here also, a break in their physical continuity of transit is not controlling. If there is a practical continuity of movement from the manufacturers or suppliers without the state, through respondent's warehouse and on to customers whose prior orders or contracts are being filled, the interstate journey is not ended by reason of a temporary holding of the goods at the warehouse. The fact that respondent may treat the goods as stock in trade or the circumstance that title to the goods passes to respondent on the intermediate delivery does not mean that the interstate journey ends at the warehouse. The contract or understanding pursuant to which goods are ordered, like a special order, indicates where it was intended that the interstate movement should terminate. Numerous authorities are pressed on us for the contrary view and for the conclusion that when the goods enter the warehouse, they are no longer 'in commerce.' But as we stated in Kirschbaum Co. v. Walling, 316 U. S. 517, 520-521, decisions dealing with various assertions of state or federal power in the commerce filed are not particularly helpful in determining the reach of this Act." (Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., supra, pp. 568-569). (Italics added.)

And see, Walling v. Mutual Wholesale Foods Supply Co., 1944, 8 Cir., 141 F. (2) 331, 338-340; compare, Clyde v. Broderick, 1944, 10 Cir., 144 F. (2) 348, 351, decided after the Jacksonville Paper Co. case, and in which the same court which decided the Jewel Tea Company case applies a more flexible concept, which accords with the latest rulings of the Supreme Court.

[59] See Part II-(D) of opinion, and cases cited in Footnotes 32 to 35.

3. The relation established by the agreements between the operators and Standard is not that of employer and employee, but that of independent contractor.

4. The agreements confine the operators of stations to which they apply to dealing in Standard products, and automotive accessories handled or sponsored by them.

5. They lock out dealers from sources of competitive products originating in interstate commerce.

6. They deny to dealers access to such competitive products.

7. They deny to manufacturers or suppliers of such products access to the outlets controlled by the independent contractors who operate the stations.

8. They affect a substantial number of outlets and a substantial amount of products, whether considered comparatively or not.

9. They constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade and commerce among the States, under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.[60]

10. They result in a substantial lessening of competition and tend to create a monopoly in a line of commerce, in contravention of the Clayton Act.[61]

11. They are illegal in their effect and should be enjoined.

Judgment will, therefore, be for the plaintiff. The terms of the judgment are contained in an order filed simultaneously.

Louisiana Unfair Sales Act

Unfair Sales Act—Constitutionality—No Violation of Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses.—In adopting the Unfair Sales Act, the Louisiana legislature was acting within its police power, to protect the economic structure and to prevent the creation or perpetuation of monopolies. Since the Act has neither been alleged nor shown to be arbitrary or discriminatory, the Act is held constitutional. The judgment of the trial court enjoining a retail grocer from advertising and selling cigarettes at less than cost, in violation of the Unfair Sales Act, is affirmed. The dissenting opinion states that the Act is unconstitutional for the reason that the provisions of the Act have no direct relation to the mischiefs at which, in the title and preamble, the Act is said to be aimed, or to the purposes which are intended to be accomplished.

See the Louisiana Unfair Sales Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8328.01, and prior opinion, ¶ 62,206.

[Nature of Action]

FOURNET, J.: This case is now before us for the second time. It was originally here on an appeal by the defendant from a judgment permanently enjoining him from advertising and selling cigarettes at less than cost in violation of the "Unfair Sales Act," Act No. 338 of 1940, as amended by Act 79 of 1942 and Act 265 of 1946. Finding that we had no jurisdiction in the matter, we transferred the case to the Court of Appeal for the Second Circuit under the authority of Act 19 of 1912. — La. —, 34 So. 2d 58. That court is now certifying to us for our answer, under the authority of Section 25 of Article VII of the Constitution of 1921, the question of the constitutionality vel non of this act and we, under the authority of this same section and in order to avoid any further delay in returning the case with instructions, have concluded to "decide the whole matter in controversy in the same manner as if it had been on appeal directly to the Supreme Court."

The simple question posed in this case has been answered adversely to the contention of the appellant by the courts of the thirty states of the Union that have had occasion to review the similar acts adopted by their respective legislatures. [Legislative History]

The great strides made by mass production and the development of national brands of standard consumers' goods exploited by advertising addressed directly to the public since the beginning of the century have been parallelled by increased and intensified competition, with its resultant effect upon the economic welfare of the citizen and the merchant. To combat the monopolistic dangers inherent in the concentration of retail distribution in the hands of large and richly-financed distributive units seeking to secure an increasingly large share of the retail market in all nationally advertised brands, and to protect the small and independent retailers from gradual liquidation by reason of the varied schemes devised to "kill off" the competition they afford, the law-making bodies throughout the various states of the country early in the century undertook to restrain the inexorable tendency of these practices by enacting legislation designed to eliminate the employment of questionable devices for the studied purpose of injuring competitors. Such devices were condemned in these acts as being inimicable to the public welfare and to the economic stability of the community.

Among one of the most common of these devices is the so-called "loss leader", employed under the guise of an advertising scheme but characterized as "bait" by the late Justice Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court in an article written before his elevation to the bench. Justice Brandeis also said this device would be more appropriately termed a "mis-leader" because its very purpose is, ordinarily, "to create a false impression." This observation, made in 1913, is equally true today. "Loss leader" is the term applied to the practice of selling nationally known articles at cost or less than cost for the calculated purpose of enticing customers away from competitors and into stores where they may be entrapped into purchasing other goods at marked-up prices that will more than make up for the loss on the "leader". Such practices tend to bankrupt the small merchants and to create monopolies by the concentration of distribution in the hands of a few well-financed groups. In addition, they are inimicable to sound and honest merchandising.

Beginning with South Carolina's rather feeble initial attempt to cope with this problem in 1902, the states have gradually and increasingly strengthened legislation levelled at preventing the unreasonably low pricing of goods for the purpose of destroying competition or of eliminating an individual competitor while at the same time deluding the public. Today all but three states have fair trade statutes of some kind. Some thirty states have statutes that are designated generally as Unfair Practices Acts or Unfair Sales Acts. These acts all follow the same general pattern, the only practical difference being that the method employed in computing the cost of the article varies.

[Louisiana Statute]

The legislature of Louisiana, following this trend and expression of public policy, adopted in 1940 its Unfair Sales Act, the express object of which, according to its title, is "to protect the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition by prohibiting unfair sales and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented". The act, as amended, makes it unlawful for any retailer or wholesaler, with the intent or effect of unfair competition, to advertise, offer to sell, or sell, any merchandise at less than cost. "Cost" is defined in Section 2 to be the invoice cost, or the replacement cost within thirty days prior to the date of sale, whichever is lower, less all trade discounts, except customary discounts for cash, and plus freight charges, cartage and certain taxes, and also plus a markup to cover a proportionate part of the cost of doing business, which markup, in the absence of proof of a lesser cost, is fixed at six per cent for retailers and two per cent at the wholesale level. Section 6 of the act excepts from the operation of its provisions all out of the ordinary situations where a sale at less than cost may be necessary, such as bankruptcy sales, sales to the highest bidder of confiscated goods and those situations where the price of merchandise has been made in good faith to meet competition. Any violation of the act is made a misdemeanor in Section 4, punishable by a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $500 for each offense. Section 5 vests the courts of the state with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of the act and authorizes any person damaged or threatened with loss or injury by reason of its violation to sue for and secure injunctive relief. It is also made the duty of the district attorneys throughout the state to institute proceedings to prevent and restrain violations of the act.

[Facts of Case]

The defendant in this case, I. Rosenzweig, doing business as the Pic-Kwickly Grocery, located at Tallulah, Louisiana, in Madison Parish, in answer to the suit filed against him by the Louisiana Wholesale Distributors Association, Inc., a non-profit corporation composed of a large group of wholesale tobacco and grocery distributors of Louisiana, commonly known as jobbers, admitted the allegations contained in the petition charging him with having advertised and sold certain popular brands of cigarettes at less than cost, in violation of the Unfair Sales Act, stating that he used them as a "loss leader" in an effort to stimulate his general grocery business. As a defense, he urged that the act is unconstitutional because it violates the due process and equal protection guaranteed him under the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, and under Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution of Louisiana, contending that such a statute is, in fact, a price fixing statute and class legislation, precluding him from freely contracting with regard to his property.

[Ruling of Lower Court]

Upon this constitutional issue there was judgment in the lower court decreeing Act 338 of 1940, as amended, to be constitutional and granting the plaintiff the injunctive relief prayed for.

[Cases Cited]

The leading case on this subject, Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 54 S. Ct. 505, 78 L. Ed. 940, 89 A. L. R. 1469, brought to the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision the question of the constitutionality of a New York milk control law that had been adopted for the purpose of thwarting harmful competition. Under this law the administrative board issued regulations fixing the minimum price that could be charged for milk by the quart and pint and Nebbia, when charged with the violation of these minimum price regulations, asserted as his defense that the statute and regulation contravened the equal protection and due process clauses of the Constitution of the United States. His argument before the United States Supreme Court was that the board's order discriminated unfairly against him as a "cash-and-carry" dealer in milk since his rivals in the trade who had no store but only a wagon and delivery route had no lower limit set for the price at which they were obliged to buy his milk and were allowed to sell pints of milk as low as he did, with delivery to the customer's door as a bonus. In upholding the constitutionality of the regulations issued under the Milk Control Law, the court made the following pertinent observations that are equally applicable in the case now before us:

> "So far as the requirement of due process is concerned and in the absence of other constitutional restriction, a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it. If the laws passed are seen to have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied, and judicial determination to that effect renders a court functus officio. 'Whether the free operation of the normal laws of competition is a wise and wholesome rule for trade and commerce is an economic question which this court need not consider or determine.' Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S.

197, 337, 338, 48 L. Ed. 679, 700, 701, 24 S. Ct. 436. And it is equally clear that if the legislative policy be to curb unrestrained and harmful competition by measure which are not arbitrary or discriminatory it does not lie with the courts to determine that the rule is unwise. With the wisdom of the policy adopted, with the adequacy or practicability of the law enacted to forward it, the courts are both incompetent and unauthorized to deal. The course of decision in this court exhibits a firm adherence to these principles. Times without number we have said that the legislature is primarily the judge of the necessity of such an enactment, that every possible presumption is in favor of its validity, and that though the court may hold views inconsistent with the wisdom of the law, it may not be annulled unless palpably in excess of legislative power. * * * The constitution does not secure to anyone liberty to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict injury upon the public at large, or upon any substantial group of the people. Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty." (Italics ours.)

In the landmark case of Wholesale Tobacco Dealers Bureau v. National Candy & Tobacco Co., 11 Cal. 2d 634, 82 P. 2d 3, 118 A. L. R. 486, the California Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the California Unfair Practices Act of 1936, as amended (an act that is for all intents and purposes identical with the one here being considered), despite the attack made upon it by the defendant, enjoined from selling its products below cost or replacement cost, whichever was the lower, plus the cost of doing business as defined in the act, epitomizing in the following excerpt from its opinion the attitude of the courts with respect to the legality of such statutes:

"That the avowed purpose of the act as stated in section 13 ' * * * to safeguard the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition, by prohibiting unfair and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented'—is well within the state's police power cannot be seriously doubted. It has now become firmly established that the police power of the state extends not only to the preservation of the public health, safety and morals, but also extends to the preservation and promotion of the public welfare. In recent years the state, in promoting and advancing the general welfare of its citizens, has frequently and properly used this power to promote the general prosperity of the state by the regulation of economic conditions. This apparent extension of the police power is in fact no extension at all. The police power has not expanded. Its proper exercise has always been and still is confined to regulation in the public welfare, and has always been and still is subject to the standard of reasonableness in its relation to that interest. However changed social, political and economic conditions have enlarged the field of conduct which may properly be subjected to regulation in order that the general welfare may be adequately protected. The proper application of the power cannot be measured by past precedents—the test is, of course, present day conditions. These principles have frequently been enunciated by this Court and by the Supreme Court of the United States. * * * That the prevention of monopolies and the fostering of free, open and fair competition and the prohibition of unfair trade practices is in the public welfare is obvious, and requires no citation of authority." (Italics ours.)

The case relied on by the defendant is Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Ervin, 23 Fed. Supp. 70. The statute under which this case was decided has since been superseded by an act of the Minnesota legislature that is practically identical with the one here under consideration, and the constitutionality of this later act was upheld by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of McElhone v. Geror, 207 Minn. 580, 292 N. W. 414, wherein it is said:

"Until recently it was thought, incorrectly, that outside the field of businesses conducted under a franchise and enterprises which, historically, were considered subject to price regulation, the fixing of prices was permissible only where the business was 'affected with a public interest'. Tyson & Bro. v. Banton, 273 U. S. 418, 47 S. Ct. 426, 71 L. Ed. 718, 58 A. L. R. 1236; Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U. S. 235, 49 S. Ct. 115, 73 L. Ed. 287, 60 A. L. R. 596. That doctrine, which put price control in a different category from other forms of state regulation, has been disapproved. In Nebbia v. New York, supra, it was said: 'Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the Legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty.' "

[Within Police Power]

Such acts have consistently been held not to be price fixing statutes. They merely fix the level below which producers and distributors may not sell without injury to a competitor and, ultimately, to the community. Clearly, therefore, in adopting this state's Unfair Sales Act for the protection of our economic structure and to prevent the creation or perpetuation of monopolies, the legislature was acting well within its police power. And since the act has neither been alleged nor shown to be arbitrary or discriminatory and an examination of its context shows it is broad in its scope and uniform and fair in its operation and is not violative of any of the personal or contractual rights guaranteed to our citizens by the federal and state constitutions, it is our conclusion that the statute is constitutional.

[Judgment Affirmed]

For the reasons assigned the judgment of the district court, granting the injunctive relief prayed for, is affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

O'NIELL, C. J., dissenting: The question propounded by the court of appeal is this:

"Are the acts of the Legislature mentioned herein [Act 338 of 1940 as amended by Act 79 of 1942 and by Act 256 of 1946] vulnerable to the plea of unconstitutionality tendered and urged by the defendant?"

My opinion is that Act 338 of 1940 as amended by Act 79 of 1942 and by Act 256 of 1946 is unconstitutional. I base this opinion upon the fact that the provisions of the act have no direct relation to the mischiefs at which, in the title and preamble, the act is said to be aimed, or to the purposes which, according to the title and preamble, are intended to be accomplished. It is no reflection upon the members of the Legislature of Louisiana to say that the title and preamble are not at all appropriate to the avowed purpose for which the statute was enacted, because, as I understand from my research, the statute, including the title and preamble, was copied from or patterned after statutes adopted originally in other states. See Virginia Acts of 1938, Ch. 441; Arizona Laws of 1939, Ch. 39; Idaho Laws of 1939, Ch. 209; Wisconsin Laws of 1939, Ch. 56. The title and preample of the Louisiana statute have never been amended in any way since they were adopted originally as the title and preamble of Act 338 of 1940. It appears to me—I say with great respect—that the original composer of this title and preamble had an exaggerated idea of the things to be accomplished and the evils to be abolished by the adoption of the act. Competition is the life of trade. A merchant putting out and advertising "loss leaders" in his stock of merchandise cannot possibly do injury to his customers or to the general public. Such practice can affect adversely only competitors in business, by stimulating competition. No merchant can continue indefinitely or for a great length of time to advertise and sell "loss leaders" without putting himself out of business. He has as much right to put himself out of business in that way as he would have to close his door and leave the field to his competitors whenever he sees fit. Besides, a customer who goes to a store to buy a so-called "loss leader", whether it be a carton of cigarettes or any other article of merchandise, is not obliged to buy anything else. If he sees fit he may buy only the "loss leader", within the limits of the quantity which the advertiser is willing to sell to any one buyer.

And now, for the purpose of showing why I consider that the title and preamble to this statute, which originated somewhere outside of Louisiana, is—to say the least of it—far-fetched—and misleading—I reproduce here a copy of the title and preamble:

> "AN ACT to protect the public against the creation or perpetuation of monopolies and to foster and encourage competition by prohibiting unfair sales and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented; to define 'unfair sales' and to provide remedies for the violations thereof; and to provide penalties for the violation of the provisions of this Act.
> "Whereas, the practice of selling certain items of merchandise below cost in order to attract patronage is generally a form of deceptive advertising and an unfair method of competition in commerce; and
> "Whereas, such practice causes commercial dislocations, misleads the consumer, works back against the farmer, directly burdens and obstructs commerce, and diverts business from dealers who maintain a fair price policy; and
> "Whereas, bankruptcies among merchants who fail because of the competition of those who use such methods result in unemployment, disruption of leases, and non-payment of taxes and loans, and contribute to an inevitable train of undesirable consequences, including economic depression, now therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of Louisiana, That" etc.

In the sixth section of the act certain exceptions are made to its applicability, such as bona fide clearance sales, if the merchandise is marked and sold as in such sales, or where perishable merchandise must be sold promptly to prevent a loss, or where merchandise is imperfect or damaged, or the sale of it is being discontinued, provided that the merchandise in such cases is advertised and marked down as being sold for such reason, or where merchandise is sold in the final liquidation of any business, or where it is sold to a relief agency, or to a governmental institution, etc., or where the price of the merchandise is made in good faith to meet competition, or where a sale is made by an officer under an order or the direction of any court. These exceptions to the applicability of the statute are only such as the courts themselves would be apt to observe to prevent injustice. But these exceptions do not save the statute from the plea of unconstitutionality.

The statute contains also what is called a severability clause, declaring that if any section, sentence, clause or provision of the act shall be decreed unconstitutional the decree shall not impair any valid provision of the act. The severability clause is a matter of no importance in this case because, if the general provisions of the statute are violative of the due process clause in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, the statute is entirely unconstitutional.

The due process clause does not permit the legislature to authorize the several district attorneys and grand juries throughout the state to prosecute—or to authorize the district judges to convict and punish by a fine of $500.00—a merchant who does nothing worse than to sell a package of cigarettes or any other article of merchandise for a sum less than it cost him.

For these reasons I respectfully dissent from the majority opinion in this case.

[¶ 62,263] Allied Paper Mills, et al. v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 8911. June 11, 1948.

On Petition for Review of Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Combination to Fix Prices—Sufficiency of Findings—Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Findings.—A Federal Trade Commission order requiring corporations engaged in the manufacture, sale and distribution of book paper, and an association of such manufacturers, to cease and desist from engaging in concerted price-fixing and other activities in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, is held to be supported by the evidence as to all but one of the respondents. The findings are ordered vacated as to that one, and enforced as to all the other respondents. The findings of the Commission that the capacity, tendency and effect of the combination maintained and the acts and practices performed by respondents thereunder were to lessen, restrain and suppress competition in the sale of book papers, and that the combination and conspiracy resulted in the fixing of uniform prices, are held sufficient as a matter of law. Respondents were proved to have agreed upon uniform quantity discounts, uniform finishing differentials, uniform base prices, and a uniform zoning system with uniform zone differentials, without regard to a particular respondent's costs of production and distribution. The pattern clearly provides a means of fixing uniform prices. Evidence that the practice of one respondent was to compete with the other respondents by offering its coated paper within the other respondents' uncoated paper price ranges, and, in so doing, adopting the latters' trade customs for uncoated paper, to meet competition, is held not substantial, and the findings of conspiracy to fix prices cannot be sustained as to that respondent.

Affirming in part and reversing in part the order of the Federal Trade Commission in Dkt. 3760.

Before MAJOR and MINTON, Circuit Judges, and LINDLEY, District Judge.

[Nature of Action]

MINTON, C. J.: This is a petition to review a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission and to set aside the Commission's findings as to the facts and conclusions upon which the order is based. In the alternative, we are asked to modify the order and such findings as are unsupported by the evidence or by the law.

The petitioners are some forty-two corporations engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of book paper, the Book Paper Manufacturers Association, and the Association's officers and representatives. The Book Paper Manufacturers Association, hereafter referred to as the Association, is a voluntary, unincorporated body composed of manufacturers of book paper. It was organized in June 1933, in connection with the National Industrial Recovery Act, with its executive committee in substance as the executive authority of the N. R. A. code for book paper manufacture. Each corporate petitioner is a member of the Association and each is engaged in interstate commerce. No single corporate petitioner produces more than 10 per cent of the industry's output.

[Price Fixing Charged]

The complaint against the petitioners charged them with engaging in unfair methods of competition in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 45(a), by entering into among themselves since June 16, 1933, and for more than two years last past, a combination to suppress or restrict price competition and to fix prices. After extensive hearings, the Commission found against the petitioners and issued its order directing them to cease and desist from price fixing and from certain specified activities for the purpose of price fixing.

[Facts]

Broadly speaking, book paper is any paper which contains not more than 25 per cent groundwood and which is customarily used for printing purposes. The more important kinds of book paper are those used in books, magazines, and pamphlets, offset paper used in the offset printing process, envelope paper, and tablet paper. Other types include paper used in adding machines, for calendars, menus, posters, decalcomania, and transfer printing. Book paper may be divided on another basis into coated and uncoated paper, the former being paper which after manufacture is coated on one or both sides to improve the printing surface. There are several grades of coated and uncoated paper.

Manufacturers of book paper sell variously to paper merchants, users, or both in varying degrees. Approximately 55 per cent of the book paper production is sold by the mills to the users, principally magazine and book publishers, converters, and printers. The remaining 45 per cent is sold to merchants for resale. Approximately 55 per cent of the total tonnage sales, both to users and merchants, is made on the basis of negotiated contracts. "Spot transactions" comprise the other 45 per cent of the total tonnage sales; a "spot transaction" is a sale resulting from an order for a stated kind and quantity of paper to be delivered on a specified date or dates at an agreed price. Of the spot transactions, a majority are between the mill and the merchant. Paper merchants usually buy and sell book papers produced by more than one manufacturer.

Some manufacturers produce both coated and uncoated papers, others produce only one kind; some produce coated paper only and buy uncoated paper from other producers; some produce only a few grades of either coated or uncoated paper, while others produce many; some concentrate largely upon offset papers or envelope or tablet papers, while many have specialized papers not closely related to any of the standard grades. Book papers are made in many types, sizes, weights, and colors, and with many different special characteristics for particular uses. Paper of any designated grade produced by one manufacturer is not necessarily identical with that classified in the same grade but produced by another manufacturer. All papers classified in one grade compete primarily with one another and are considered equivalent by petitioners for pricing purposes. However, there is also competition between adjoining grades because it is frequently possible to substitute one for another.

[Petitions for Review]

Petitioner Consolidated Water Power and Paper Company, of Wisconsin, hereafter referred to as Consolidated, has separately attacked the Commission's order. For reasons that will be developed, we deem it necessary to detail the facts of its operation since they are not the same as those of the other corporate petitioners. The Commission here has acknowledged Consolidated's unique situation, but it did not make any separate findings as to it.

[Petitioner's Production]

Ninety-five per cent of Consolidated's production within the scope of this proceeding is coated book paper, comparable in quality but not meeting the specifications of the so-called standard grades of coated papers manufactured by other mills. This departure from standard specifications results from the groundwood content of Consolidated's product. This coated paper is the exclusive product of Consolidated by virtue of its patent which manufactures and coats paper in a single process at great speeds as compared with the other corporate petitioners' separate and slow coating process after manufacture. Because of its patented process and inexpensive pulp, Consolidated is able to sell its coated papers at prices substantially lower than the published list prices of the standard grades of coated papers. In fact, Consolidated sells its coated paper within the lower price range of the uncoated (and, of course, inferior for printing purposes) paper of the other corporate petitioners. In the five-year period beginning in January 1935, the date of Consolidated's manufacture by the patented process, it has developed an annual market in coated papers of 80,000 tons, a substantial portion of which business was formerly held by the other corporate petitioners. At no time did Consolidated submit a bid for Government business, but it is a member of the Association.

[Organization of Association]

Essentially, the combination and conspiracy charged against all the petitioners was to fix prices to customers located throughout the United States, including the United States Government as a customer, by the following means. Certain of the corporate petitioners organized the Association in June 1933; all others have joined it since and have used it since its organization as a clearing house and means of exchange for information submitted to it by the members, including sales reports, prices, discounts, and terms of sale. Regular meetings of the Association are held from time to time at which the corporate and individual petitioners discuss trade and competitive conditions and agree upon and fix trade policies and prices to be charged.

[Uniform Differentials]

It is further alleged that the petitioners have formulated and adopted uniform finishing differentials which they use without regard to the actual cost of the finishing operations to the respective petitioners. The petitioners have promulgated and compiled so-called trade customs in the form of rules and regulations dealing with allocation and classification of grades, grading, quotations and sales, and other similar matters, and including a pricing guide containing a zoned map of the United States with price differentials according to zone. It is alleged that the petitioners generally use these rules and regulations.

[Basing Point System]

The individual petitioners are alleged to have been and to be the officers and members of the Association executive committee, and as such, have complete charge of its activities and meetings, the collection, compilation, and dissemination of information, and the formulation of trade policies. The corporate petitioners have adopted and maintained an identical zoning system for price fixing purposes by means of which the United States is divided into four zones. The corporate petitioners all sell at fixed and identical delivered prices within these zones. The price for Zone 1 constitutes the base price; the prices for the other zones are the Zone 1 base price plus a fixed and uniform differential for each zone. A single delivered price applies at each and every destination within the respective zones, no matter what place of shipment or place of delivery is involved.[1]

[1] The N. R. A., which was terminated May 27, 1935, granted immunity during its existence for the activities charged herein.

The Commission found the facts substantially as charged in the complaint. We shall discuss the findings below insofar as it is necessary to decide the case. We do not set the findings out in full, but they may be found in the record of these proceedings before the Commission. Vol. 40 Federal Trade Commission Decisions, 696.

[Jurisdiction to Review]

At the outset, it is well to decide the extent of our jurisdiction to review these proceedings. There can be no doubt of its limited character. The Federal Trade Commission Act provides: "The findings of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive." 15 U. S. C. Sec. 45 (c). This statute as interpreted by the Supreme Court gives finality to the Commission's findings of fact if they are supported by substantial evidence. F. T. C. v. Algoma Lumber Co. et al., 291 U. S. 67, 73, 54 S. Ct. 315, 78 L. Ed. 655; F. T. C. v. Pacific States Paper Trade Association, 273 U. S. 52, 63, 47 S. Ct. 255, 71 L. Ed. 534. We do not weigh the evidence or consider the credibility of the witnesses. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc., et al. v. F. T. C., decided by this Court on May 12, 1948. All reasonable inferences from the facts are likewise for the Commission. F. T. C. v. Standard Educational Society et al., 302 U. S. 112, 117, 58 S. Ct. 113, 82 L. Ed. 141; Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al., supra; Fort Howard Paper Co. et al. v. F. T. C., 156 F. (2d) 899, 907. If there is substantial evidence, though it be conflicting, the findings cannot be disturbed. Fioret Sales Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., 100 F. (2d) 358, 359. In view of this, we cannot sustain the petitioners' contention that where two contradictory and reasonable inferences may be drawn from the same evidence, the reasonable inference of guilt found by the Commission is not supported by substantial evidence. If the Commission's inference from the facts is reasonable, our inquiry ceases.

Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U. S. C. Sec. 45 (a)) which petitioners are found to have violated prohibits unfair methods of competition in commerce. A price fixing combination or agreement is clearly an unfair method of competition within the Act and is illegal. F. T. C. v. The Cement Institute et al., decided by the Supreme Court April 26, 1948. Any similar combination or agreement which tampers with the price structure is an unlawful activity. U. S. v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc. et al., 310 U. S. 150, 221, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129; Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra.

The petitioners here contend that the scope of the proceedings against them has been limited to spot transactions to merchants, and does not include contract sales, or spot transactions with non-merchants. They base this contention on objections to certain evidence made by the Commission in the trial, and they argue that the findings and evidence do not expressly relate to other than this limited issue. The Commission denies such a limitation of issues and explains its objections to this evidence on other and satisfactory grounds. Further, the Commission points out that the very fact of its not having expressly limited its findings argues against such a limitation. It contends also that the evidence is not so limited as, for example, the uniform contracts prepared and distributed to the petitioners by the Association, and the bids for Government business, which sales are contract sales. In view of this, we hold that the issues are not limited as contended by the petitioners, and if the findings are otherwise adequate and the evidence substantial, they must be upheld as to the several types of sales.

With these preliminary questions decided, there remain but two issues in the case. The first is that of the adequacy of the findings as to the facts. The petitioners have sharply and extensively argued that the findings are insufficient as a matter of law to support the order to cease and desist. The remaining question is whether there is substantial evidence to support the findings as to the facts. As indicated above in the resume of the complaint, the petitioners are charged with concertedly adopting and using several devices as the means of their total conspiracy. For purposes of this opinion, we shall refer to the concerted means that formed parts of the total conspiracy, and to the total conspiracy itself.

As to the adequacy of the findings as to the facts. In considering the petitioners' contentions in this respect, it is well to keep in mind that findings are to be construed liberally in support of a judgment or order. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra. Reasonable inferences which may be based on facts found will be deemed drawn; and words fairly importing a concerted activity or conniving together to restrain trade are sufficient to charge such a conspiracy. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra; American Tobacco Co. et al. v. U. S., 147 F. (2d) 93, 117.

As we understand the petitioners, they object to the finding of the total combination and conspiracy for indefiniteness. In accordance with the allegations in the complaint, the Commission's findings include a finding of each of the methods or techniques used to accomplish the purposes of the total combination and find categorically that such methods or techniques were arrived at through agreement and concert. The findings as to the facts conclude:

> "* * * the Commission * * * finds, that the capacity, tendency, and effect of the combination maintained in the manner aforesaid and the acts and practices performed by respondents thereunder and in connection therewith, as set out herein, has been, and is, to hinder, lessen, restrain, and suppress competition in the sale of book papers * * *."

We hold that these words, read in conjunction with the other findings, are sufficient as a matter of law. F. T. C. v. The Cement Institute et al., supra. Reasonable men cannot be so deceived as to mistake these words for other than a finding of a combination and conspiracy to fix prices. The findings apply to all petitioners—they are all named in the earlier findings, and both the ultimate finding above and the findings of agreement as to the particular means of the total combination refer to "the respondents." The findings of the concerted activities as the means of the total conspiracy are also set out with unmistakable particularity and adequacy.

The petitioners contend further that even if the findings of combination and conspiracy to fix prices are sufficient, there is no adequate finding that such combination and conspiracy resulted in uniformity of price. However, the findings as to the concerted means and methods of the total conspiracy are replete with references to price uniformity and the varying degrees thereof achieved. Moreover, the final paragraph of the findings reads:

> "* * * the Commission * * * finds, that the capacity, tendency, and effect of the combination maintained in the manner aforesaid * * * has been, and is, * * * to prevent, hinder, and restrain the operation of competitive forces which tend to disturb the uniformity of prices established and maintained through the aforesaid means."

We hold that as a matter of law this finding, when considered in connection with the prior findings and subsidiary findings of fact, sufficiently finds the wrong of fixing uniform prices resulting from the combination and conspiracy. Like the other findings, it refers to all petitioners and is adequate in that regard.

The remaining question is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. The petitioners[2] contend at the outset that there is no substantial evidence that prices were in fact in any substantial uniformity and therefore that the finding to that effect, supra, and according subsidiary findings must be set aside. We must also reject this contention. There was evidence of the prices for spot sales to merchants for two different periods, one the week ending April 3, 1937, and the other week ending July 16, 1938. Invoices were studied, analyzed, and tabulated in various ways, and they showed that in the 1937 period 85.62 per cent of sales were in agreement with the uniform price list; these sales represented 72.40 per cent of tonnage and 75.63 per cent of dollar value. For the 1938 period, 86.14 per cent were in agreement with the uniform price list; these sales represented 77.64 per cent of the tonnage and 79.56 per cent of the dollar value. As we understand the petitioners, they do not deny the truth of this evidence, but seek to discredit it with arguments going to its weight and by pitting against it expert evidence of their own. Clearly, our appellate function does not involve the sort of review that the petitioners seek of this evidence.

Even without this definitive evidence of substantial uniformity, this general finding is supported by such items of evidence as the petitioners' refusal to fill an order which petitioner Allied's merchant-agent had obtained when he cut his offering price to the United States Government, even though such price cut was to come out of the agent's commission; the undisputed uniformity of bids to the Government after N. R. A.; the reams of correspondence among and concerning the petitioners; and the petitioners' conduct through the Association when faced on occasion with breaking prices. The Commission's inferences from all of the above were reasonable. This view of the evidence has its legal basis in the clear law that price fixing as an unlawful act includes any tampering with or manipulation of prices. It includes more than the mere establishment of uniform prices, and it is not important that the prices fixed were not fixed in the sense that they were uniform and inflexible. U. S. v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc. et al., supra, at pages 221, 222, 223; Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra.

The petitioners argue that there is no substantial evidence to support the finding of the total conspiracy. A combination or conspiracy can be shown by circumstantial evidence. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co., Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra; United States Maltsters Assn. et al. v. F. T. C., 152 F. (2d) 161, 162. The evidence here which supports the finding of combination and conspiracy is legion: all the petitioners expressly pledged their continued cooperation with the Association upon the termination of the N. R. A.; the petitioners continued to file price changes with the Association on forms provided by the Association therefor and these changes were disseminated by the Association; many petitioners mailed their new base prices directly to other petitioners; the Association prepared standard contract forms containing specified provisions relating to ultimate prices, and most of the petitioners used these forms with or without minor variations; and the Association held frequent and well attended meetings. The petitioners do not controvert the truth of this evidence, but address arguments to its weight and the inferences that should have been drawn therefrom. We cannot say that the Commission's inferences are unreasonable. The petitioners did with varying uniformity use the zoning system of price quoting, and the existence of this plan which equalizes delivered prices of competitors having widely different costs at a given destination, is strong evidence in itself of an agreement to use such plan. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co, Inc. et al. v. F. T. C., supra; Fort Howard Paper Co. et al. v. F. T. C., supra, at p. 907. Moreover, a uniform participation by competitors in a particular system of doing business, where each is aware of the others' acts and where the effect is to restrain commerce, is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy. Wm. Goldman Theatres Inc. v. Loew's, Inc., et al., 150 F. (2d) 738, 745.

The record is replete with documentary evidence composed of correspondence, Association minutes, and oral testimony, from all of which combination and conspiracy is the reasonable, if not required, conclusion.

The petitioners finally contend that various findings of agreement among them as to the means and methods used to accomplish the total combination and conspiracy are not supported by the evidence. It is these several activities, used for the purpose of continuing the petitioners' combination and conspiracy to fix prices, which are prohibited in the Commission's order. Without setting out all of these findings, let us examine several pertinent ones to see if there is substantial evidence to support them. The Commission found that the corporate petitioners by agreement adopted so-called trade customs in 1933, when such adoption was legal by virtue of the N. R. A. These trade customs included price differentials for coated and uncoated paper, according to size, weight, and packaging. The Commission found further that these trade customs were revised and expanded by means of agreement in 1936, after the N. R. A. period, and that they have been and are in general use. To support this finding, without going into detail, are the minutes of the Association and the testimony of witnesses, manifestly capable of supporting a finding of collusion and agreement.

The Commission further found that the zoning system was continued after the N. R. A. by mutual understanding and consent, and that despite minor variations it is in general use. This finding is based in part upon the minutes of the Association and also on the testimony of a witness to the effect that it had been continued by mutual consent. "We think the artificiality and arbitrariness of the zone structure is so apparent it cannot withstand the inference of agreement." Fort Howard Paper Co. et al. v. F. T. C., supra, at p. 907.

The Commission found that uniform quantity discounts had been adopted concertedly, were in general use with variations, and were continued by agreement. This is based in part and sufficiently on minutes of the Association and inferences therefrom.

The Commission found that there was uniform though sealed bidding to the United States Government Printing Office, and that this was the result of agreement. This finding is buttressed by correspondence, the testimony of petitioner Allied's merchant-agent whose price cutting resulted in the petitioners' refusal to fill the order he had obtained, and the testimony of the Director of Purchases of the Government Printing Office.

The evidence with sufficient clarity involves all petitioners, although, of course, various items of evidence pertain to various petitioners. The respective petitioners are not relieved from liability as conspirators merely because they all did not take part in the same acts. American Tobacco Co. et al. v. U. S., supra, p. 119.

Here the petitioners are proved to have agreed upon these factors: uniform quantity discounts, uniform finishing differentials, uniform base prices, and a uniform zoning system with uniform zone differentials, all without regard to a particular petitioner's costs of production and distribution. The pattern clearly provides a means of fixing uniform prices. The petitioners' temporary departure from their system or temporary inability to carry through their purpose does not affect its illegality. The petitioners' degree of success in stifling price competition is not the measure of their liability.

[No Substantial Evidence to Support Findings as to One Petitioner]

It remains to consider whether there is substantial evidence to support the findings as to petitioner Consolidated. Consolidated contends, and the Commission does not deny, that because of inexpensive manufacturing by use of its patented process, it was able to sell its coated papers within the price range of the other corporate petitioners' uncoated papers. It contends, and the Commission does not deny, that it entered into such competition sharply, taking full advantage of its manifest competitive opportunity. Because of the unusual manufacture and composition of Consolidated's coated papers, there was a prejudice against them, and this further dictated selling at prices sharply undercutting those of the other petitioners' coated papers. Despite this, the Commission seeks to uphold its findings as to Consolidated on the basis of the following evidence. We, of course, look only to it to see its substantiality and do not consider Consolidated's evidence or weigh the evidence.

Consolidated was a member of the Association, but the Commission expressly disclaims any contention of guilt by mere association. There is the testimony of witness Mead to the effect that the other petitioners offered their coated papers in competition with Consolidated's coated paper during 1937. Mead further testified that during the period from June 1935 to April 1939, there were thirteen price changes of its coated paper by Consolidated, two of which were made at the same time as another company in the industry made a similar change on both its coated and uncoated paper.

Mead also testified that Consolidated in many respects applied the industry's trade customs for uncoated paper in regard to Consolidated's coated paper, although its costs might be greater as to finishing differentials, and its price lists so stated. Moreover, Consolidated trimmed four sides of its higher grades of coated paper without an additional penalty, as was done by the other petitioners with their coated paper.

Finally, the Commission relies on the fact that although Consolidated used a zoning system, which divided into two parts the area in the other petitioners' Zone 1 (where 95 per cent of Consolidated's output was sold) it did not vary its delivered prices accordingly from time to time during the complaint period.

Consolidated's scheme was to compete with the other petitioners by offering its coated paper within the other petitioners' uncoated paper price ranges. In doing this, it adopted the latters' trade customs for uncoated paper—to meet competition. Incidental facts, such as the two coincident price changes and its varying from its own zoning system, cannot make out the pattern of conspiracy found. Without referring again in detail to the finding of a total combination and conspiracy and the findings of the several agreements and concerted activities of the petitioners, it is clear to us that this evidence is not substantial, and we hold that the findings as to Consolidated cannot be sustained.

[Ruling]

The order to cease and desist as to all the petitioners but Consolidated is supported by the evidence and the findings and will be enforced; as to Consolidated, it must be vacated.

It is so ordered.

[¶ 62,264] United States v. Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Association.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Cr. 294-48. April 27, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Indictment—Motion to Dismiss—Failure to Set Forth Sufficient Facts.—An indictment charging a conspiracy to fix prices and restrain trade in milk in violation of the Sherman Act is dismissed. It is held that the indictment does not set forth sufficient facts to constitute a conspiracy in violation of Section 3 of the Act.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1630.225, and Department of Justice comment, ¶ 61,111.

[Motion to Dismiss]

Per Curiam: The motion to dismiss is in two parts; one, that it is duplications [sic] and the other, that the indictment is bad in substance.

[Crime Not Charged]

The Court holds that the indictment is not duplications [sic]. As to the second ground, namely, that this indictment does not charge a crime, the Court grants the motion to dismiss, believing that there has been a failure to set forth sufficient facts.

[Insufficient Facts]

In doing this, I am not holding that the Sherman Act would not under any circumstances be applicable to a case involving a cooperative. I recognize and subscribe—as I must—to the determination in the Borden case, which holds that cooperatives are not exempt from the Sherman Act. I merely hold that the indictment in this case does not set forth sufficient facts to constitute a conspiracy in violation of Section 3 of the Sherman Act, in the view that I take of that Act and other Acts referred to in argument and judicial precedents presented.

[¶ 62,265] United States v. National Association of Real Estate Boards and Washington Real Estate Board.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Criminal Action No. 950-47. June 4, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Conspiracy to Fix Brokers' Commissions—Personal Services—No Direct Relation to Interstate Commerce.—The charges or commissions of a real estate broker in the District of Columbia are based on personal services, and do not have a direct effect upon interstate trade or commerce in the District of Columbia. Defendants in a criminal action charging a combination and conspiracy to fix the commissions of real estate brokers are acquitted. It is held that where the subject matter of an agreement does not relate to interstate commerce in the District of Columbia, and where the undisputed facts clearly show that the purpose of the agreement was not to regulate, obstruct or restrain commerce, but was entered into with the object of properly and fairly regulating the transaction of the business in which the parties to the agreement were engaged, such agreement will be upheld. Agreements to regulate the rate of commission to be paid for personal services of real estate brokers in the District of Columbia, standing alone, have never been held to be agreements in restraint of trade, and it is only when connected with other conduct or actions that they come within the purview of the Sherman Act. The mere filing of a rate of commission for real estate brokers for personal services rendered as an aid to property owners in the District of Columbia is not per se an unreasonable restraint.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1220.194.

For plaintiff: Victor H. Kramer, Joseph P. Kelly, Jr., Herbert N. Maletz, C. Heyward Belser.

For defendants: Roger J. Whiteford, John J. Wilson, Jo V. Morgan, Jr.; William E. Leahy, William J. Hughes, Jr.

Opinion

CURRAN, J.: Last Tuesday and Wednesday there was argued before this Court two motions for judgments of acquittal; one made by the National Association of Real Estate Boards and one made by the Washington Real Estate Board, two co-defendants in this suit brought by the United States against the two defendants, in the form of an indictment, charging both of the defendants with a conspiracy between themselves and co-conspirators not named, in violation of Section 3 of the Sherman Antitrust Law.

Authorities have been presented very capably by counsel on both sides in this matter, and have been of great assistance to the Court in coming to a conclusion.

[Issue]

As I see it, the question here is: What is the nature of the business of the defendants, that is, the National Association of Real Estate Boards and the Washington Real Estate Board and its members, and are the constitutions, the by-laws and the Codes of Ethics or any subdivision thereof, in their direct effect in restraint of trade or commerce in the District of Columbia? Is the business of the defendants interstate commerce in the sense of that word as it has been used and understood in the decisions of the Courts, or is it a business which is an aid or facility to commerce and which, if it affects interstate commerce thereon in the District of Columbia, does so only in an indirect and incidental manner?

[Facts]

The facts of the matter are that the defendants, who are real estate men, have entered into voluntary associations for the purpose of bettering the conduct of their business, and after entering such associations they still continue their individual businesses in full competition with each other, and that the associations themselves, as associations, do no business whatever, but are simply a means by and through which the individual members who have become thus associated are the better enabled to transact their business; to maintain and uphold it in the proper way; and to create methods of preserving integrity amongst the members of the association.

[Broker's Charges]

In my view the charges of a real estate broker on account of his personal services are nothing more than charges for aids or facilities furnished to clients whereby their objects may be the more easily and readily accomplished. It is my view that charges or commissions of real estate brokers in the District of Columbia are based on personal services performed for clients, and their effect in the sale of real estate are not directly connected with or form a part of interstate commerce in the District of Columbia, because I feel that charges for services of this character and nature do not immediately touch upon or act upon nor do they directly affect the sale of real estate in the District of Columbia.

Of course indirectly and as an incident they may enhance the cost to the owner of real estate, or they may add to the price paid by the purchaser, but they are not, in my opinion, charges which are directly laid upon real estate itself. Rather are they charges for facilities given or provided to clients in the course of the sale of real estate.

[Not Restraints on Trade]

Here in this case the conspiracy condemned by the statute is one whose direct and immediate effect is a restraint upon trade or commerce in the District of Columbia. As I say, charges for such facilities, in my opinion, are not restraints upon the trade or commerce, although, as I have indicated, the total cost of selling the real estate may be increased.

The right of the owners of real estate in the District of Columbia to sell their own property in any way whatever is not affected or touched by the agreement in question, while the privilege of having their property sold for the real owner, with the aid of a broker, is a privilege which they are charged for and which is not attached to their right to sell their own property.

If charges of the nature that I have mentioned do not amount to a regulation of interstate trade or commerce in the District of Columbia because they touch it only in an indirect or remote way, or else because they are in the nature of compensation for privileges as a facility for that trade or commerce, it would for a like reason seem clear that agreements relating to the amounts of such charges among those who furnish the privileges or facilities are not in restraint of that kind of trade. While the indirect effect of the agreements may be to enhance the expense to those engaged in the business, yet as the agreements are in regard to compensation for privileges accorded for services rendered as a facility to commerce or trade, they are not unreasonable or illegal as a restraint thereon; and this is what, in brief, was enunciated by the Hopkins case in 171 U. S.

[Cases Cited]

In other words, where the subject matter of the agreement does not relate to or act upon or embrace interstate commerce in the District of Columbia, and where the undisputed facts clearly show that the purpose of the agreement was not to regulate, obstruct or restrain commerce, but that it was entered into with the object of properly and fairly regulating the transaction of the business in which the parties to the agreement were engaged, such agreement will be upheld, in my view, as not within the statute, where it can be seen that the character and terms of the agreement are well calculated to attain the purpose for which it was formed and where the effect of its formation and enforcement upon interstate trade or commerce in the District of Columbia is in any event but indirect and incidental and not its purpose or object, and so said the Supreme Court of the United States in the Anderson case, 171 U. S.

And I was particularly impressed by the language of the Court in the Duluth case, the Board of Trade case, in 107 Minn. 544 where it was said that when the legality of a particular act is to be tested by whether it violates general statutory prohibitions upon restraints of trade or commerce, courts have given various reasons for their conclusions, and it seems that if any one thing may be said to be the test, it is the effect upon competition. Combinations are not per se illegal any more than are contracts or agreements generally, but when the purpose of either is to destroy competition in trade or commerce, the particular transaction falls within the prohibitions of the anti-trust statute. It does not follow that every contract or combination which in any degree tends to restrict competition is illegal. So strict a rule would invalidate innumerable ordinary business transactions which are unobjectionable and necessary that business shall not completely stagnate. Contracts and combinations which tend to promote business and which only remotely, incidentally and indirectly restrain competition are not forbidden. If the necessary effect of the combination is to stifle or to directly or necessarily restrict free competition it is under the ban of the law whatever may have been the intention of the parties. But if it promotes or but incidentally or indirectly restricts competition, while its main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and to increase the business of those who make it and operate it, then it is not a contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade within the true interpretation of the Act.

[Agreement Not Within Purview of Act]

My view of this case is that agreements to regulate the rate of commission to be paid for personal services to real estate brokers in the District of Columbia standing alone have never been held to be agreements in restraint of trade, and it is only when connected with other contracts or other conduct or other actions that they come within the purview of the Sherman law.

It is common knowledge that competition between real estate brokers is in fact strong, and success in getting the business depends not upon offering to transact for less than the uniform rate but upon the skill and facilities possessed for obtaining the highest price for the property from the purchasers.

There is no fixed price at which sales of property must be made in the District of Columbia.

Says the Court in the Duluth case, it is inconceivable that an agreement which requires all real estate brokers who work on a commission basis and who are members of the Board, to charge the same rate of commission for the same service, can materially affect or control the price at which real estate sells, or at which the article sells. In the Duluth case the article was not real estate. I used that in my own language, paraphrasing the language of the Court in the Duluth case.

Of course in a remote and indirect way every charge and item of expense which attaches to the selling of real property affects to some extent the prices received by the owners and paid by the ultimate purchaser.

I have reviewed the cases and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the Sherman law must have a reasonable construction or else there would be scarcely an agreement or contract among business men that could not be said to have, indirectly or remotely, some bearing upon interstate commerce and with the possibility of a restraint thereon.

Counsel have conceded that in this case there must be an unreasonable restraint, but I am not convinced that the mere filing of a rate of commission for real estate brokers, for personal services rendered as an aid or facility to the owner of property in the District of Columbia, standing alone and with no other action or conduct, is per se an unreasonable restraint.

[Judgments of Acquittal Granted]

For these reasons and because of the authority that appeals to me in the Hopkins and Anderson cases, and in the Duluth case in Minnesota, the motions of the defendants for judgments of acquittal in this case are granted.

New Hampshire Supreme Court. No. 3737. June 1, 1948.

New Hampshire Unfair Sales Act

Sales Below Cost—Prima Facie Evidence of Violation—Constitutionality of Act.— The New Hampshire Unfair Sales Act, enacted for the purpose of protecting free and fair competition in the trades and industries against monopolies or other unfair practices, is within the power of the state legislature granted to it by the state constitution. Its wisdom, effectiveness and economic desirability are not judicial questions. A motion to dismiss a bill in equity to enjoin a retailer from advertising and selling cigarettes at a price which did not include the statutory mark-up, is discharged.

See the New Hampshire Unfair Sales Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8548.

For plaintiff: Ernest D. D'Amour, Attorney-General; Gordon M. Tiffany, Assistant Attorney-General.

For defendant: Thomas L. Marble and Morse & Grant.

[Statement of Facts]

Bill in equity, brought by the director of the tobacco products division of the State Tax Commission by virtue of the authority conferred upon him by section 14 of chapter 133 of the Laws of 1947, to enjoin the defendant from advertising the sale of cigarettes and selling the same in violation of chapter 204 of the Revised Laws entitled "The Unfair Sales Act."

The plaintiff's evidence established the following facts:

The Army and Navy Store of Concord, is a trade name duly registered with the Secretary of State and adopted by Lewis and Sons, Inc., (joined herein as a party defendant), a New Hampshire corporation of which Louis Borofsky is the treasurer and a director. The store is engaged in selling at retail general merchandise, clothing, wearing apparel, boots and shoes, household products, and tobacco.

On July 8, 1947, the store advertised in the usual course of business in the Concord Daily Monitor, that it offered for sale popular brands of cigarettes for $1.62 a carton, and on that date in the normal course of business it in fact sold such a brand, namely Chesterfields, for that price, as had been its practice for some months prior thereto. These cigarettes were purchased by the Army and Navy Store for $1.58 a carton. This purchase price of $1.58 a carton included all taxes (federal and state) on the cigarettes in question. The selling price of $1.62 did not include the "mark-up" of six per cent of the total cost at the retail outlet," as required by section 1 of the Unfair Sales Act.

The defendants moved to dismiss the bill on the ground that chapter 204 of the Revised Laws is arbitrary, unreasonable, and oppressive and contravenes both the State and Federal Constitution.

It was stipulated by the parties hereto that further sales of cigarettes by the defendants would not be below the cost to the retailer as that cost is computed by the plaintiff and that the plaintiff would refrain from pursuing further the remedy of injunction pending a determination of the questions of constitutionality herein raised.

All questions of law raised by the defendants' motion were reserved and transferred without a ruling by Wheeler, J.

[Issue]

KENNISON, J. This case presents the constitutionality of the Unfair Sales Act. (R. L., c. 204) as applied to the agreed statement of facts quoted above. In preliminary summary the acts makes it a misdemeanor for any retailer or wholesaler, "with intent, or effect, or injuring competitors or destroying competition," to advertise or sell merchandise at less than cost as defined in the Act. The advertisement or sale at less than such cost "shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this chapter." (S. 2). The statutory base for determining "cost to the retailer" is invoice cost or replacement cost, whichever is lower, less trade discounts to which is added freight and cartage charges and "a mark-up, to cover in part the cost of doing business, which mark-up, in the absence of a proof of a lesser cost, shall be six per cent of the total cost at the retail outlet" (S. 1 (I)). Numerous exceptions are made by the act (S. 3) so that it does not apply under stated conditions to isolated transactions, clearance sales, perishable merchandise, imperfect or damaged merchandise, final liquidation sales, sales to relief agencies and for charities, sales to state or municipal agencies, sales in good faith to meet legal competition or sales under court order. The Act also provides that violations may be enjoined by the Superior Court (S. 4).

[Legislative History]

The legislative history of the Act begins in 1939 when an unsuccessful attempt was made to obtain an advisory opinion as to its constitutionality. Opinion of the Justices, 90 N. H. 567. At the next session the Act was enacted into law (Laws 1941, c. 92) and was reenacted in the Revised Laws without substantial change in its present form.

[Statutes Construed]

It is urged specifically that section 2 which prohibits the sale of merchandise below cost with the "effect of injuring competitors or destroying competition" is unconstitutional because it is unduly oppressive and contrary to accepted economic and social standards. Loughran Co. v. Company, 178 Md. 38. Similar phraseology is found in several of the Unfair Sales Acts of the other states. I. Callmann, Unfair Competition & Trade Marks (1945) s. 27, 2 (a). It is well settled in this jurisdiction that the Legislature may declare an act criminal without requiring that it be done with intent. State v. Cornish, 66 N. H. 329; State v. Ryan, 70 N. H. 196; State v. Goonan, 89 N. H. 528; State v. Yosua, 91 N. H. 181. In case of doubt the statute has frequently been construed to require intent (Coutremarsh v. Metcalf, 87 N. H. 127) but it is clear that the present statute by its express terms requires either the intent or the effect of injuring or destroying competition. The Legislature deemed it necessary to do more than condemn a state of mind and provided that sales below cost, except as provided in s. 3, are an economic evil whether they are intended or have the effect of injuring competition. Such a statute is valid. McElhone v. Geror, 207 Minn. 580; Rust v. Griggs, 172 Tenn. 565. Cf. Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 324 U. S. 726; State v. Tanker Gas, Inc., 250 Wis. 218.

[Prima Facie Evidence of Unfair Competition]

That part of section 2 providing that advertisements or sales below cost are prima facie evidence of a violation of the Act is also attacked. Since no conclusive presumption of guilt is created, Wigmore sees no constitutional problem. 4 Wigmore Evidence (3d ed) s. 1356. So long as there is a rational connection between the fact to be proved and the fact presumed, the statute is valid. State v. Bozek, 81 N. H. 277; 162 A. L. R. 495, 532. This is particularly so in this jurisdiction since "prima facie evidence, as here used, means evidence to be considered by the jury" (State v.

Lapointe, 81 N. H. 227, 239), and in the absence of other evidence does not compel a verdict of guilty. State v. Langley, 92 N. H. 136. The constituent elements that make up "cost to the retailer" are peculiarly within the knowledge of the retailer as are the facts which bring him within the exceptions to the Act in section 3. In view of the limited effect given to prima facie evidence in this jurisdiction, we cannot say that its application to unfair competition is unreasonable. Competition may be destroyed or injured by deceptive trade practices, discrimination, and unfair competition as well as by combinations and monopolies. They are closely interrelated and we have been informed recently that the Legislative branch of the government has a wide latitude in establishing effective and even duplicating methods of preventing these asserted economic evils. See, Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Company 333 U. S. (decided May 3, 1948), Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U. S. — (decided April 26, 1948).

[Meeting Competition]

One of the exceptions to the Act is "where the price of merchandise is made in good faith to meet legal competition" s. 3 (h). If this required the retailer to examine his competitors' books to ascertain whether the competition was legal, it would be of doubtful validity. Commonwealth v. Zasloff, 338 Pa. 457, 465. All that is required of the retailer, however, is an endeavor "in good faith" to meet the legal prices of his competitor. People v. Pay Less Drug Store, 25 Cal. (2d) 108.

["Cost to the Retailer"]

The term "cost to the retailer" the statute provides "shall mean bona fide costs" s. 1 (IV). This is proper. However, the rest of this paragraph states that in computing replacement cost, a cost calculation based on sales or purchases "which cannot be justified by existing market conditions within the state" is disallowed. The indefiniteness and uncertainty of this latter provision renders it invalid. State v. Walgreen Drug Co., 57 Ariz. The Maryland Act, formerly defective in part for this reason, was amended to remove this defect and upheld. Blum v. Engelman, (Md.) 57 A. (2d) 421. Since this invalid provision is separable, the remainder of the Act "shall not be affected thereby." R. L., c. 204, s. 6.

While s. 1. (I) contains meticulous detail of the items in "cost to the retailer," the defendants complain that there is no guide to determine "a lesser cost" than the mark-up of "six percent of the total cost at the retail outlet" s. 1. (I. 3). As the Act now stands the doubt or ambiguity should be resolved in favor of the defendant. If this places a temporary obstacle to the effective enforcement of the Act, it is a defect inherent in the statute and not one manufactured by the judiciary. The flexibility of cost accounting procedures makes the determination of cost a difficult one but the defendant is entitled to offset its benefits against its detriments. The determination of cost must not be in "bad faith" (Dikeon v. Ford Distributors Ass'n, 107 Colo. 38) and it will suffice if it complies with the standard of "what business men generally mean [by cost] arrived at by a reasonable rule." State v. Langley, 53 Wyo. 332, 365.

[Constitutionality Upheld]

In 1903 Art. 83 of the Constitution was revised. The Legislature was given the authority of the state to protect "free and fair competition in the trades and industries" against monopolies "or any other unfair means." Such is the avowed purpose of unfair sales statutes although there is much controversy whether they are adapted to accomplish that aim or in fact do so. There are some indications, at least in New England, that the statutes are used by the large sellers against the small sellers to prevent local price cutting rather than protecting the small seller against a concerted campaign of underselling by the larger units. U. S. v. N. Y. Great A. & P. Tea Co., 67 F. Supp. 626; 57 Yale L. J. 391, 419 (1948). The vast amount of literature on this subject attests to its controversial nature both economic and legal. More than half of the statutes have similar legislation and, as a result of amendments, a majority of such statutes are considered constitutional. 118 A. L. R. 506; 128 A. L. R. 1126; Blum v. Engelman. (Md.) supra. The expediency and wisdom of such Legislature in matters of opinion "upon points of . . . expediency." State v. Moore, 91 N. H. 16, 21. Since the enactment of Unfair Sales Acts is within the power of the Legislature granted to it by the Constitution, its wisdom, effectiveness and economic desirability is not a judicial question.

In the New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department. No. 1047. June 21, 1948.

Appeal from an order of the Supreme Court, New York County, granting defendant's motion to dismiss the amended complaint as insufficient in law.

New York Fair Trade Act

Resale Price Maintenance—Sales Agent May Designate Prices—Complaint Sufficient in Law.—The exclusive sales agent for alcoholic beverages in a state, whose predecessor and assignor was authorized by the distiller to fix minimum resale prices and enter into agreements with retailers in that state pursuant to the provisions of the New York Fair Trade Act, may enjoin violation of such an agreement by a retailer. An order granting defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint for insufficiency on the ground that only the owner of the brand name business, and not an exclusive sales agent, may designate resale prices is reversed. No such limitation is expressed in the statute or implicit in its purpose.

See the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.25, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7175.

For plaintiff: Horace S. Manges, Jacob F. Raskin, Weil, Gotshal & Manges.

For defendant: Julian Jawitz.

[Nature of Action]

Per Curiam: The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the exclusive sales agent for the State of New York of alcoholic beverages produced by the distiller under brand names; that plaintiff's predecessor and assignor was authorized by the distiller to fix minimum resale prices and enter into agreement with retailers in the State of New York pursuant to the New York Fair Trade Act; that plaintiff's predecessor and assignor entered into such an agreement with defendant, which agreement is still in full force and effect; that plaintiff has been authorized by the distiller to fix minimum resale prices and enter into agreements with retailers in the State of New York pursuant to the New York Fair Trade Act, and to take all measures necessary to enforce pre-existing agreements. The complaint asks that defendant be enjoined from selling the beverages involved at less than the minimum retail prices stipulated.

The court at Special Term granted defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint for insufficiency on the ground that only the owner of the brand name business, and not an exclusive sales agent, may designate resale prices under the Fair Trade Law.

We do not read the statute as being so limited in its contemplation. No such limitation is expressed in the statute or implicit in its purpose. We think that an exclusive sales agent, authorized by the owner, is entitled under the law to designate resale prices and exercise the authority granted by the law. The complaint here is substantially similar to the complaint in Bourjois Sales Corporation v. Dorfman, 273 N. Y. 167, and is sufficient.

The order appealed from should be reversed with $20 costs and disbursements to the appellant and the motion denied, with leave to the defendant to answer within ten days after service of order with notice of entry thereof, on payment of said costs.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Sale or Lease of Machinery—Patent Licensing.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging violations of the antitrust laws by a manufacturer of closures for glass jars and containers and of sealing machinery, enjoins the defendant from leasing or selling sealing machinery on condition that the lessee or purchaser purchase closures only from defendant, and in specified quantities; conditioning the availability of sealing machinery or parts thereof upon the procurement of closures from defendant or any other designated source; removing sealing machinery from the premises of any lessee thereof because such lessee uses closures or machinery manufactured or sold by any person other than the defendant; altering or changing sealing machinery in such a manner as to prevent the use therein of closures manufactured or sold by others, unless such alteration improves the operation efficiency of the machine; altering or changing closures in such a manner as to prevent the use in connection therewith of sealing machinery manufactured or sold by others, unless the change results in more efficient operation; conditioning any license or immunity to practice any invention relating to sealing machinery or closures by the tying of any such license or immunity to the purchase or procurement of machinery or closures from defendant or any other designated source; and instituting or maintaining any suit for royalties alleged to have accrued prior to the date of this judgment under any existing machine patent as herein defined. Defendant is ordered and directed to grant to each applicant therefor a non-exclusive license to make, use and vend machines under all existing machine patents as herein defined.

Final Judgment

The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on May 14, 1946; defendant, White Cap Company, a corporation, having appeared and filed its answer to said complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof and asserting its innocence of any violation of law; and the plaintiff and said defendant by their respective attorneys having consented to the entry of this final judgment herein without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein;

Now, Therefore, before the taking of any testimony and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party in respect to any such issue and upon the consent of the parties hereto, it is hereby ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, as follows:

[Jurisdiction; Cause of Action]

I.

This court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties to this judgment; the complaint states a cause of action against defendant, White Cap Company, under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," said Act being commonly known as the "Sherman Act" and under Section 3 of the Act of Congress of October 15, 1914, as amended, entitled "An Act to Supplement Existing Laws Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies and for Other Purposes," said Act being commonly known as the "Clayton Act."

[Terms Defined]

II.

When used in this final judgment, the following terms have the meanings assigned respectively to them below:

(a) "White Cap" means the defendant, White Cap Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, having its principal office at Chicago, Illinois.

(b) "Closures" means caps for glass jars and containers suitable for vacuum packing.

(c) "Sealing Machinery" means machinery and accessories suitable for applying closures to glass jars and containers for vacuum packing.

(d) "Existing machine patents" means all presently issued United States letters patent, applications for letters patent, and patents on such applications, owned or controlled by defendant, White Cap Company, or under which it has power to issue licenses or sublicenses, relating to sealing machinery, consisting of the following numbered United States patents:

1,801,062	2,132,335
1,875,789	2,158,675
1,920,539	2,169,973
1,931,911	2,173,602
2,041,891	2,319,213
2,057,464	2,319,214
2,076,052	2,337,032
2,103,051	2,337,033
2,107,237	2,347,668
	2,361,948

and the following numbered applications for United States patents:—

769,624	544,305
483,568

and renewals, reissues, divisions and extensions thereof.

[Applicability of Judgment]

III.

The provisions of this judgment applicable to defendant, White Cap Company, shall apply to each of its subsidiaries, successors, and assigns, and to each of its officers, directors, agents, nominees, employees, or any other person acting under, through or for such defendant.

[Acts Enjoined]

IV.

Defendant White Cap is hereby enjoined and restrained from:

A. Leasing, selling, or making or adhering to any contract for the sale or lease of, sealing machinery, whether patented or unpatented, or fixing a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price, on or accompanied by any condition, agreement, or understanding:

(1) That the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not purchase for use in connection with said machinery closures made or sold by any one other than the defendant; or

(2) That the lessee or purchaser shall purchase from the defendant a specified volume, quota, percentage or value of closures.

B. Selling, making or adhering to a contract for the sale of, or otherwise making available closures, whether patented or unpatented, or fixing a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price, on or accompanied by, any condition, agreement, or understanding;

(1) That the purchaser or recipient thereof shall not use said closures in connection with sealing machinery made or sold by any one other than the defendant; or

(2) That the purchaser or recipient thereof shall use such closures, or any specified volume, quota, percentage or value thereof, in sealing machinery made or sold by the defendant.

C. Entering into, adopting, adhering to, or furthering any agreement or course of conduct for the purpose of, or which in effect constitutes, the leasing, selling, or making or adhering to a contract contrary to the provisions of sub-paragraphs A and B above.

D. Conditioning the availability of sealing machinery or parts or repairs thereof upon the procurement of closures from the defendant White Cap Company or any other designated source, or the availability of closures or services in connection therewith upon the procurement of sealing machinery from the defendant White Cap Company or any other designated source.

E. Removing sealing machinery from the premises of any lessee thereof because such lessee purchases, uses, or deals in closures or sealing machinery manufactured or sold by any person other than the defendant.

F. Altering or changing sealing machinery or utilizing patents on such alterations or changes, in such a manner as to prevent the use therein of closures manufactured or sold by anyone other than the defendant, provided, however, that this subsection F shall not apply if the alteration or change improves the operation or efficiency of the machine in applying any closure made by the defendant.

G. Altering or changing closures, or utilizing patents on such alterations or changes, in such a manner as to prevent the use in connection therewith of sealing machinery manufactured or sold by any one other than the defendant, provided, however, that this subsection G shall not apply if the alteration or change results in more efficient operation.

H. Conditioning any license or immunity, expressed or implied, to practice any invention related to sealing machinery or to closures claimed in any United States patent by the tying of any license or immunity for such invention to the purchase or procurement of machinery, closures, or any similar product or article from the defendant White Cap Company or any other designated source.

I. Instituting or threatening to institute or maintaining any suit, counter-claim or proceeding, judicial or administrative, for infringement, or to collect charges, damages, compensation or royalties, alleged to have occurred or accrued prior to the date of this judgment under any existing machine patent, as defined in Section II(d) of this judgment.

[Licensing Required]

V.

A. Defendant White Cap is hereby ordered and directed to grant to each applicant therefor a non-exclusive license to make, use, and vend under any, some, or all existing machine patents as herein defined, and is hereby enjoined and restrained from making any sale or other disposition of any of said patents which deprives it of the power or authority to grant such licenses, unless it sells, transfers or assigns such patents and requires, as a condition of such sale, transfer or assignment, that the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall observe the requirements of Sections IV and V of this judgment and the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall file with this Court, prior to consummation of said transaction, an undertaking to be bound by the provisions of said Sections IV and V of this judgment.

B. Defendant White Cap is hereby enjoined and restrained from including any restriction or condition whatsoever in any license or sublicense granted by it pursuant to the provisions of this section except that (1) the license may be non-transferable; (2) a reasonable nondiscriminatory royalty may be charged; (3) reasonable provision may be made for periodic inspection of the books and records of the licensee, by an independent auditor or any person acceptable to the licensee, who shall report to the licensor only the amount of the royalty due and payable; (4) reasonable provision may be made for cancellation of the license upon failure of the licensee to pay the royalties or to permit the inspection of his books and records as hereinabove provided; (5) the license must provide that the licensee may cancel the license at any time after one year from the initial date thereof by giving thirty days' notice in writing to the licensor.

C. Upon receipt of written request for a license under the provisions of this section, defendant White Cap shall advise the applicant in writing of the royalty which it deems reasonable for the patent or patents to which the request pertains. If the parties are unable to agree upon a reasonable royalty within sixty (60) days from the date such request for the license was received by White Cap, the applicant therefor may forthwith apply to this Court for the determination of a reasonable royalty, and White Cap shall, upon receipt of notice of the filing of such application, promptly give notice thereof to the Attorney General. In any such proceeding, the burden of proof shall be on White Cap to establish the reasonableness of the royalty requested by it, and the reasonable royalty rates, if any, determined by the Court shall apply to the applicant and all other licensees under the same patent or patents. Pending the completion of negotiations or any such proceeding, the applicant shall have the right to make, use and vend under the patents to which his application pertains without payment of royalty or other compensation, but subject to the provisions of subsection D of this section.

D. Where the applicant has the right to make, use, and vend under subsection C of this section, defendant White Cap may apply to the Court to fix an interim royalty rate pending final determination of what constitutes a reasonable royalty, if any. If the Court fixes such interim royalty rate, White Cap shall then issue and the applicant shall accept a license, or, as the case may be, a sublicense, providing for the periodic payment of royalties at such interim rate from the date of the filing of such application by the applicant. If the applicant fails to accept such license or fails to pay the interim royalty in accordance therewith, such action shall be ground for the dismissal of his application. Where an interim license or sublicense has been issued pursuant to this subsection, reasonable royalty rates, if any, as finally determined by the Court shall be retroactive for the applicant and all other licensees under the same patents to the date the applicant files his application with the Court.

E. Nothing herein shall prevent any applicant from attacking, in the aforesaid proceedings or in any other controversy, the validity or scope of any of the patents nor shall this judgment be construed as importing any validity or value to any of said patents.

[Laws Applicable]

VI.

Nothing in this judgment shall prevent defendant, White Cap, from availing itself of the benefits of (A) the Act of Congress of April 10, 1918, commonly called the Webb-Pomerene Act, (B) the Act of Congress of 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings proviso to Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," or (C) save as elsewhere in this judgment provided of the patent laws.

[Inspection to Secure Compliance]

VII.

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to defendant, White Cap, made to its principal office, be permitted subject to any legally recognized privileges: (1) access during the office hours of said defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of said defendant relating to any matters contained in this judgment; and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of said defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means provided in this paragraph shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

VIII.

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment, for the amendment, modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

Sherman Antitrust Act, Clayton Antitrust Act

Contracts in Restraint of Trade—Effect of Columbia Steel Case—Motion for Reconsideration Denied.—The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Columbia Steel case (¶ 62,260) that the proposed merger of steel companies would not violate the Sherman Act, there being no probability of a restraining effect upon interstate commerce, does not require a reconsideration of the instant case, in which it was originally held that exclusive dealing contracts between a major oil company and independent service station operators violated the antitrust laws (¶ 62,261). In the instant case it was proved that the challenged practices have in fact resulted in denying to the independent operators free dealing in certain commodities. The Motion to Reconsider

YANKWICH, D. J.: On the same day on which the opinion in this case was filed, June 7, 1948, the Supreme Court decided United States v. Columbia Steel Company, et al.[1] On June 16, 1948, the defendants in this case filed a notice of motion for "reopening, reargument and reconsideration". This was followed by the motion itself, which, originally noticed for June 28, 1948, was advanced to, and actually made, on June 24, 1948, and submitted. It seeks a decision, findings and judgment in favor of the defendants.

I doubt if a motion of this character, which is akin to the motion for "another and different judgment" under California practice,[2] can be entertained in our court, either before or after formal findings and judgment are filed. However, neither in the case in which I expressed such doubt[3] nor in a more recent case in which a similar motion was made,[4] did I allow this to stand in the way of determining the motion on the merits. Nor will I do so now. For I grant that a judge may, at any time before finality attaches to his decision, change his views on the law of a case or the conclusions to be reached as to a controversy or a specific phase of it.[5] More, it would be the imperative duty of any judge of a lower court to give effect to a decision of the highest court of the land, announced subsequent to, or simultaneously with, his decision, and which called for a modification of his views. And such action would be obligatory, whether the higher court spoke with unanimity or was divided, or even if the judge agreed with the minority opinion. When such a siutation confronted me several years ago, I wrote:

> "I feel compelled by this decision to hold that the new enactment, Chapter 10, of the Bankruptcy Act in so far as it applies to irrigation districts of the type of the petitioner, is constitutionally vulnerable, as was the old. As a student, exercising private judgment, I agree with the conclusion of the dissenters that immunity from interference through federal bankruptcy laws, even if applicable to states, should not be extended to state instrumentalities, whether they be municipal, quasi-municipal or public corporations. However, as a judge of a lower court, I cannot exercise private judgment, but must follow the opinion of the majority, which, as I read it, extends the immunity to all governmental agencies created by a state for the performance of public functions."[6]

Counsel for the defendants who are, no doubt, familiar with our practice in this respect, have assumed that I would hear the motion on the merits. For, in addition to referring to cases which recognize the right of a court to reconsider its decision[7], they filed simultaneously a twenty-page printed memorandum, the aim of which is to show "that the decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. Columbia Steel Company, requires a decision in favor of the defendants."

Hence the notice, the brief and the motion itself, which is now before me for decision, all call for a determination of the question propounded by the defendants whether the decision referred to commands a ruling in the present case in favor of the defendants.

II

The Scope of United States v. Columbia Steel Co.

I am of the view that it does not call for a different conclusion than that announced on June 7, 1948. At the outset, I advert to the fact that the range of the ruling I made is not to be determined by the arguments which the Government advanced, but by what was actually decided. The facts that in the Columbia Steel Company case the Government may have made arguments similar to those made in this case loses all significance, if, in fact, my ruling was contrary to the contention. To illustrate: The Government, in the present case, contended that the exclusive supply provision in the Standard contracts was illegal per se. I declined to so hold. On the contrary, I ruled that it was illegal only if it resulted in an unreasonable restraint under the Sherman Act or in substantial lessening of competition under the Clayton Act.[8] I wrote:

"As I understand the pleadings, and the Government's position at the beginning of the trial, a judgment is sought decreeing that the clause in the contracts which, by its language and actual effect, as shown by the evidence, restricts the stations not employe-operated to the sale and use of petroleum products and accessories produced or supplied by Standard is illegal per se. We cannot agree. To the contrary, as we read the cases, exclusiveness of outlet is not, in itself, illegal. It becomes illegal only if it result in a substantial lessening of competition or the creation of monopoly in the line of commerce."[9]

The Supreme Court in the Columbia Steel Co. case, interprets its own prior decisions, and especially the Yellow Cab decision,[10] in the same manner. Mr. Justice Reed, after referring to the Government's contention that such contracts are illegal per se, says:

"We do not construe our holding in the Yellow Cab case to make illegal the acquisition by United States Steel of this outlet for its rolled steel without consideration of its effect on the opportunities of other competitor producers to market their rilled steel. In discussing the charge in the Yellow Cab case, we said that the fact that the conspirators were integrated did not insulate them from the act, not that corporate integration violated the act. In the complaint the government charged that the defendants had combined and conspired to effect the restraints in question with the intent and purpose of monopolizing the cab business in certain cities, and on motion to dismiss that allegation was accepted as true. Where a complaint charges such an unreasonable restraint as the facts of the Yellow Cab case show, the amount of interstate trade affected is immaterial in determining whether a violation of the Sherman Act has been charged."[11]

And even the adoption of the Government's contention by a lower court in one case and its rejection in another by a higher court does not, necessarily, mean that the facts in both cases call for the same decision.

III

The Grounds of the Columbia Steel Co. Decision

Unlike the present case which charged violation of both the Sherman and Clayton Acts, the Columbia Steel Co. case charged violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act only. The narrow scope of the inquiry in that case appears from this brief statement of the issues with which the opinion begins:

"The United States brings this suit under Sec. 4 of the Sherman Act to enjoin United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries from purchasing the assets of the largest independent steel fabricator on the West Coast on the ground that such acquisition would violate Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The Complaint, filed on February 24, 1947, charged that if the contract of sale between United States Steel and Consolidated Steel Corporation were carried out, competition in the sale of rolled steel products and in fabricated steel products would be restrained, and that the contract indicated an effort on the part of United States Steel to attempt to monopolize the market in fabricated steel products. After a trial before a single judge in the district court, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the government brought the case here by direct appeal. 32 Stat. 823, 15 U. S. C., Sec. 29."[12]

The position of the Government in the case was weakened by the fact that on June 17, 1946, the Attorney General of the United States had approved the sale by the War Assets Administration to the United States Steel Corporation, one of the defendants, of the plant which the Government had constructed, during the war, at Geneva, Utah. The negotiations for the sale of the Consolidated plant began prior to that sale. And the purpose of the Consolidated purchase was, as stated in the opinion, with evident approval:

"to assure a market for plates and shapes produced at Geneva, and Roach testified

[11] United States v. Columbia Steel Co., et al., slip decision pp. 24-25. It is to be observed that Mr. Justice Reed in Footnote No. 17 of the Opinion quoted a portion of the Yellow Cab opinion which laid great stress on the effect of a restraint on commerce in a given area, and which adopted the language in Indiana Farmers Guide Co. v. Prairie Farmer Co., 1934, 293 U. S. 268, 279, which I stressed in the opinion. (See pages 44-45 of my opinion) that Consolidated's purpose was to withdraw the stockholders' equity from the fabrication business with its cyclical fluctuations at a time when a favorable price could be realized." [13]

In effect, the court rules that Consolidated's acquisition would not have any great effect on the market, in view of the fact that its requirements are "an insignificant fraction of the total market—less than ½ of 1 per cent." [14]

The court was also unable to foresee the probability of the continuance of even that limited market if the sale is not completed. Mr. Justice Reed said:

"Whether we accept the government's or Consolidated's figures, however, they are of little value in determining the extent to which West Coast fabricators will purchase rolled steel products in the eastern market in the future since the construction of new plants at Geneva and Fontana and the creation of new basing points on the West Coast presumably give West Coast rolled steel producers a far larger share of the West Coast fabricating market than before the war." [15]

And, finally, the court stressed the fact that the future dealings between Consolidated and United States Steel would be mere incidents of ownership, not illegal per se, and would not transgress the provisions of the Sherman Act. As Mr. Justice Reed put it:

"A subsidiary will in all probability deal only with its parent for goods the parent can furnish. That fact, however, does not make the acquisition invalid. When other elements of Sherman Act violations are present, the fact of corporate relationship is material and can be considered in the determination of whether restraint or attempt to restrain exists. That this is the teaching of the Yellow Cab case is indicated by the following quotation:

'And so in this case, the common ownership and control of the various corporate appellees are impotent to liberate the alleged combination and conspiracy from the impact of the act. The complaint charges that the restraint of interstate trade was not only effected by the combination of the appellees but was the primary object of the combination. The theory of the complaint, to borrow language from United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26, 57, is that "dominating power" over the cab operating companies "was not obtained by normal expansion to meet the demands of a business growing as a result of superior and enterprising management, but by deliberate, calculated purchase for control." If that theory is borne out in this case by the evidence, coupled with proof of an undue restraint of interstate trade, a plain violation of the Act has occurred.' That view is in accord with previous decisions of the Court.

"The legality of the acquisition by United States Steel of a market outlet for its rolled steel through the purchase of the manufacturing facilities of Consolidated depends not merely upon the fact of that acquired control but also upon many other factors. Exclusive dealings for rolled steel between Consolidated and United States Steel, brought about by vertical integration or otherwise, are not illegal at any rate until the effect of such control is to unreasonably restrict the opportunities of competitors to market their product." [16]

The position of the Court was summed up in this language:

"We conclude that the so-called vertical integration resulting from the acquisition of Consolidated does not unreasonably restrict the opportunities of the competitor producers of rolled steel to market their product. We accept as the relevant competitive market the total demand for rolled steel products in the eleven-state area; over the past ten years Consolidated has accounted for only 3% of that demand, and if expectations as to the development of the western steel industry are realized, Consolidated's proportion may be expected to be lower than that figure in the future. Nor can we find a specific intent in the present case to accomplish an unreasonable restraint, for reasons which we discuss under heading III of this opinion." [17]

So, on the whole, it is evident that the decision in Columbia Steel Co. case cannot be given the broad scope which the defendants claim for it. It is canalized in the narrow channel which the facts in the case established. The court did not have before it any established facts from which to determine the effect which such acquisition might have on future dealings with the acquired company in certain steel products. And there being no probability of restraining effect on interstate commerce, the court found no violation of the Sherman Act.

The minority opinion lends support to this view of the case. The majority declined to see violation in size resulting from permissible concentration of ownership. They required deleterious effects on commerce, in addition, before refusing sanction to the purchase. These they could not find or foresee. The minority, on the contrary, would have found violation in mere bigness.[18]

In the present case, as appears from the original opinion, we are dealing not with probabilities but with actualities. It was proved at the trial that the challenged practices have, in fact, already resulted in denying to the independent operators of stations which are not owned by the defendants, free dealing in certain commodities in interstate commerce and locking out Standard's competitors from these outlets. And, as there are no rights incident to ownership, of the type involved in the contemplated purchase of Consolidated Steel, the conclusions already announced must stand. The motion is denied.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 32-310. Memorandum. April 1, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent Monopoly—Decree Requiring Lease of Machinery—Modification of Decree.—A petition for modification of a decree requiring defendant to lease its patented salt machines, by the insertion of language authorizing defendant to reduce its rentals where necessary to meet competition, is granted where the evidence indicates the existence of such competition in some localities. Modification of the decree by the addition of a provision that defendant shall not be required to lease the devices in a territory where its engineering services are not available is denied. The evidence indicates that the "servicing" is largely a good will gesture to promote the sale of salt. It is the object of the decree to divorce the leasing of machines from the sale of salt.

Memorandum

[Petition for Modification]

RIFKIND, D. J.: Defendant has petitioned for a modification of the decree. In accordance with the suggestion of the Supreme Court, International Salt Co., Inc. v. United States of America, 1947, 332 U. S. 392, proof was received of the circumstances which, in

---

[18] The gist of the dissent is contained in this forceful statement:

"We have here the problem of bigness. Its lesson should by now have been burned into our memory by Brandeis. The Curse of Bigness shows how size can become a menace—both industrial and social. It can be an industrial menace because it creates gross inequalities against existing or putative competitors. It can be a social menace—because of its control of prices. Control of prices in the steel industry is powerful leverage on our economy. For the price of steel determines the price of hundreds of other articles. Our price level determines in large measure whether we have prosperity or depression—an economy of abundance or scarcity. Size in steel should therefore be jealously watched. In final analysis, size in steel is the measure of the power of a handful of men over our economy. That power can be utilized with lightning speed. It can be benign or it can be dangerous. The philosophy of the Sherman Act is that it should not exist. For all power tends to develop into a government in itself. Power that controls the economy should be in the hands of elected representatives of the people, not in the hands of an industrial oligarchy. Industrial power should be decentralized. It should be scattered into many hands so that the fortunes of the people will not be dependent on the whim or caprice, the political prejudices, the emotional stability of a few self-appointed men. The fact that they are not vicious men but respectable and social minded is irrelevant. That is the philosophy and the command of the Sherman Act. It is founded on a theory of hostility to the concentration in private hands of power so great that only a government of the people should have it."

Clearly, the minority, led by Mr. Justice Douglas, would stop large concentrations of ownership because they see in them the possibility of harm to the national economy through price-control and other harmful restrictions to freedom of commerce. The majority, led by Mr. Justice Reed, do not see in consolidation of economic power the unreasonable restraint condemned by the Sherman Act. (15 U. S. C. A., Secs. 1 and 2) To them, that Act does not denounce bigness per se, but only such control, large or small, as results, in fact, in the restrictive or monopolistic evils at which the anti trust law is aimed.

Here, as is obvious from this and the original opinion, the injurious effect on interstate commerce of the restrictions has been shown to exist. More, the present action charges also violation of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. 14) which aims to stop monopolistic practices in their inception. Under it, a violation can be found if the practices tend to achieve the harm condemned by the statute, although such result has not yet been attained.

the opinion of the defendant, warranted a revision of the decree.

At the close of the case defendant asked for two changes.

[Changes Requested]

(1) The insertion of language in Art. VI(d) authorizing defendant to reduce its rentals where necessary to meet competition; and (2) the addition of a provision that it shall not be required to lease the devices in a territory where its engineering services are not available.

[Reduction to Meet Competition]

The proof justifies the first modification. Though the evidence was not strong it did indicate the existence of such competition in some localities.

[Separation of Leasing and Sales]

With respect to the second modification, the proof is less than satisfactory. It appears that defendant does not sell salt in the western states; consequently, it does not maintain any offices in that area and its personnel is not available to "service" machines there. It appears, however, that where it served defendant's purpose, it leased machines in that area both directly and through an independent distributor. It also sells machines abroad without any facilities for "servicing" them. The evidence indicates that the "servicing" is largely a good will gesture to promote the sale of salt. It is the object of the decree to divorce the leasing of machines from the sale of salt.

[Modification Ordered]

The decree will be modified as follows:

Art. VI(d) is amended by changing the period at the end of the first sentence to a colon and inserting, "Provided, defendant may reduce its rental, sale price or royalty where, when, and to the extent necessary, in good faith, to meet competition."

In the New York Supreme Court, Special Term, Part IV. 119 N. Y. L. J. 2404. June 28, 1948.

New York Fair Trade Act

Enforcement of Fair Trade Agreement—Injunction Suit—Sales Below Established Price.—A cigar retailer who has entered into fair trade contracts with cigar manufacturers may enjoin a competing retailer, with notice of such agreements, from selling the brands of cigars covered by the contracts below the fixed prices. Evidence that this action is the first one brought by plaintiff in several years does not support defendant's contention of abandonment of the contract rights by plaintiff. To attempt amicably to correct differences without recourse to legal proceedings cannot be held to be an abandonment of legal remedies.

See the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.80, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7359.

Jurisdiction—Cigars Manufactured in Other States—Retail Distribution in New York.—Cigars manufactured in other states and brought into New York for retail distribution are subject to the provisions of the New York Fair Trade Act. It is the final or retail sales aspect which is being controlled.

See the New York Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8604.52, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7112.

[No Abandonment of Remedy]

KOCH, J.: Plaintiff and defendant are competitors in the retail cigar business. Plaintiff has brought this action to enforce three fair trade agreements, seeking to enjoin the defendant from selling the brands of cigars referred to in the contracts below the prices fixed therein. The injunctive relief is sought pursuant to section 369-b of the General Business Law of N. Y. Plaintiff and three cigar manufacturers entered into fair trade agreements during 1947, fixing the retail price of various brands of cigars of these manufacturers. Plaintiff has shown upon the trial that defendant, with notice of these agreements and the prices fixed therein, has been selling these brands of cigars below the fixed prices. It has also been shown that defendant has continued to do this, although it had received notice that by so doing it was violating the fair trade agreements. Defendant in answer contends that the plaintiff has abandoned his rights under these contracts. The evidence does not support this contention. It appears that the practice of plaintiff in 1947 was to notify recalcitrant dealers of the existence of the fair trade agreements. In nearly every instance the notice was sufficient, and the prices were adjusted to the fixed price. The fact that this is the first action of this nature since the end of World War II does not indicate abandonment of the contract rights by plaintiff. The necessity for other actions has not been shown. To attempt to amicably correct differences between businessmen without recourse to legal proceedings cannot be held to be an abandonment of those legal remedies, particularly where such methods have been successful in the past. Nor is the defendant aided by its claim that there is a general upheaval and instability in the retail cigar market today. The existence of such a condition has not been established on this trial, and with regard to the brands in question the underselling has generally been corrected.

[Jurisdictional Point]

Defendant has also raised a jurisdictional point. Its contention in this respect is based on the fact that the manufacturers are not New York concerns and that the cigars are brought into New York from other states. Although the cigars, as initially moved, are in interstate commerce and subject to federal regulation, they are brought to New York for retail distribution in this state. It is this final or retail sales aspect that is being controlled and is within the meaning and intent of the Miller-Tydings amendment to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 U. S. C. A., 1).

[Judgment for Plaintiff]

Judgment for plaintiff. The findings of fact having been waived, settle judgment on notice.

In the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. June 6, 1948.

Suit in equity in the Superior Court, wherein interlocutory decrees on demurrers were entered by order of Williams, J., and Donahue, J., and the final decree was entered by order of Brogna, J.

Allegation of Unlawful Conspiracy—Combination and Monopoly Insufficiently Alleged—Decree Dismissing Bill Affirmed.—A retailer of liquor who was obliged to purchase rum at a certain price from a distiller in order to obtain other liquors is not entitled to an order requiring the distiller to instruct defendant newspapers to accept plaintiff's advertising of the rum at a price not based on the wholesale cost plus a reasonable mark up. The allegation of refusal of defendant newspapers to advertise the rum at the price set by plaintiff does not sufficiently allege combination. Even if the fact of combination were sufficiently alleged, there are no such allegations of the character, purpose and effect of the combination as to make out a prima facie case or to require an answer. The bill fails to show the unlawful quality of the combination, if there was a combination. No unlawful monopoly is alleged.

See the Massachusetts law on Trusts, Monopolies, and Restraint of Trade, Vol. 2, ¶ 8395.35.

For plaintiff: L. Winer.

For defendants: Lee M. Friedman, S. Werlin; S. H. Babcock, J. H. B. Edwards; B. Aldrich; E. A. Whitman.

[Nature of Action]

QUA, C. J.: This suit is here on appeal of the plaintiff from a final decree dismissing the bill after the sustaining of separate demurrers of the four defendants. The plaintiff also appealed from only one of the interlocutory decrees sustaining the demurrers, but the others are "open to revision" upon the appeal from the final decree. G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 214, § 27. Bressler v. Averbuck, 322 Mass. 139, 140.[1] The several demurrers are vested upon various grounds, but a ground common to all is that the bill states no cause of action.

The allegations of the bill are in substance these: The plaintiff conducts a retail liquor business. The plaintiff was obliged to purchase from the defendant United Liquors, Ltd., large quantities of a certain brand of rum at an average wholesale price of $3.01 per four fifths of a quart in order to procure from that defendant other brands of liquors. The plaintiff has been able to sell only a small part of this rum and cannot sell it at a price based on the wholesale cost plus a reasonable mark up. In order to recoup part of its loss, the plaintiff submitted to the defendants Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation and Post Publishing Company copy advertising the rum for sale at $1.89 per four fifths of a quart. Both newspapers refused to advertise that brand of rum at that price. Failure of these defendants to accept the plaintiff's advertising copy "would substantially affect" the plaintiff's plan to dispose of its rum. The plaintiff "was advised by an officer" of the defendant United Liquors, Ltd., that "an agreement had been entered into" among that defendant, the three other defendants, National Distillers Corporation of New England, Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation, and Post Publishing Company, and "other widely circulated newspapers doing business in Boston" whereby "the newspapers," including the two newspaper defendants in this suit, "agreed" not to accept advertising of the brand of rum in question at a price of less than $3.81 per four fifths of a quart. This brand of rum "has not been fair traded"[1] in Massachusetts, and the attempts of all the defendants to control its price are "improper and . . . in violation of the rights" of the plaintiff so to dispose of its rum as to salvage a part of its investment. Except for the "agreement" entered into by all the defendants, the plaintiff would have been able to procure some widely read newspaper in Boston to accept its advertising, and the refusal of one newspaper to accept its advertising would not have seriously prejudiced the plaintiff, but the "agreement" among all the defendants "creates a peculiar power of coercion possessed by them in combination which would not be effective without such agreement. . . ." The fair market value of the rum is not in excess of $1.89 per four fifths of a quart, and the combination of the defendants by their concerted action to maintain its price at $3.81 per four fifths of a quart "is a fraud on the general public and unlawful interference with" the plaintiff's right "to normally transact his [sic] business in accordance with duly accepted advertising methods." The acts of the defendants, by their force of numbers and their power in the control of the press and their influence, have created a combination, "which by its very power and influence, is interfering with" the plaintiff's business and constitutes an unlawful conspiracy as it affects the plaintiff and will cause substantial loss to the plaintiff from its failure to sell its rum at a price which it considers fair.

The prayers are that the defendants United Liquors, Ltd., and National Distillers Corporation of New England be ordered to instruct the newspaper defendants "to the effect that they have no objection to the advertising" by said newspapers of the rum at the prices submitted by the plaintiff; that the newspaper defendants be ordered to accept the plaintiff's advertising at prices for the rum to be stipulated by the plaintiff; and for damages and further relief.

The allegation that the plaintiff was obliged to purchase the rum at a certain price in order to obtain other liquors seems to have no relation to the remainder of the bill and is immaterial. The gist of the plaintiff's grievance, if it has a grievance, seems to be that the two defendant newspapers refused to advertise its rum at the price at which the plaintiff desired to have it advertised.

The plaintiff argues that this refusal was in consequence of an unlawful "agreement" or combination among all the defendants and including newspapers not defendants, and that damage will result to the plaintiff. We agree that even if a newspaper, acting alone, is commonly at liberty to reject such advertising as it sees fit (see Commonwealth v. Boston Transcript Co. 249 Mass. 477), it and its associates may be amenable to suit, as any other parties would be, if they have joined in an unlawful combination causing harm to the plaintiff through the peculiar force of numbers. See DesLauries v. Shea, 300 Mass. 30, 33; Comerford v. Meier, 302 Mass. 398, 401; Fleming v. Dane, 304 Mass. 46, 49-51; Weiner v. Lowenstein, 314 Mass.

[1] See G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 93, §§ 14A-14D, as inserted by St. 1937, c. 398, as amended.

642, 646-647; Restatement: Torts, § 765. But, to begin with, we find in the present bill no sufficient allegation of combination. Averments of crucial facts in a pleading should be clear, direct and unequivocal. An allegation merely that the party pleading has been informed or, as here, "advised," of such a fact, followed in the remainder of the pleading by references assuming the truth of the fact but without any express allegation that it is true, is not enough as against a demurrer. Dealtry v. Selectmen of Watertown, 279 Mass. 22, 27. I. T. S. Rubber Co. v. Essex Rubber Co. 281 Fed. 5, 10. See Fuller v. Lovell, 304 Mass. 542, 546; Mairs v. Madden, 307 Mass. 378, 380-381; Carson v. Gikas, 321 Mass. 468.[1] In the second place, even if the fact of combination were sufficiently alleged, we think there are no such allegations of the character, purpose, and effect of the combination as to make out a prima facie case against any of the defendants and to call for an answer. The only harm alleged is that the two newspapers carried out their agreement not to advertise the particular brand of rum at less than $3.81 per four fifths of a quart. This seems to fall short of the kind of intentional invasion of a known and well recognized right of the plaintiff which commonly calls for affirmative justification by a defendant. The case differs in this respect from the recent case of Owen v. Williams, 322 Mass. 356.[2] A combination so to limit advertising would not seem to have been directed against the plaintiff. It might well have been thought to be in the interest of the plaintiff and other dealers as a protection against cut prices. No motive of injuring the plaintiff is alleged. There is no discrimination against the plaintiff as compared with other dealers. There is nothing more than a suggestion or insinuation that there are not other newspapers outside the combination in which the plaintiff can advertise at any price it wishes. It does not appear that other effective methods of advertising are not open to it. The allegations of "a peculiar power of coercion," of "fraud on the general public," and of "unlawful interference" are mere generalizations unsupported by the necessary allegations of particular facts. Johnson v. East Boston Savings Bank, 290 Mass. 441, 446-447. McCarthy v. Hawes, 299 Mass. 340, 344. Neustadt v. Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. Ltd. 303 Mass. 321, 326. Mairs v. Madden, 307 Mass. 378, 380-381. Foster v. Shubert Holding Co. 316 Mass. 470, 474. In short, the bill fails to show the unlawful quality of the combination, if there was a combination. The plaintiff is at least in no better position than was the plaintiff in Neustadt v. Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. Ltd. 303 Mass. 321, 324-326, by which this case, so far as it depends upon combination, would seem to be governed. In point also are Robitaille v. Morse, 283 Mass. 27, 33, and Foster v. Shubert Holding Co. 316 Mass. 470, 475. See Boylston Housing Corp. v. O'Toole, 321 Mass. 538, 550;[1] Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255. Compare Tompkins v. Sullivan, 309 Mass. 496, 500.

The bill does not allege that any or all of the defendants have created a monopoly at common law. There is nothing to show that they have acquired or will acquire in the rum trade a dominating influence tending to suppress competition. Commonwealth v. Dyer, 243 Mass. 472, 486. Foster v. Shubert Holding Co. 316 Mass. 470, 472. See Associated Perfumers, Inc. v. Andelman, 316 Mass. 176, 183-184. Neither does violation of G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 93, § 2, appear. It does not appear that the particular brand of rum is an "article or commodity in common use," and if rum in general is such an article, it does not appear that with respect to rum in general the alleged agreement has any appreciable tendency to restrain or prevent competition or to enhance prices. See Commonwealth v. North Shore Ice Delivery Co. 220 Mass. 55; Berenson v. H. G. Vogel Co. 253 Mass. 185; Keith v. Heywood Boot & Shoe Co. 255 Mass. 321, 324; Foster v. Shubert Holding Co. 316 Mass. 470. We need not consider what the remedy would be if violation of the statute appeared. See G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 93, §§ 3-7.

Finally, we do not agree with the plaintiff that the bill can stand on the theory that the several defendants, or some of them, have induced the newspapers not to enter into a business relation with the plaintiff. See Restatement: Torts, § 766. It is plain that the bill was not drawn on any such theory. It does not allege that any defendant induced or caused any other defendant not to do what it would otherwise have done. So far as appears each defendant was as much an originator and as much an active moving party in bringing about the "agreement" as any other defendant.

[¶ 62,273] United States v. The Mortgage Conference of New York, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil Action No. 37-247. June 28, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment — Dissolution of Conference — Fixing of Mortgage Rates and Charges.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging mortgage lenders and an association of mortgage lenders in the New York City area with violations of the antitrust laws requires the dissolution of the association within four months of the date of entry of judgment, and enjoins each of the defendants from participating in any agreement or program to fix interest rates, terms of amortization or periods of maturity for mortgages; to fix rental charges for real estate; to systematically report or circulate through any central person or agency information concerning uncompleted negotiations for mortgages or advice as to the advisability of placing a mortgage; to restrain any mortgage lender from placing a mortgage; to abstain from competing for mortgages or leases for certain spécified reasons. Defendants are also enjoined from participating in any association the purpose of which is to perform any of the acts enjoined.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1530.10.

For plaintiff: James C. Wilson, J. Francis Hayden, Mervin C. Pollak, Sigmund Timberg, Special Assistants to the Attorney General; Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General; John F. X. McGohey, United States Attorney; J. Paul McQueen, Special Attorney.

For defendants: Root, Ballantine, Harlan, Bushby & Palmer; Boyle Feller, Stone & McGivern; Mitchell, Capron, Marsh, Angulo & Cooney; Donovan, Leisure, Newton, Lumbard & Irvine; Stephen G. Kent; Amend & Amend; Jackson, Nash, Buphy, Barringer & Brooks; Barry, Wainwright, Thacher & Symmers; Berle, Berle, Agee & Land; Paul Windets; Milbank, Tweed, Hope, Hadley & McClay; O'Connor & Farber; Sincerbeaux & Shrewsbury; Louis W. Dawson; Francis K. Raynor; Sullivan & Cromwell; William A. Hyman; House, Grossman, Woorhams & Hemly; Eugene J. Conroy; Edward F. Keenan; Brower, Brill, Ennis & Gangel; Newman & Bisco; George Hoague, John Barber, Jr., Ralph C. Williams, Jr.; Dillon, O'Brien & Clark; Joseph V. McKee; Davis, Polk Wardwell Sunderland & Kiendl; White & Case; Oliver Donnally; Winthrop, Stimson, Putnam & Roberts; Choate, Byrd, Leon & Garretson; all of New York, N. Y. Cullen & Dykeman; Hutton & Dalahan; Snedeker & Snedeker; all of Brooklyn, N. Y.

FINAL JUDGMENT

The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on August 6, 1946; the defendants having appeared and severally filed their answers to the complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof and asserting their innocence of any violation of law; and the defendants, by their attorneys, having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment herein, without admission by any defendant with respect to any issue of fact or law raised by the complaint, and on their understanding that neither such consent nor this final judgment shall constitute evidence or adjudication of any violation of law.

Now THEREFORE, no evidence or testimony having been taken herein, and without any trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein; it is hereby

ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED:

I.

That this Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties hereto, and that the complaint states a cause of action under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," as amended (U. S. C. Title 15, Section 1) commonly known as the Sherman Act.

II.

That as used in this final judgment:

A. "Mortgage" means a mortgage or mortgages upon real property located in the New York City area originally made to secure a loan of ten thousand dollars or more;

B. "Real property" means real property located in the New York City area;

C. "New York City area" means the area included in the counties of New York, Bronx, Kings, Queens, Richmond, Westchester and Nassau, all in the state of New York;

D. "Mortgage lender" means any financial institution, corporation or person regularly engaged in the business of investing funds under its control in mortgages, as herein defined.

III.

That the provisions of this final judgment applicable to any defendant (except the order of termination and dissolution contained in paragraph IV hereof) shall apply with equal force to all subsidiaries and successors of each of the defendants and to all persons acting under authority of, through or for the defendants, or any of them. Such provisions shall not apply to any transaction solely between a defendant and its own subsidiaries, officers, directors, trustees, mortgage correspondents or bona fide agents having no interest in such transaction other than that of representing such defendant therein.

IV.

That the defendant The Mortgage Conference shall forthwith take all steps necessary to terminate its activities and to effectuate its dissolution within four months of the date of the entry of this judgment, and shall at the expiration of said four months period, file a report with this Court and the Attorney General setting forth the measures taken to effectuate such dissolution.

V.

That the defendants, and each of them, are hereby enjoined from entering into, adhering to, participating in, or maintaining any continuing agreement, undertaking, plan or program with each other or with any other mortgage lender:

A. To fix interest rates, terms of amortization or periods of maturity for mortgages;

B. To fix rental charges for real estate;

C. To systematically report to or circulate through any central person or agency: (1) information concerning the pendency or details of specific uncompleted negotiations for mortgages or applications for mortgages not constituting contracts for mortgages, or (2) any opinion or advice relating to the advisability of placing a mortgage;

D. To prevent or restrain any mortgage lender from placing a mortgage;

E. To abstain from competing for a mortgage, from competing for a lease of real property or from causing others to do the same:

(1) Because such property is owned or occupied or is to be owned or occupied by persons belonging to any particular racial or national group; or

(2) Because of information, opinions and advice reported by or received from any other defendant or mortgage lender concerning uncompleted negotiations for mortgages or applications for mortgages not constituting contracts for mortgages; or

(3) Because it would involve the satisfaction of an existing mortgage held by another mortgage lender.

F. To abstain from competing for a mortgage on real property on which construction is contemplated or in progress, or causing others to do the same, because such construction might lessen the income from other real property in which one or more mortgage lenders have investments.

VI.

That the defendants are, and each of them is, hereby enjoined from forming, being a member of, or participating in the activities of any organization or association of any kind where the purpose of such formation, membership or participation is to do directly or indirectly any of the acts enjoined in paragraph V of this final judgment, and from causing any organization, association or other group or person, which any one or more of the defendants actually control, to do directly or indirectly any of such acts.

VII.

That without hereby determining, adjudicating or effecting the legality under the Antitrust laws of the common policies and agreements hereafter referred to in this paragraph VII, the provisions of this final judgment shall not prevent any defendant from acting with one or more other defendants or with other mortgage lenders in establishing and executing such common policies and agreements as are appropriate:

(A) To business and operations authorized by state or local law involving the buying or selling of mortgages or the buying, financing, developing, building, rehabilitating, owning, operating, managing and selling of real property, carried on by a trust company or other corporation which is duly organized pursuant to state or local law and wholly owned by mortgage lenders;

(B) To transactions in which two or more mortgage lenders act together, in a particular common undertaking, or with a common interest in a trust estate, to buy, construct, own, operate, finance or reorganize any real property project, development or operating unit, or to transactions relating to the sale of a mortgage by one mortgage lender to another;

(C) To activities authorized by Federal or State laws or regulations or orders duly issued by Federal or State administrative officials, agencies or boards having authority to issue the same.

VIII.

That the provisions of this final judgment shall not apply to any activities or transactions, if any, which may be exempt from the application of the Antitrust laws by the provisions of Public Law 15, 79th Congress (59 Stat. 33, 34, 15 U. S. C., Sections 1011-1013).

IX.

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment, and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to the defendants, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (a) to have access during reasonable office hours of the defendants to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of the defendants relating to any of the matters contained in this judgment, and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of the defendants, to interview, without restraint or interference from the defendants, officers or employees of the defendants, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matter; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means permitted in this paragraph shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment or as otherwise required by law.

X.

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this final judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this final judgment, or for the amendment or modification of any of the provisions hereof. In any proceeding for the enforcement of this final judgment, the defendants in such proceeding are not estopped by way of defense from asserting that, or adducing evidence bearing on whether, the activities, transactions or course of conduct involved are outside of the interstate commerce described in the complaint in this action, and bearing on the nature and extent of their effect upon such commerce.

[¶ 62,274] Coty, Inc. v. Buffum & Co., Inc.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 48 C 91. June 16, 1948.

Illinois Fair Trade Act

Injunction—Resale Price Maintenance Contracts—Unfair Competition Prohibited.— The advertising, offering for sale and selling in Illinois of perfume applicators and refills containing perfumes manufactured and trade-marked by plaintiff, a Delaware corporation, at prices less than those established by plaintiff under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois, constitutes a violation of that Act. Defendant is permanently enjoined from selling or distributing plaintiff's perfumes except in the original sealed packages originating with plaintiff and at the prices established by plaintiff under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois and all other states having Fair Trade Acts.

See the Illinois Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8224, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7354.

For plaintiff: James R. McKnight, Robert C. Comstock, Lewis S. Bernstein, Chicago, Ill.

For defendant: Critton, Schroeder, Merriam & Hofgren; Maurice S. Weinzelbaum, Chicago, Ill.

Final Judgment

The Court being fully advised in the premises and the parties hereto having consented to the same, the Court enters the following findings of fact, conclusions of law and decree herein:

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, Coty, Inc. is a Delaware corporation having its principal place of business in New York, New York.

2. Defendant, Buffum & Co., Inc. is an Illinois corporation, having its principal place of business in Chicago, Illinois.

3. Plaintiff has adopted and used, is now using, and is the lawful owner of the trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE for perfumes, cosmetics and toilet preparations, and registrations Nos. 146,974 of September 27, 1921, 184,091 of May 21, 1924 and 187,543 of August 5, 1924 and renewed for L'ORIGAN and No. 181,498 of March 18, 1924 and renewed for EMERAUDE, all issued on said respective dates therefor by the United States Patent Office.

4. Plaintiff's perfumes, cosmetics, and toilet preparations, bearing the trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE have for many years been, and are now extensively sold in interstate commerce so that said products bearing either of said trade marks are understood by the trade and public to be plaintiff's products.

5. On July 1, 1947 plaintiff entered into contracts establishing $2.85 as the minimum retail price and unit list price for .34 of an ounce of its EMERAUDE perfume under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

6. On July 1, 1947 plaintiff entered into contracts establishing $1.50 as the minimum retail price and unit list price for .20 of an ounce of its L'ORIGAN perfume under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

7. Plaintiff's said contracts under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois for EMERAUDE and L'ORIGAN perfumes provided that these perfumes were not sold in bulk, and that the smallest quantity which could be sold was the listed amount at the price as heretofore set forth herein in paragraphs 6 and 7.

8. The prices and quantities for plaintiff's EMERAUDE and L'ORIGAN perfumes set forth in paragraphs 6 and 7 herein have continuously been effective from July 1, 1947 to date.

9. Defendant advertised, offered for sale and sold perfume applicators and refills containing perfume which defendant advertised and claimed to be L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE perfume, without plaintiff's consent and at dates later than plaintiff's first use and registration of the trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE.

10. Defendant advertised, offered for sale and sold perfume applicators and refills containing plaintiff's L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE perfumes, during a period between November, 1947 and February, 1948 at $1.49 for the filled applicator and 50 cents for the filled refill, which are prices less than the prices established by plaintiff and then in effect under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

Conclusions of Law

11. This Court has jurisdiction of the parties hereto and over the controversy involved in this action.

12. The trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE used on perfumes, cosmetics and toilet preparations, and the registrations therefor, Nos. 146,974, 184,091 and 187,543 for L'ORIGAN and No. 181,498 for EMERAUDE, all issued by the United States Patent Office and owned by plaintiff, are each good and valid in law.

13. Defendant has infringed plaintiff's said registered trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE by said advertising, offering for sale and sale of perfume applicators and refills containing perfume under such trade marks without plaintiff's consent and has engaged in unfair competition with the plaintiff in advertising, offering for sale and selling perfume applicators as containing such perfumes.

14. Defendant has violated the Fair Trade Act of Illinois by advertising, offering for sale and selling perfume applicators and refills containing plaintiff's L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE perfume at prices less than those established by plaintiff under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

15. Plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction against defendant to restrain said trade mark infringement, unfair competition and violation of the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

Decree

16. It is Hereby Ordered, Adjudged, and Decreed that Buffum & Co. Inc. and its agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and all persons in active concert or participation or privity with it be and are hereby forever enjoined and restrained from in any way, directly or indirectly (a) infringing plaintiff's registered trade marks L'ORIGAN and EMERAUDE or either of them and particularly from using L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE or any other words confusingly similar thereto on or in connection with perumes, or any other goods of the same descriptive properties, or any other goods or services on or in connection with which such use is likely to cause confusion or mistake or to deceive purchasers as to the source of origin of such goods or services, including perfume applicators or containers; and (b) selling, offering for sale or advertising perfumes or other goods of the same descriptive properties as and for L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE or either of them, or otherwise committing acts of unfair competition with reference to plaintiff and its L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE products; (c) selling or distributing L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE perfumes except in the original sealed packages originating with plaintiff and at the prices established by plaintiff under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois and all other states having Fair Trade Acts; and (d) selling or distributing any L'ORIGAN or EMERAUDE perfumes in defendant's Pipette, or refill cartridges, or any other receptacle or applicator or in bulk at $1.49 or $.50 or any other price less than that established by plaintiff under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois and all other states having Fair Trade Acts.

17. That taxable costs be allowed to plaintiff.

18. The parties having entered into settlement, there is no award of damages or profits of any kind.

[¶ 62,275] Consolidated Cosmetics and Dana Perfumes, Inc. v. Buffum & Co., Inc.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 48 C 80. June 21, 1948.

Illinois Fair Trade Act

Decree—Resale Price Maintenance Contracts—Unfair Competition Prohibited.—A decree prohibits the advertising, offering for sale and selling of perfume applicators and refills containing perfumes at prices less than those established by the manufacturer and trade mark owner under the Illinois Fair Trade Act.

See the Illinois Fair Trade Act, Vol. 2, ¶ 8224, and the Resale Price Maintenance Commentary, Vol. 2, ¶ 7354.

For plaintiff: James R. McKnight, Chicago, Ill.

For defendant: Critton, Schroeder, Merriam & Hofgren, Chicago, Ill.

Final Judgment

The Court being fully advised in the premises and the parties hereto having consented to the same, the Court enters the following findings of fact, conclusions of law and decree herein:

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, Consolidated Cosmetics, is a firm composed of James L. Younghusband, Howard Younghusband and Paul Rowatt, and plaintiff, Dana Perfumes, Inc. is an Illinois corporation, both plaintiffs having their principal places of business in Chicago, Illinois.

2. Defendant Buffum & Co., In., is an Illinois corporation, having its principal place of business in Chicago, Illinois.

3. Plaintiff, Consolidated Cosmetics has adopted and used, is now using and is the lawful owner of the trade mark TABU for perfumes, cosmetics and toilet preparations and registrations Nos. 314,493 of July 3, 1934, 407,797 of June 27, 1944 and 426,323 of December 24, 1947, all issued by the United States Patent Office.

4. Plaintiffs, Consolidated Cosmetics and Dana Perfumes, Inc., have so extensively sold perfumes, cosmetics and toilet preparations bearing the trade mark TABU that said products bearing said trade mark are understood by the trade and public to be plaintiffs' products.

5. On July 21, 1947, plaintiff Dana Perfumes, Inc. entered into contracts establishing $2.25 as the minimum retail price and unit list price for one dram of TABU perfume under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

6. The price and quantity for plaintiffs' TABU perfume set forth in paragraph 5 herein have been effective continuously from July 21, 1947, to date.

7. Defendant advertised, offered for sale and sold perfume applicators and refills containing perfume which defendant advertised and claimed to be TABU perfume, without plaintiffs' consent and at dates later than plaintiffs' first use and registrations of the trade mark TABU.

8. Defendant advertised, offered for sale and sold perfume applicators and refills containing plaintiffs' TABU perfume, during a period between November, 1947, and February, 1948, at $1.49 for the filled applicator and 50 cents for the filled refill, which are prices less than the prices established by plaintiffs and then in effect under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

Conclusions of Law

9. This Court has jurisdiction of the parties hereto, and over the controversy involved in this action.

10. The trade mark TABU used on perfumes, cosmetics and toilet preparations and registrations therefor Nos. 314,493, 407,797 and 426,323 issued by the United States Patent Office and owned by Consolidated Cosmetics are each good and valid in law.

11. Defendant has infringed the trade mark TABU by said advertising, offering for sale and selling of perfume applicators and refills containing perfume under such trade mark without plaintiffs' consent, and has engaged in unfair competition with plaintiffs in advertising, offering for sale and selling perfume applicators as containing such perfume.

12. Defendant has violated the Fair Trade Act of Illiniois by advertising, offering for sale and selling perfume applicators and refills containing plaintiffs' TABU perfume at prices less than those established under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

13. Plaintiffs are entitled to a permanent injunction against defendant to restrain said trade mark infringement, unfair competition and violation of the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

Decree

14. It is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that Buffum & Co., Inc. and its agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and all persons in active concert or participation or privity with it, be and are hereby forever enjoined and restrained from in any way directly or indirectly (a) infringing plaintiffs' registered trade mark TABU and particularly from using TABU or any other words confusingly similar thereto on or in connection with perfumes, or any other goods of the same descriptive properties, or any other goods or services on or in connection with which such use is likely to cause confusion or mistake or to deceive purchasers as to the source of origin of such goods or services; (b) selling, offering for sale or advertising perfumes or other goods of the same descriptive properties as and for TABU, or otherwise committing acts of unfair competition with reference to plaintiffs and their products TABU; (c) selling or distributing any TABU perfume except in the original sealed packages originating with plaintiffs and at the prices established by plaintiffs under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois; and (d) selling or distributing any TABU perfume in defendant's Pipette, or refill cartridge, or any other receptacle or applicator or in bulk at $1.49 or $.50 or any other price less than that established by plaintiffs under the Fair Trade Act of Illinois.

In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 9477. July 1, 1948.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Patent Infringement—License Agreement—Unlawful Monopoly of Unpatented Article. —An exclusive license agreement by which plaintiff patentee granted to plaintiff licensee the exclusive right to manufacture and sell, under the patentee's patent, not the patented combination defined in the claims of that patent, but the weatherstrip and sash balance device embodied in the invention shown, described and claimed in the patent, which device constitutes but a single element of the combination, and the bringing of an action for infringement of such patent, constitutes a conspiracy to maintain an illegal monopoly in restraint of trade in an unpatented article of commerce, in violation of the Sherman Act. A counterclaim to the infringement suit, denying infringement and the validity of the patents, and seeking a declaratory judgment against plaintiffs for antitrust violations, is upheld, and defendant is awarded injunctive relief and damages.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1270.201, 1270.501.

Affirming the decision of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

Before SPARKS and MINTON, Circuit Judges, and LINDLEY, District Judge.

SPARKS, Circuit Judge. Plaintiffs charged defendant, a copartnership, with infringement of United States patents Nos. 2,158,963 and 2,257,051 issued on the respective dates of May 16, 1939, and September 23, 1941, on applications filed respectively on January 6, 1938, and December 8, 1939. The answer denied infringement and validity of both patents, and a counterclaim asked for a declaratory judgment to that effect, and for a further judgment against plaintiffs for their alleged attempt to monopolize an unpatented element of their combination in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. This counterclaim further alleged that, although plaintiffs had not here charged defendant with infringement of Gossen prior patent No. 2,101,577, yet they had formerly done so, and for that reason there still existed an actual controversy between plaintiffs and the counterclaimant as to whether the latter had infringed or was then infringing this patent No. 2,101,577, and for that reason, and in order to avoid the expense and burden of a multiplicity of suits and to adjudicate in this action the entire controversy existing between these parties, the counterclaimant charged that patent No. 2,101,577 and each of its claims were void because Gossen was not the original inventor, nor did he first discover any material part of its disclosure.

The court held that an actual controversy existed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, under the Declaratory Judgment Act, section 274d of the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. A., section 400d), as to each of the Gossen patents, Nos. 2,158,963, 2,257,051 and 2,101,577.

Before submission of this cause plaintiffs served notice upon defendant that as a basis for their charge of infringement against defendant they would rely solely on claims 1 and 2 of patent No. 2,158,963, and not upon any claims of the other two patents mentioned in this complaint and counterclaim.

The claims here in issue are numbers 1 and 2 of patent No. 2,158,963. Claim 1 is set forth.[1] Claim 2 is substantially similar

[1] "1. In combination, a window frame, a sash slidably mounted within said frame, tubes secured within the frame at the sides of the sash and each tube having a bottom wall and laterally spaced side walls, the side walls of the tubes being free of the frame and extending into grooves in the adjacent side portions of the sash, said side walls having a spring tension connection with their bottom walls so that the side walls may press laterally against the sash within the grooves to frictionally hold the sash in any position of adjustment within the frame, flange formations along the side walls within the grooves, said flanges extending inwardly from the side walls and terminating short of each other between the side walls to provide slots along the tubes within the grooves, and coiled lifting springs located within the tubes thereto. It differs only in that claim 2 is somewhat more specific as to the particular construction of the metal weather strip-sash balance unit and its so-called tube portion. Appellant describes the difference as that claim 2 includes means carried by tubes at the sides whereby the tubes may be secured to the frame laterally and exteriorly of their side walls.

The court found the facts substantially as follows: Master Metal Strip Service, Inc. is the successor in business and in interest to the exclusive licensee named in an exclusive license agreement of July 18, 1939, between plaintiff, Gossen and Maurice S. Oftedal, who was then doing business as Master Metal Strip Service Co. Under that license agreement Gossen, the patentee, granted to Oftedal, doing business as Master Metal Strip Service Co., the predecessor of the corporate plaintiff, the exclusive right to manufacture and sell, throughout the Dominion of Canada and the United States, exclusive of the State of Wisconsin, under Gossen patent No. 2,158,963, not the patented combination defined in claims 1 and 2 of that patent, but the weather strip and sash balance device embodied in the invention shown, described and claimed in the patent, which device constitutes but a single element of the combination here in issue.

As consideration for such license to manufacture and sell the metal weather strip and sash balance device, the licensee agreed to pay the patentee one cent per foot for the first million feet of weather strip material sold each year by the licensee, no royalty on the second million feet sold each year, and on all weather strip material sold in each year in excess of two million feet, licensee was to pay one-half cent per foot.

From the date of the license to the filing of the complaint, the license was in full force and effect between the plaintiffs. From the issuance of the patent to the time of trial the defendant did not manufacture or sell any window frame or window sash of the character disclosed in the Gossen patent in issue or its claims 1 and 2.

Neither Master Metal Strip Service, Inc. nor defendant manufactures or sells window frames or window sash, as disclosed by the Gossen patent in issue, and as defined in claims 1 and 2 thereof. The combination defined in claims 1 and 2 of Gossen does not differ in any material respect from that disclosed by the Bricker patent No. 848,961.

The court sets forth in detail the similarities and the differences in substantially the following language: Both Bricker and Gossen have in combination the frame, sash and thin metal strip. Both have tubes secured within the frame, each tube having a bottom wall and laterally spaced side walls, the side walls being free of the frame and extending into grooves in the adjacent portions of the sash. Both have flange formations along the side walls within the grooves, said flanges extending inwardly from the side walls and terminating short of each other between the side walls. The only differences between Bricker and Gossen are (1) Bricker contemplated fastening his metal strip to the frame while Gossen in the written instructions he gives for using his metal strip advises fitting the weather strip together with the coil springs to the sash and then placing the sash in the frame, and (2) Gossen states that the side walls have a spring tension connection with their bottom walls so that the side walls may press laterally against the sash within the grooves to frictionally hold the sash in any position of adjustment within the frame. How this tension is to be brought about is not stated in the claim, but the construction of the tubes is practically the same in both patents and both are made of thin metal, the kind of metal not being stated. Gossen says, "The extent of the divergence of the side walls of the tubes may be regulated by pressing inwardly with a blunt tool at the juncture of the side walls and the flanges. This enables the side walls to be given the desired tension to hold the sash in place and serve the weather strip function."

The District Court found that the same result could be produced by the pressure of a blunt tool along the juncture of the side walls of Bricker, and that such would be the effect is a fact known to competent mechanics; that the advantages claimed by Gossen for his alleged invention are that the arrangement enables his improved sash balance and weather strip device to be readily and easily applied to buildings already built and that the tubes and the lifting elements may be assembled with the sash before placement in the window frame.

and fixed at one end as to the tubes and connected at their other ends to the sash through the slots in the tubes, said flanges extending over the springs and retaining the same within the tubes in all positions of adjustment of the sash within the frame."

The court further found that Bricker shows the metal weather strip attached to the window frame, but that there is no reason why Bricker's metal parts might not as well be assembled with the sash and the sash then placed in the frame in the same manner that Gossen assembles and places his. The court called attention to the fact that in claims 1 and 2 Gossen discloses a coil spring, but as an ultimate fact the court found that there is nothing new in the use of the spring nor the method of attaching it to the tube at the top or the frame at the bottom.

As matters of law the District Court concluded that claims 1 and 2 of patent No. 2,158,963 do not disclose invention because each consists solely of old elements which operate in the same manner as the prior art and disclose no novelty.

The court further concluded that by plaintiffs' license agreement and their operations thereunder, and in bringing this action, they have attempted to and have conspired to maintain an illegal monopoly in restraint of trade in an unpatented article of commerce, namely, a metal weather strip-sash balance device, as used in the patent, and in so doing plaintiffs have violated the antitrust laws of the United States, 15 U. S. C. A., sections 1 et seq.; that by reason of such violations defendant is entitled to the relief provided by such Act as follows:

(1) An injunction enjoining plaintiffs and each of them, and all others acting by or under direction or authority, their successors and assigns, from: (a) Bringing suit for infringement of the Gossen patent No. 2,158,963 against defendant's customers or prospective customers, or directly or indirectly threatening defendant's customers or prospective customers with infringement suits of this patent, or from in any manner interfering with defendant's by use of this Gossen patent; (b) enforcing or carrying out directly or indirectly against defendant, its customers or prospective customers, any of the provisions of such license or any other similar license agreement involving this Gossen patent.

(2) An accounting for three-fold damages, if any, suffered by defendant by reason of the above named unlawful acts of the plaintiffs, together with defendant's disbursements and reasonable attorney's fees, and costs.

The court further concluded that by reason of plaintiffs' violation of the antitrust laws, above referred to, they should be barred from maintaining this action against the defendant, and that the defendant is entitled to dismissal with prejudice as to claims 3 to 8, inclusive, of Gossen patent No. 2,158,963, and as to claims 1 to 11, inclusive, of Gossen patent No. 2,257,051, and also as to claims 1 to 8, inclusive, of Gossen patent No. 2,101,577.

The District Court concluded as an ultimate fact that Gossen's disclosures as defined in claims 1 and 2 of patent No. 2,158,963, amounted to nothing more than mere mechanical skill, and concluded that such disclosures did not amount to novelty as contemplated by the statute, hence it held the patent was invalid. Judgment was rendered for the defendant consistent with the conclusions of law and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The trial court has found the material facts in a very clear and concise manner. We think they are fully supported by the evidence, and as to the question of patentability, we are convinced that in view of the disclosures of Bricker's patent No. 848,961, the claims 1 and 2 of Gossen's patent No. 2,158,963 disclose nothing in excess of the skill of the art. We think there is no error in holding these claims invalid.

We are of the opinion that the evidence fully supports the District Court's conclusions and judgment as to appellants' violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. We case our conclusion in this respect upon the case of Mercoid Corporation v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U. S. 661. Appellants seek to distinguish that case from the one at bar. We are unable to grasp such distinction.

It will be noted that the District Court made no direct finding as to infringement as charged in the complaint, and plaintiffs have assigned this fact as error. With this contention we do not agree. We find no case in this circuit which supports appellants' assignment in this respect, nor have they cited any case where upon similar facts the court has supported this contention. See Cover v. Schwartz, 133 F. 2d 541; Trico Products Corp. v. Anderson Company, 147 F. 2d 721; Grant Paper Box Co. v. Russell Box Co., 151 F. 2d 886.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 614-48. June 8, 1948.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Motion to Quash—Venue—Transacting Business in District.—Defendant motion picture theatre operators, who operate two theatres in Baltimore, Maryland, and who receive films from six distributor defendants located in the District of Columbia, do not "transact business" in the District of Columbia so as to render them amenable to service of process in that District under the provisions of Section 12 of the Clayton Act. The acts relied on to constitute transacting business must constitute a substantial part of the ordinary business of the corporation and must be continuous or at least of some duration. Visits by the theatre manager to the distributors' exchanges in the District of Columbia once a week for the purpose of booking films, and occasional visits for "spot booking" and requests for adjustments and credits, do not constitute such continuous and regular acts. The act of booking is not sufficient to bring the corporation within the "transacting business" clause of the Clayton Act. A motion to quash service of process is granted.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2032.

For plaintiff: Harold L. Schlitz, Washington, D. C.

For defendant: Edmund L. Jones, Donald Russell; Metler, Shea & Oppenheimer, all of Washington, D. C.

Opinion on Motion to Dismiss Complaint or to Quash Service of Process

Plaintiff brought this action under the provisions of the Sherman and Clayton Acts,[1] to recover treble the amount of damages allegedly sustained and to enjoin certain alleged violations of the above-named Acts. The Walbrook Amusement Company and the Hilton Theatre Company, corporate defendants, moved to dismiss the complaint or in lieu thereof to quash the service of process on the grounds that they are not inhabitants of the District of Columbia, that they were not found in, and that they do not transact business in the District of Columbia. Defendant corporations operate two theatres in Baltimore, Maryland, receiving their films from the six distributor defendants located in the District of Columbia.

Plaintiff does not contend that these defendants are inhabitants of or that they are to be "found" in the District of Columbia. However, it is urged they are transacting business in the District of Columbia and can be sued in this District by reason of the provision of the Clayton Act[2] which provides: "Any suit, action or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

The question raised requires a determination of whether the acts done by defendants in the District of Columbia are sufficient to sustain a finding that they were "transacting business" in this District. From the facts as I have found them, the general manager of defendants regularly visits the distributors' exchanges in the District of Columbia for the purpose of "booking" the films for which contracts have been made. Such visits occur once a week and last for a period of approximately two hours. "Booking" consists of setting a specific play date and theatre for the exhibition of films which have been contracted for in the agreement to license. The sequence of events leading up to the time that a picture is booked by the general manager of these defendants are as follows: First, a salesman of the distributor defendants calls on the general manager of the exhibitor defendants in Baltimore, Maryland, where he negotiates an Agreement to License a certain film. This agreement to license becomes a contract only when it has been finally approved in the distributor's New York office. Some of the agreements leave the general manager several options which he must exercise when he "books" the film, while in others every detail is settled. Second, when the film is available for release the distributor in the District of Columbia mails a notice of availability to the exhibitor in Baltimore, who then comes to the District of Columbia and books the film. Generally, the following action is done in the District; a specific play date is selected for the showing of the film; it is decided whether the film will be shown on a preferred playing date, i.e., Saturday or Sunday; it is decided whether a film will run for three or four days; and it is decided whether the film will be exhibited in the Walbrook or the Hilton Theatres. It does not appear that there are any negotiations with regard to these matters. The general manager merely advises the Booker of the choice he has made.

[2] Title 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 22.

In addition to booking pictures, occasionally other matters have been discussed by defendants' general manager in the District of Columbia. At times when one of the two defendant theatres has been without a film to be exhibited on a particular date, the general manager has come to the District of Columbia to "spot book" a film. This spot booking has occurred only on infrequent occasions. Moreover, the general manager of defendant theatres has secured or attempted to secure credits and adjustments in rates when a film has not earned the anticipated amount of return. Some of these requests for credits took place in the District of Columbia, while others were conducted by telephone and correspondence through the mails. They were infrequent and not in any sense continuous.

The quantum of business which must be transacted by a corporation in a district, in order to make it possible to establish venue of an action under the antitrust acts, is less than the "doing business" necessary to sustain the service of process in other cases. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Co., 273 U. S. 359; United States v. Scophony Corporation of America, — U. S. —, April 26, 1948. However, the acts relied on to constitute transacting business must constitute a substantial part of the ordinary business of the corporation and must be continuous or at least of some duration. Westor Theatres, Inc. et al. v. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., et al., 41 F. Supp. 757 (N. J.).

The case at bar is similar to Hartford Theatre Co. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Corp. et al., C. A. 34670 (D. C.) and Commonwealth Amusement Enterprises, Inc. v. Colonial Theatres Company, Inc. et al., Law No. 6532 (Mass.) in which motions to quash service were granted by this Court and by the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. It is true in the case at bar, there were additional acts performed by the general manager of defendant theatres which did not appear in the Hartford Theatre and Commonwealth Amusement cases, namely, spot booking and requests for adjustments and credits. As to these activities, however, the evidence clearly indicates that they were done only occasionally and there was not the continuity necessary to sustain a finding that defendants were transacting a substantial part of their ordinary business in this jurisdiction. These transactions can not be termed "ordinary business"; they were exceptional and occasioned only by unforeseeable events.

The only act of defendant's representative repeatedly and continuously performed in this jurisdiction was booking. This act was relied on in both the Hartford and the Commonwealth Amusement cases, supra, and in both cases it was held that booking was not sufficient to bring the corporation within the transacting business clause of the Clayton Act. In my opinion the decisions in these cases are correct and should be followed. The decisions relied on by plaintiff in support of its position were decided on different states of facts and are not controlling on the question raised in the case at bar.

Accordingly, service of process will be quashed.

Findings of fact and conclusions of law are filed with this opinion.

Findings of Fact on Motion to Dismiss Complaint or Quash Service of Process Against the Walbrook Amusement Company and the Hilton Theatre Company

1. Plaintiff is a Maryland corporation engaged in the business of operating a motion picture theatre known as the Windsor, located at 3113-15 West North Avenue, in Baltimore, Maryland.

2. Defendant, the Walbrook Amusement Company, is a Maryland corporation engaged in the business of operating a motion picture theatre known as the Walbrook, located at 3100 West North Avenue, in Baltimore, Maryland.

3. Defendant, the Hilton Theatre Company, is a Maryland corporation engaged in the business of operating a motion picture theatre known as the Hilton, located at 3117 West North Avenue, in Baltimore, Maryland.

4. Motion picture feature films, short subjects and newsreels are regularly supplied to the Walbrook and Hilton theatres by the defendant motion picture distributors: Loew's Incorporated, Paramount Pictures, Inc., Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, United Artists Corporation, Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., and Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation pursuant to the terms of contracts of license entered into between such distributors and defendants the Walbrook Amusement Company and the Hilton Theatre Company.

5. Said motion picture products are distributed to the defendants through the Washington, D. C. "exchanges" or branch offices of the aforesaid defendant motion picture distributors, and the Walbrook and Hilton theatres do not receive the motion picture product of such distributors from any other point.

6. The summons and complaint in the pending action were served on defendants The Walbrook Amusement Company and The Hilton Theatre Company in the City of Baltimore, Maryland.

7. Neither the Walbrook Amusement Company nor the Hilton Theatre Company has or ever has had any office, records, property, or interests of any kind in the District of Columbia, nor any officers, agents, servants or employees residing therein. The sole business of each of such defendants is that of operating a motion picture theatre in the City of Baltimore.

8. Negotiations for the licensing or buying of pictures for exhibition in the Walbrook and Hilton Theatres are conducted at the Hilton Theatre Building in the City of Baltimore, between Joseph Baer, General Manager of the two exhibitor defendant corporations, and the salesmen of the various distributor defendants named in the complaint. When agreement is reached on the licensing terms for a particular picture or pictures, Baer signs a contract form or memorandum of agreement. This contract form or memorandum of agreement is then taken or forwarded by the salesman to the branch office of the distributor in Washington. If the branch manager rejects the deal, the salesman returns to Baltimore for further negotiations with the exhibitor. If the branch manager approves the deal, the contract is forwarded to New York for final approval by the sales manager or some highly placed officer of the distributor. There is no binding contract prior to approval in New York. Each license agreement contains a provision to the effect that it is complete, that all promises, representations, understandings and agreements have been expressed in the agreement, and that no change, modification or assignment thereof shall be binding upon the distributor in its main office in New York City.

9. Following the execution of the contract by the exhibitor and the duly authorized representative of the distributor, the branch office of the distributor mails an availability notice to the exhibitor advising him when the picture will be available for exhibition in his theatre.

10. Following receipt of a notice of availability, Baer comes to the branch office of the distributors in Washington, D. C. and books the motion pictures for exhibition. The trips to Washington occur once a week and consume approximately two hours' time. Booking consists of deciding upon the actual days the picture will be exhibited, and the theatre to be used for the exhibition of the pictures. In addition, it is sometimes necessary to decide whether the picture is to be exhibited on "preferred playing time", i.e., Saturday or Sunday. All of these matters are settled by the terms of some of the original contracts to license, and in the others the final determination is left open, to be made when the film is booked. There are no negotiations with regard to these mattters, Baer merely advises the booker of the choice he has made.

11. On infrequent occasions defendant exhibitor is without a picture for one of the theatres. In such a case it is necessary, on short notice, for the exhibitor to book an old film to fill in this date. Such an arrangement is known as "spot-booking." Spot Booking is done in Washington, D. C. Such arrangements occur only rarely.

12. On occasions a picture will not gross as large a return as was anticipated when the license agreement, fixing the percentage of the gross as rental, was signed. Requests are sometimes made in the District of Columbia for adjustments and credits to be extended to the exhibitor when a film has not earned the anticipated return. Such requests rarely occur and they have been made over the telephone and through the mails as well as in the District of Columbia by Baer.

13. The Walbrook and Hilton defendants have the films picked up in Washington by a common carrier, which delivers the prints to the theatres in Baltimore and returns them to Washington after they have been exhibited.

14. Film rentals due the various distributors are paid by the Walbrook and Hilton defendants by checks mailed from the office of such exhibitor defendants in Baltimore to the exchange offices in Washington.

Conclusions of Law

1. Defendants, The Walbrook Amusement Company and The Hilton Theatre Company are not transacting business in the District of Columbia, within the meaning of § 12 of the Clayton Act.

2. Motion to quash service of process against said defendants will be granted.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Decree—Arbitration System—No Agreement in Restraint of Trade.—The mere agreement on the part of motion picture distributors to the setting up of an arbitration system under the provisions of a consent decree for handling clearance controversies, with the rules for conducting the proceedings approved by the District Court, and the commitment of each defendant motion picture exhibitor as part of its consent to abide by any final award in a proceeding to which it had been a party, did not constitute a combination or conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act. The refusal, during the time the consent decree was in effect, of such distributors as had been party to an arbitration proceeding on a clearance period, under a complaint filed by some exhibitor of which plaintiffs were given notice and had an opportunity to intervene, to agree with plaintiffs on a longer clearance against the theatre of the complaining exhibitor than that fixed in the arbitration award, could not, without more in the situation, in view of the prohibition of the decree, be claimed to constitute an actionable combination or conspiracy under the statute.

Before SANBORN, THOMAS and JOHNSEN, Circuit Judges.

JOHNSEN, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appeal is from a summary judgment entered against the plaintiffs on motions of the defendants. The trial court's opinion appears in 61 F. Supp. 854.

The action is one under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 et seq., brought by six motion picture exhibitors in St. Louis, Missouri, operating a total of 31 local theatres, against five major distributors in the industry,[1] together with the American Arbitration Association, two of its agents, and the separate operators of two other movie theatres in St. Louis,[2] for injunctive relief and treble damages.

[1] While the complaint lists five distributors as defendants, one of the distributors seems to have been named under both its former and present corporate names. Actually therefore only four distributors appear to be involved.

The combination and conspiracy relied on consisted of an alleged agreement among the defendant distributors not to make any license contracts for films with an exhibitor against whom the American Arbitration Association should have entered an award fixing the clearance period[3] between such exhibitor's theatre and other theatres, except upon the basis of the period prescribed by the award. The American Arbitration Association and its two agents were claimed to be a party to the combination and conspiracy in that the Arbitration Association had consented to receive complaints from exhibitors on clearance questions and to make decisions and awards on the complaints, which necessarily would affect the situation of other exhibitors. The operators of the two local movie theatres referred to were charged with having joined the combination and conspiracy by having filed complaints with the Arbitration Association seeking an award on the clearance rights of each of such theatres in relation to the theatres of plaintiffs.

The complaint further alleged that on one of these complaints the Arbitration Association had entered an award directing the distributors (all of which were parties to the proceeding) to reduce the clearance period which they had previously allowed plaintiffs' theatres as against the complaining theatre from fourteen to seven days; that the distributors had since that time refused to contract or supply pictures to plaintiffs except on the basis of this reduced clearance period; that the clearance reduction had resulted in a loss of patronage at plaintiffs' theatres amounting to and occasioning damages to plaintiffs in the sum of $95,000;[4] and that plaintiffs would similarly continue to suffer great loss and damage in the future because of the situation unless injunctive relief were granted.

As to the complaint filed on behalf of the second theatre, it was alleged that the Arbitration Association was taking steps looking toward the making of an award[5] and that plaintiffs thus were being threatened with a reduction also in the clearance period theretofore enjoyed by them against this theatre.

On the allegations so far stated, the complaint could present a situation that might fall within Paramount Famous Lasky Corporation v. United States, 282 U. S. 30, 51 S. Ct. 42, 75 L. Ed. 145, affirming United States v. Paramount Famous Lasky Corporation, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 34 F. 2d 984, on which plaintiffs rely. But this is not the whole of the complaint. The complaint further showed that the agreement which was claimed to constitute the unlawful combination and conspiracy had consisted in fact of the execution by each of the distributors of a written consent to the entering of an interlocutory decree in a general anti-trust suit, brought against them and others in the film industry by the Attorney General in the District Court for the Southern District of New York, entitled United States of America, Plaintiff, v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., Defendants, No. 87-273. It was under the provisions of this consent decree that the arbitration system for the handling of clearance complaints by exhibitors was set up and that the consenting defendants became bound to abide by the results of any awards so made.

The arbitration system as provided for in the consent decree was obviously merely "an auxiliary enforcement procedure" which the court authorized to be used during the pendency of the action or until a modification or vacation of the consent decree. The final decree entered by the statutory three-judge court, which heard the case ultimately on its merits, terminated the arbitration set-up, "except in so far as may be necessary to

[2] The complaint names other parties as defendants but they were apparently not validly served with process and are not before us on the appeal.

[3] "A clearance is the period of time, usually stipulated in license contracts, which must elapse between runs of the same feature within a particular area or in specified theatres." United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 68 S. Ct. 915, 923, footnote 6.

[4] From the award, which was made a part of the showing in support of the distributors' motion for a summary judgment, it would appear that the only one of the plaintiffs actually involved in that arbitration proceeding was St. Louis Amusement Co., and that it in fact had filed a consent to the arbitration and an agreement to be bound by the award.

[5] The brief of the distributors here states that during the pendency of the present action no further steps have been taken in this arbitration proceeding.

conclude arbitration proceedings now pending and to liquidate in an orderly manner the financial obligations of the defendants and the American Arbitration Association, incurred in the establishment of the consent decree arbitration systems." See United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y., 70 F. Supp. 53, 75. But in the written opinion which the court filed preceding the formulation of its decree, it took occasion to comment that the arbitration system had been of "demonstrated usefulness" as an enforcement expedient during the pendency of the action, Id., 66 F. Supp. 323, 333, and it also made a formal finding, No. 160, that "The arbitration system created by the Consent Decree of November 20, 1940, has demonstrated its usefulness in dealing with exhibitors' complaints of unreasonable clearance * * *," Id., 70 F. Supp. at page 71. Again, in connection with the final decree, the court emphasized its previous comment and said: "The arrangement for arbitration and an appeal board has been terminated except as to unfinished litigations and other matters referred to in the decree, because of the unwillingness of some of the parties to consent to their continuance. Nevertheless, as we have indicated in the opinion, these tribunals have dealt with trade disputes, particularly those as to clearances and runs, with rare efficiency, as both government counsel and counsel for other parties have conceded." Ibid., p. 76.

The decree of the three-judge court (in which clearance relations in the motion picture industry was only one of the many questions involved) was made the subject of appeals by the various parties in the suit to the Supreme Court. We are not here concerned with any of the matters considered and discussed by the Supreme Court in its opinion on the appeals, except as to the use of the arbitration system and the expressions made in relation thereto, for such light as they may throw upon the merits of plaintiffs' contentions here.

It is plaintiffs' contention that the court in the anti-trust case in New York could not validly make a provision in its decree for an arbitration system; that even though the set-up was made with the consent of the parties in the case it was in effect the creation of a private judicial system; that in any event the creation of an arbitration system and the attempt to fix rules governing clearances were legislative matters which would lie solely within the jurisdiction of Congress; that the arbitration provisions of the consent decree were therefore void; and that the agreement of the distributors to the creation and maintenance of the system and to be bound by the awards under it constituted accordingly an unlawful combination and conspiracy, falling within Paramount Famous Lasky Corporation v. United States, supra, 282 U. S. 30, 51 S. Ct. 42, 75 L. Ed. 145.

In entering summary judgment against the plaintiffs, the trial court held that the arbitration provisions of the consent decree in the New York case could not be declared to be invalid and that there was no basis therefore for plaintiffs' contention that the consent of the several distributors to the provisions was of itself an unlawful agreement, combination and conspiracy. The trial court disposed of the action before the decree on the merits had been entered in the New York case and before the appeals had been taken from that decree to the Supreme Court. At the time the matter was argued here, the appeals to the Supreme Court were awaiting hearing, and we have allowed our disposition to await the decision and opinion of the Supreme Court.

In the opinion only recently handed down by the Supreme Court, United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 68 S. Ct. 915, the following is said about the arbitration system under the consent decree and the right of the court, in its discretion, to make provision for such a system under the final decree:

> "The consent decree created an arbitration system which had, in the view of the District Court, proved useful in its operation. The court indeed thought that the arbitration system had dealt with the problems of clearances and runs 'with rare efficiency.' But it did not think it had the power to continue an arbitration system which would be binding on the parties, since the consent decree did not bind the defendants who had not consented to it and since the government, acting pursuant to the powers reserved under the consent decree, moved for trial of the issues charged in the complaint. The District Court recommended, however, that some such system be continued. But it included no such provision in the decree.
> "We agree that the government did not consent to a permanent system of arbitration under the consent decree and that the District Court has no power to force or require parties to submit to arbitration in lieu of the remedies afforded by Congress for enforcing the anti-trust laws. But the District Court has the power to authorize the maintenance of such a system by those parties who consent and to provide the rules and procedure under which it is to operate. The use of the system would not, of course, be mandatory. It would be merely an auxiliary enforcement procedure, barring no one from the use of other remedies the law affords for violations either of the Sherman Act or of the decree of the court. Whether such a system of arbitration should be inaugurated is for the discretion of the District Court." 68 S. Ct. at page 938.

We do not believe that more is necessary to indicate the correctness of the trial court's order in the present case. The mere agreement on the part of each distributor to the setting up of an arbitration system under the provisions of the consent decree for handling clearance controversies, with the rules for conducting the proceedings approved by the District Court, and the commitment of each exhibitor as part of its consent to abide by any final award in a proceeding to which it had been a party did not constitute a violation of the Sherman Act.

We ought perhaps to make it clear that it was provided in the consent decree that "The power of the arbitrator in deciding any such controversy shall be limited to making (1) a finding as to whether or not the clearance complained of is unreasonable; and, if the finding be in the affirmative, (2) an award fixing the maximum clearance between the theatres involved which may be granted in licenses thereafter entered into by the distributor defendant which is a party to the arbitration."

It was not possible therefore to touch rights under existing contracts and, as the opinion of the Supreme Court points out, there was no bar to the exercise of any right under the Sherman Act for wrongs which had been done. But, as we have indicated, the refusal, during the time the consent decree was in effect, of such distributors as had been party to an arbitration proceeding on a clearance period, under a complaint filed by some exhibitor, of which plaintiffs were given notice and had an opportunity to intervene, to agree with plaintiffs on a longer clearance against the theatre of the complaining exhibitor than that fixed in the arbitration award, could not, without more in the situation, in view of the prohibition of the decree, be claimed to constitute an actionable combination or conspiracy under the statute.

Plaintiffs have made the further contention that the refusal of the defendant distributors here, on the basis of the consent decree, to make agreements on clearances after November 19, 1943, contrary to any awards which had been made in arbitration proceedings, was in any event an unlawful combination and conspiracy, because the provisions of the consent decree ceased to be operative after that date. But the provision in the decree on which plaintiffs rely was merely one that was intended to leave the consent decree operative generally for three years without modification. There was no provision automatically terminating the decree at the expiration of that time, but instead it was provided that jurisdiction was retained to enable any party "to apply to the Court at any time more than three years after the date of the entry of this decree for any modification thereof." Without such a modification, the arbitration provisions remained in effect down to the time of the decree on the merits, as the court recognized in its rendition of that decree. See 70 F. Supp., pages 75, 76.

The other contentions of plaintiffs are without merit and do not require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Massachusetts Unfair Cigarette Sales Act

Sales Below Cost—Suspension of License—Statutory Presumption of Cost.—The suspension by the Commissioner of Corporations and Taxation of the cigarette license of a retailer for failure of the licensee to comply with the provisions of a letter from the Commissioner stating the minimum resale price of cigarettes was illegal, and the retailer is entitled to equitable relief and damages therefor. Applying the statutory presumption that in the absence of proof of a lesser or greater cost of doing business by the retailer the

[Nature of Action]

LUMMUS, J.: This case arises under G. L. c. 64C, entitled "Cigarette Excise," which was inserted by St. 1945, c. 547, s. 1, and which has never before received judicial interpretation. The statute provides that no person shall sell cigarettes unless licensed by the appellant commissioner. S. 2. Such a license may be revoked by the commissioner "for failure of the licensee to comply with any provision of said chapter . . . or for other good cause." S. 4. Every licensee "shall keep a complete and accurate record of all cigarettes" purchased, which "shall include a written statement" containing, among other things, "the price paid for such brand of cigarettes purchased." S. 5. By s. 6 an excise equal to one and one half mills for each cigarette sold is imposed. By s. 14 (a) "It shall be unlawful for any retailer, with intent to injure competitors, destroy substantially or lessen competition, to advertise, offer to sell or sell at retail cigarettes at less than cost to the retailer," and by s. 14 (b) "Evidence of advertisement offering to sell, or sale, of cigarettes by any retailer . . . at less than cost to him, shall be prima facie evidence" of such intent.

By s. 13 (a) "The term 'cost to the retailer' shall mean the invoice cost of the cigarettes to the retailer, or the replacement cost of the cigarettes to the retailer within thirty days prior to the date of sale, in the quantity last purchased, whichever is lower, less all trade discounts except customary discounts for cash; to which shall be added the cost of doing business by said retailer as evidenced by the standards and the methods of accounting regularly employed by him in his allocation of overhead costs and expenses, paid or incurred, and must include, without limitation, labor (including salaries of executives and officers), rent, depreciation, selling costs, maintenance of equipment, delivery costs, all types of licenses, taxes, insurance and advertising."

By s. 13 (b) "In the absence of proof of a lesser or higher cost of doing business by the retailer making the sale, the cost of doing business by the retailer shall be presumed to be six per centum of the invoice cost of the cigarettes to the retailer, or of the replacement cost of the cigarettes to the retailer within thirty days prior of the date of sale, in the quantity last purchased, whichever is lower, less all trade discounts except customary discounts for cash."

By s. 22 any person aggrieved by any action of the commissioner or his authorized representatives may apply for a hearing. By s. 24 "Any person aggrieved because of a decision of the commissioner under section twenty-two may appeal therefrom to the appellate tax board within ten days after written notice of the decision has been mailed or delivered to him."

[Suspension of License]

The partnership consisting of Charles V. Ryan, Helen L. Ryan and Harry J. Richard, hereinafter called the retailers, conducted a drug store in Springfield under the name of Ryan Drug Company, in which they sold cigarettes at retail. They had a license from the Commissioner of Corporations and Taxation, which was to expire on June 30, 1947. On February 28, 1947, the commissioner suspended that license. That action followed a letter from the commissioner to all retailers of cigarettes in which he stated that the retail prices of the so-called "popular brands" of cigarettes should be not less than twenty cents a package or $1.98 a carton. On March 10, 1947, the retailers applied for a hearing under G. L. 64C, s. 22. On May 21, 1947, after a hearing, the commissioner decided not to vacate the suspension and not to restore the license. On May 23, 1947, the retailers appealed to the Appellate Tax Board. G. L. c. 64C, s. 24. G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 58A, s. 6, as amended by St. 1945, c. 367, s. 3, and St. 1947, c. 632, s. 2. The board, by a majority decision, made on October 22, 1947, held that the cause for which the commissioner suspended the license was insufficient in law, and granted to the retailers the sum of $250 as equitable relief, under G. L. c. 64C, s. 24. The commissioner appealed to this court on November 5, 1947, under G. L. (Ter. Ed) c. 58A, s. 13.

[Cause for Suspension]

The commissioner, in his letter of suspension dated February 28, 1947, declared that in suspending the license he acted under G. L. c. 64C, s. 4. That section authorizes suspension "for failure of the licensee to comply with any provision of said chapter . . . or for other good cause." In revoking a license for cause the commissioner had a duty to specify the cause for which he was acting. Higgins v. License Commissioners of Quincy, 308 Mass. 142, 145, 147. Becker Transportation Co. Inc. v. Department of Public Utilities, 314 Mass. 522, 526, 527. But it does not appear that the retailers objected to proceeding with the hearing without better specification of the ground of suspension, and very likely waived any infirmity in the letter of suspension. Miami Grove Inc. v. Licensing Board for Boston, 312 Mass. 318, 324. The board found as follows: "The commissioner, in open hearing, stated and we find that the suspension of the license was based on the fact that the Ryan Drug Company did not comply with the provisions of the February 18, 1947, letter. This letter is referred to above and indicated that cigarettes should be sold at not less than $.20 per package, or $1.98 per carton." If that was the sole ground for the suspension of the license, that suspension was invalid, for nowhere in G. L. c. 64C is authority given to the commissioner to fix prices for cigarettes. The cost, below which cigarettes may not be sold, is the actual cost to the particular retailer, and not the usual cost in the trade or the cost as determined by any survey or by any public officer. G. L. c. 64C, ss. 13, 14.

[Question of Sales Below Cost]

But we assume in favor of the commissioner, for the purposes of the present case, that he acted upon his finding, which he expressed on May 21, 1947, that at the time of the suspension the retailers "sold cigarettes at less than cost as defined by" G. L. c. 64C, and that the question whether the retailers did so sell was properly before the board and is properly before this court on appeal. The evidence is reported.

Under G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 58A, s. 13, "The decision of the board shall be final as to findings of fact," and "Each claim of appeal shall set out separately and particularly each error of law asserted to have been made by the board, with precise references to the portions and particulars of the proceedings before the board in which it is alleged that error of law occurred," and "The court shall not consider any issue of law which does not appear to have been raised in the proceedings before the board." In substance the statute provides that the decision of the board as to the facts is final, and that only rulings of law are open in this court. Assessors of Lawrence v. Arlington Mills, 320 Mass. 272, 274. Brockton Knights of Columbus Building Association, Inc. v. Assessors of Brockton, 321 Mass. 110, 113.[1] Commissioner of Corporations & Taxation v. St. Botolph Club, Inc., 321 Mass. 269.[2] But whether the evidence warrants a general conclusion of the board is a question of law, and is raised by appeal. Assessors of Boston v. Garland School of Home Making, 296 Mass. 378, 383. Assessors of Boston v. Lamson, 316 Mass. 166, 168. Assessors of Boston v. Boston, Revere Beach & Lynn Railroad, 319 Mass. 378, 379. The authority to grant equitable relief, given to the board by G. L. c. 64C, s. 24, does not operate to control G. L. (Ter. Ed.) c. 58A, s. 13, so as to bring questions of fact to this court for decision upon the reported evidence, under the equity practice illustrated by Allen v. Moushegian, 320 Mass. 746, 752.

[Statutory Presumption]

The board received evidence, introduced by the commissioner, that surveys conducted among certain drug stores showed that the cost of retailing cigarettes exceeded twelve per cent. That evidence seems to have been competent under G. L. c. 64C, s. 20. But it was material only so far as it enabled an inference to be drawn as to the cost of the particular retailers whose cost of doing business was in issue in this case. The board could give such weight to that evidence as it saw fit. On the other hand, the retailers introduced evidence that their cost was less than three per cent. This, too, the board was not required to accept. In fact, the board refused to adopt either figure, and fell back, as it had a right to do, upon the presumption, created by G. L. c. 64C, s. 13 (b), that "In the absence of proof of a lesser or higher cost of doing business by the retailer" the cost of doing business shall be taken to be six per cent of the invoice cost of the cigarettes to the retailer. Applying the statutory presumption, the retailers could not be found to be selling cigarettes below cost.

[1] Mass. Adv. Sh. (1947) 423, 426.

[2] Mass. Adv. Sh. (1947) 539.

[Discounts Held Immaterial]

Neither was there any error on the part of the board in disregarding the "customary discounts for cash" (G. L. 64C, s. 13 [b]) allowed to the retailers by the wholesaler. It was immaterial whether those discounts appeared on the invoices given by the wholesaler to the retailers or not. They were not to be considered in reckoning costs, and need not be disclosed by the retailers to the commissioner.

[Case Not Rendered Moot]

While the matter was pending before the board, the license, which had been unlawfully suspended, expired by its own limitation. The question arises whether that fact renders the case before us moot. In Mullholland v. State Racing Commission, 295 Mass. 286, the plaintiffs, sued in equity to prevent the holding of horse racing meetings at Suffolk Downs. Pending the suit the license for the meetings expired. Rugg, C. J., said (page 289), "When, at the time of the disposition of a cause, the situation is such that the relief sought is no longer available or of any use to the plaintiffs and a decision by the court will not be applicable to existing rights, no decision will be rendered. The questions originally involved have become moot. They are not proper subjects for litigation." See also Hubrite Informal Frocks, Inc. v. Kremer, 297 Mass. 530; Henderson v. Mayor of Medford, 321 Mass. 732.[1] In the present case, however, it does not appear that the expiration of the license has made moot the questions involved in its suspension. The retailers are in business, and have been dealing in cigarettes for a number of years. They may reasonably expect that, in the absence of wrongful conduct on their part, their license will be restored. They have been awarded equitable relief in a substantial sum, based on the illegality of the suspension of their license, and there was no error of law in that award. Under these circumstances we think the questions involved in this case have not become moot. Kenworthy & Taylor, Inc. v. State Examiners of Electricians, 320 Mass. 451.

[Damages Awarded]

Because of the illegality of the suspension of the license to sell cigarettes at retail, this court on appeal awards $250 to the appellees Ryan and others, as was awarded by the Appellate Tax Board, and an order is to issue certifying said sum to the comptroller, all in accordance with G. L. c. 64C, s. 24.

So ordered.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil Action No. 36-31. July 2, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Consent Judgment—Monopoly.—A consent judgment entered in an action charging a Canadian corporation and its American subsidiary with monopolization and restraint of trade in nickel ores, nickel and nickel products requires defendants to sell, for a period of twenty years, basic nickel raw materials to producers of rolling mill products containing nickel, and to present to certain technological libraries copies of an existing manual describing methods and processes employed by the subsidiary in the production of rolling mill products.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1530.70, 1590.

For plaintiff: Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General; John F. X. McGohey, United States Attorney; Sigmund Timberg, Manuel M. Gorman, J. Francis Hayden, Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

For defendants: Sullivan & Cromwell, George C. Sharp; Isseks, Meyers & Verdon, Ernest S. Meyers.

Final Judgment

The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on May 16, 1946, and the defendants having appeared and filed their answer to such complaint denying any violation of law; and all parties hereto by their attorneys having severally consented to the entry of this final judgment herein; and the defendant The International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, a foreign corporation, having consented to accept jurisdiction of this Court solely for the purposes of this judgment;

Now THEREFORE, without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by the defendants with respect to any such issue, and before the taking of any testimony herein, and upon the consent of all the parties hereto, it is hereby

ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, as follows:

[Jurisdiction]

I

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and all the parties hereto and the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies", commonly known as the Sherman Act.

[Terms Defined]

II

When used in this final judgment, the following terms have the meanings assigned respectively to them below:

(a) "Inco Ltd." means the defendant The International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Dominion of Canada, its successors and assigns.

(b) "Inco Delaware" means the defendant The International Nickel Company, Inc., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, and any subsidiary or division of Inco Ltd. which at the time is producing rolling mill products in the United States.

(c) "Nickel-bearing materials" means nickel ores, concentrates, mattes and speisses, used or intended to be used in whole or in part for their nickel content or the production of nickel.

(d) "Rolling mill products" means rolled or extruded metallic nickel and rolled or extruded nonferrous alloys of nickel the nickel content of which is above fifty (50) per centum, in the usual commercial forms, including, but without limitation to, sheets, strips, bars, rods and tubing, and machined forgings of metallic nickel or of such alloys of nickel; and, if at the time Inco Delaware is producing and marketing in the United States any sheets, strips, bars, rods, or tubing made of metallic nickel or of alloys of nickel the nickel content of which is above fifty (50) per centum by any process employed as a substitute for rolling or extrusion, the term "rolling mill products" shall also mean such products made by such process; and if at the time Inco Delaware is producing and marketing in the United States any articles made of metallic nickel or of alloys of nickel the nickel content of which is above fifty (50) per centum which are more advanced than "rolling mill products" as above defined and which are not made from "rolling mill products" as above defined, the term "rolling mill products" shall also mean such articles; provided, however, that "rolling mill products" shall not include any cast product or any product of a kind produced primarily for use as a source of nickel, such as for remelting, dissolving or plating. For the purposes of this definition "non-ferrous alloys of nickel" means alloys which contain less than ten (10) per centum of iron; and also alloys containing ten (10) per centum or more of iron which Inco Delaware at the time is producing and marketing in the United States.

(e) "Rolling mill producer" means any person, other than Inco Delaware, engaged or about to engage in the production of rolling mill products in the United States but, except as defendants may elect otherwise, shall not include any person that is or controls, or is controlled by or is under common control with, a person engaged in the business of marketing on a commercial scale nickel-bearing material, nickel oxide or unwrought metallic nickel.

(f) "Rolling material" means (1) such kinds of unwrought metallic nickel in the usual commercial forms, including, but without being limited to, shot, ingots, cathodes, bricks, cubes and powder and (2) such kinds of nickel-copper matte or other material

(such as a nickel oxide sinter) the metal content of which is likewise predominantly of nickel, as Inco Ltd. and its other subsidiaries may at the time be providing to Inco Delaware for the production by it in the United States of rolling mill products; provided, however, that "rolling material" shall not mean any material to the extent that it is used by Inco Delaware for experimental production or for the production of a product to be further processed and primarily sold outside the United States by Inco Ltd. or any of its subsidiaries.

[Sale of Raw Materials Required]

III

Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware are hereby ordered and directed for a period of twenty years after the date of entry of this judgment:

(a) Subject to the provisions of Section IV, upon the request of rolling mill producers, to offer to sell and to sell rolling material to them for the production of rolling mill products within the United States, and for a reasonable inventory for such purpose, without any condition or restriction on the use of, sale or marketing of rolling mill products produced therefrom.

(b) To sell any rolling material sold to rolling mill producers pursuant to subparagraph (a) of this Section III at a price and other terms of sale as favorable as the prevailing current price and other terms of sale for the same kind of material then being charged by the defendants and their subsidiaries to other unaffiliated, non-governmental consumers in the United States; or if the particular kind of rolling material is not being sold on a commercial scale by the defendants and their subsidiaries to such other consumers, at a price not exceeding:

(i) if it is a sintered rolling material containing more copper than is contained in nickel oxide sinter then being sold to such other consumers as aforesaid but containing by weight substantially the same percentage of oxygen and substantially the same aggregate percentage of nickel and copper, the prevailing price per pound of nickel content then currently being charged on such sales of such nickel oxide sinter plus, per pound of copper content in excess of the approximate average amount in such nickel oxide sinter, a fair United States market price for refined copper, or

(ii) if it is some other rolling material, the prevailing price per pound of nickel content then currently being charged on sales of the most nearly comparable material to such other consumers as aforesaid, reasonably adjusted for the estimated saving or increased expense experienced by Inco Delaware in converting such rolling material into rolling mill products of a kind for which such rolling material is primarily suited, plus the market price for any additional metals of value contained, and in each such case on as favorable other terms of sale as those generally being granted by the defendants and their subsidiaries to such other consumers.

[Obligations Qualified]

IV

The obligations set forth in Section III of this final judgment shall be subject to the following:

(a) At any time when the total quantity of any kind of rolling material which Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware may decide to offer to sell for the production of rolling mill products in the United States by rolling mill producers and to deliver to Inco Delaware's plants for the production of such products, is or may be insufficient to provide both to all rolling mill producers and to Inco Delaware the full amounts which they may desire for such purpose, sub-paragraph (a) of Section III shall (in so far as the quantity which Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware are to offer to sell and to sell is concerned) be construed to require only the following: that with respect to the aforesaid total quantity of such kind of rolling material Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware shall in good faith endeavor without discrimination to share such total quantity, on the basis of relative bona fide needs for the production of rolling mill products in the United States, as between (i) the amount sold to all rolling mill producers in the aggregate pursuant to said subparagraph (a) on the one hand, and (ii) the amount delivered to Inco Delaware's plants for their own production of rolling mill products in the United States on the other hand. The determination of such relative bona fide needs may be made by Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware in advance from time to time for periods not exceeding one year. Nothing in this judgment shall affect or limit the right of Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware to determine the total quantity of rolling material and of each kind thereof which they may offer to sell for the production of rolling mill products in the United States by rolling mill producers and deliver to Inco Delaware's plants for the production of such products.

(b) Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware need not sell during any calendar year to any rolling mill producer (i) who does not notify Inco Delaware during the previous November of his desire to purchase rolling material under Section III during such year; or (ii) who does not upon request contract with Inco Delaware for such year, or if relative bona fide needs are then being determined pursuant to sub-paragraph (a) of this Section IV and are being determined for a period of less than a year then for such period, to purchase the rolling material which may be sold to him pursuant to Section III, or such part thereof as Inco Delaware may desire to have covered by contract.

(c) Deliveries of rolling material need be made only in carload shipments distributed reasonably uniformly through the year. Sales of rolling material need not be made to any rolling mill producer who does not undertake to buy for the production of rolling mill products in the United States a minimum during the calendar year of 108 short tons of nickel contained. At the election of Inco Ltd. or Inco Delaware any sale may be made by Inco Ltd. or any of its subsidiaries.

[Manual To Be Made Available to Competitors]

V

Inco Delaware is hereby ordered and directed to present to the libraries of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass., Columbia University, New York, N. Y., University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa., University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich., University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill., University of Alabama, University, Ala., Texas A. & M. College, College Station, Tex., Colorado School of Mines, Golden, Colo., California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, Calif., and University of Washington, Seattle, Wash., a copy of the written manual heretofore prepared by Inco Delaware and submitted to the Department of Justice descriptive of processes and methods used by Inco Delaware in its commercial practice as of October 1947 in the production of rolling mill products from sinter and nickel-copper matte at its Huntington, W. Va. rolling mill, and entitled

"Nickel-Copper Matte and Sinter
Processes and Methods of Producing Rolling Mill Products—October 1947
The International Nickel Company, Inc.
Huntington Works"

and to provide 300 copies of such manual to the Library of Congress of the United States.

[Sales on Condition Prohibited]

VI

Inco Ltd. and Inco Delaware and their officers, directors, agents and employees and any persons acting or claiming to act under, through or for any of them, be and they hereby are severally and jointly enjoined and restrained from selling nickel-bearing materials or rolling material to any producer of nickel-bearing materials or rolling material on the express or implied condition that such producer shall not import all or any part of its production of nickel-bearing materials, of rolling material or of rolling mill products into the United States, its territories or possessions, or selling rolling material to any producer of rolling mill products on the express or implied condition that such producer shall not import rolling mill products produced by it into the United States, its territories or possessions. This Section VI shall not be deemed to adjudicate or determine the legality or illegality of nor shall it apply to agreements, undertakings or understandings between Inco Ltd. and any of its subsidiaries or between any such subsidiaries.

[Inspection to Secure Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General, and on reasonable notice to the defendants, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege (1) access, during the office hours of Inco Delaware, to all its books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other of its records and documents in its possession or under its control relating to any matters contained in this judgment; (2) access at reasonable times to such records and documents of Inco Ltd. as may be then located in the United States in the possession or under the control of Inco Ltd. relating to any matters contained in this judgment; and (3) subject to the reasonable convenience of the defendants and without restraint or interference from them, to interview such of their officers or employees as may be in the United States, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters; and upon such request the defendants shall submit such reports in writing with respect to the provisions of Sections III, IV and VI of this judgment as might from time to time be reasonably necessary to the enforcement of this judgment; provided, however, that no information obtained by the means provided in this Section shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of such Department except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States is a party for the purpose of enforcing or securing compliance within this judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

[Acts Not Violative of Judgment]

VIII

None of the defendants, their officers, directors, agents or any persons acting or claiming to act under, through or for any of them shall be in contempt of this judgment for doing anything outside the United States which is required, or for not doing anything outside the United States which is unlawful, under the laws of the government of the dominion, province, country or state in which Inco Ltd. or any of its subsidiaries may be incorporated or chartered or in the territory of which Inco Ltd. or any such subsidiaries may be doing business. In any such case Inco Ltd. shall advise the plaintiff thereof as promptly as is practicable and thereupon the plaintiff may apply to this Court, with full opportunity to the defendants to be heard, for such relief consistent with the provisions of this judgment as the Court may deem appropriate.

[Vacation of Judgment]

IX

This Court shall enter an order dismissing the complaint herein and vacating this judgment in its entirety upon the petition of the plaintiff (a) at any time after January 1, 1957, or (b) at any time after the obligations of the defendants under Section III shall have become inoperative by reason of the fact that Inco Delaware is not using rolling material provided by Inco Ltd. or its other subsidiaries for the production of rolling mill products in the United States; and in any new proceeding instituted by the plaintiff under the Sherman Act after the entry of any such order this judgment shall not be deemed a bar to the granting of appropriate relief or to the defendants' interposing any defense other than that such relief is barred by this judgment.

Without limiting the provisions of Section X hereof, Inco Ltd. or Inco Delaware shall be entitled to have Sections III and IV hereof vacated upon a showing to the Court upon 30 days' notice to the Attorney General that Inco Ltd. and its subsidiaries in the sale of rolling material are in substantial competition with nickel containing material produced by others and either sold in the United States or sold for use in the United States, provided that an application for such purpose shall not be made oftener than once every two years.

X

Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling only the Attorney General or Inco Ltd. or Inco Delaware to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment; for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof (and in the event any laws, requirements or requests of any government or governmental body make observance of this judgment unduly burdensome or are inconsistent with the terms of this judgment the right of the defendants to apply for such relief as the Court may deem appropriate is hereby expressly recognized); and for the enforcement of compliance with this judgment, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil 43-539. July 13, 1948.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Professional Baseball—No Interstate Commerce—Motion to Dismiss Complaint Granted.—Professional baseball leagues whose member teams cross state lines to play games are not engaged in such interstate trade or commerce as to be subject to the prohibitions of the antitrust laws. The transportation across state lines is merely incidental to the playing of the game.

See the Sherman Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 1021.582.

For plaintiff: Frederic A. Johnson.

For defendants: Willkie Owen Farr Gallagher & Walton; Baker, Hostetler & Atterson; Hedges, Hoover & Tingley; Edgar P. Feeley.

GODDARD, D. J.: This is a motion to dismiss the action for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted and for want of jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action, for lack of diversity of citizenship of the parties.

The plaintiff was employed as a baseball player in the 1944 and 1945 season by National Exhibition Company, the owner of the New York Giants. The defendants are Albert B. Chandler, individually and as Commissioner of Baseball, Ford C. Frick, individually and as President of the National League of Professional Baseball Clubs, an unincorporated voluntary association, William Harridge, individually and as President of the American League of Professional Baseball Clubs, a voluntary unincorporated association, George M. Trautman, individually and as President of the National Association of Professional Baseball Leagues, a voluntary unincorporated association, and National Exhibition Company, owner of the New York Giants of the National League.

Plaintiff is a resident of New York. The residence and citizenship of the defendants are not alleged, except that defendant, National Exhibition Company, is alleged to be a New York corporation, with its principal office and place of business in New York City.

The complaint seeks to recover treble damages under various sections of the Sherman and Clayton Anti-Trust Acts, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 3, 13 and 14, and is based solely on alleged violations of these sections of the anti-trust Act and contains three causes of action.

In his First cause of action the plaintiff in substance alleges that these defendants have entered into a conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. It further alleges that after the National and the American Leagues were organized, these two leagues on February 3, 1945 entered into a new agreement called the Major League Agreement. This agreement created the office of Commissioner of Baseball, which post is now and the times referred to held by defendant, Chandler; that the Major League Agreement was intended to vest and did vest in the Commissioner disciplinary power over all players and officials in Major League Baseball; that subsequently on December 7, 1946 the National League and the American League entered into an agreement with the National Association of Baseball League[s] [the Minor Leagues] whereby the Minor Leagues recognized the office and power of the Commissioner as it exists under the Major League Agreement; the Major League Agreement and the Major-Minor Leagues Agreement and the rules adopted in accordance therewith forbid any other than a standard or uniform contract to be entered into between club and player; this standard form contract contains a provision [hereinafter referred to as the "reserve clause"] whereby the player in signing his contract for the ensuing season or seasons agrees not to sign a contract with or play for any club at the expiration of the period of the contract, other than with or for the club or its assignee, which employs him; this contract also subjects the parties to the interrelated agreements as to the disciplinary power of the Commissioner; the plaintiff then alleges the various grades of leagues and sets forth the teams and their owners comprising the National League and alleges that each of these teams have a home field in the city they represent; that each engage in schedule games for which they charge an admission price; that each club plays seventy-seven games at home and eleven games on the home grounds of its rivals; that in travelling from state to state each club causes to be transported at its own expense the necessary equipment to play the games. The complaint further states that the National League receives part of the proceeds of each game as do the two contesting teams; that in order to complete the schedule state lines are regularly and systematically crossed; that radio broadcasts of the game are given and this right to broadcast the game is a valuable right which the clubs sell to various manufacturers for the purpose of advertising their products; that a baseball club can be and is used as a means of advertising by manufacturers; that with the exception that the Washington team of the American League is in the District of Columbia, the American League and its teams operate the same as the National League teams; that there exists an "All Star" game and "World Series," for which broadcast and television rights are sold for substantial amounts; that radio, television, newspaper publicity and other avenues of communication, as well as the necessary purchase of equipment by the Leagues and Clubs, cause them to be engaged in interstate commerce; that the Minor League Clubs of the International League and the Jersey City Club of this League extends into Canada; that the Commissioner's power extends into Canada, Porto Rico, Cuba, Mexico; and includes the power of the Commissioner to suspend player, coach or manager under certain conditions and for certain violations; that the plaintiff was suspended by the Commissioner for five years; that such suspension deprives the plaintiff of his means of livelihood as a professional player; that such continued suspension will destroy plaintiff's playing ability; that plaintiff's suspension was due to his violation of the provisions of the Major League Agreement and in particular of the "reserve clause"; that this "reserve clause" establishes the Commissioner as the final umpire of a salary dispute between player and club; that the plaintiff in disregard of the "reserve clause" played for a professional team, not recognized by Organized Baseball, in Mexico for the season of 1946; that the purpose of the "reserve clause" was to prevent wealthier clubs from buying up all the best talent and to equalize the power of the clubs; that this purpose has not been fulfilled by the use of the "reserve clause" as is evidenced by the continued success of certain teams; that this success has not hurt the drawing power of the game; that the validity of the "reserve clause" has not been litigated between club and player unless the player was an unique performer and was granted an opportunity to play for the club enforcing the provision; that plaintiff was not paid a salary commensurate with an unique performer and defendant New York Giant's representatives have not retracted statements that plaintiff was a secondary player; that in previous baseball wars the ineligibility of Major League players was customarily removed after they had disregarded the "reserve clause" by playing with teams not recognized by Organized Baseball; that representatives of the National Exhibition Company have contributed to the plaintiff's suspension; that the Jersey City Club of the International League is owned and controlled by the National Exhibition Company and the representatives of other minor league "farms" have contributed to plaintiff's suspension; that all the above allegations create a conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states and with foreign nations contrary to Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

The Second cause of action alleges that these same facts constitute a violation of Section 3 of the Sherman Act and Section 14 of the Clayton Act.

The Third cause of action contains all the allegations of the First cause of action and adds allegations of the "farm system" and how minors sign these contracts and cannot disavow them upon reaching majority; and how the clubs buy and sell this talent under controlled prices created by the agreements heretofore mentioned; and how this "reserve clause" is used as a means of fostering and maintaining monopolies in trade or commerce among the several states and foreign nations in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act and Section 13 of the Clayton Act.

The plaintiff alleges these acts have damaged him to the extent of One Hundred Thousand [$100,000] Dollars.

The defendants' contention is that neither they nor the plaintiff are engaged in "trade" or "commerce" among the several states within the meaning of the Sections of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

This precise question, namely—whether the Big League ball clubs as they operated then, were engaged in "trade" or "commerce" within the Sherman Act, was passed upon by the Supreme Court in Federal Baseball Club v. National League, 259 U. S. 200, which held on the record before it, that National League ball clubs were not engaged in interstate "trade" or "commerce" as that language was used in the Sherman Act.

With the exception of the introduction of national advertising upon the radio and television broadcasts of baseball games today, the facts as to the manner and method of operation at the time of the Federal Baseball Club case are substantially the same as are presented in the case at bar.

In the Federal Baseball Club case the Supreme Court relied heavily, if not entirely, on Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648 which in turn relied primarily upon Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 168, holding that the business of insurance is not commerce. In the Hooper case the question was whether an insurance company using some instrumentalities of commerce in effecting a marine insurance policy was engaged in interstate commerce. The court held that it was not engaged in interstate commerce and made the distinction between "interstate commerce, or an instrumentality thereof, on the one side, and the mere incidents which may attend the carrying on such commerce on the other." The authority of Hooper v. California and Paul v. Virginia on the question of "commerce" under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act has been substantially lessened if not completely overruled by United States v. Underwriters Association, 322 U. S. 553, which held that an insurance company which conducts a substantial part of its business across state lines is engaged in "commerce among the several states" and is subject to the provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. United States v. Underwriters Association held that the decisions in Paul v. Virginia and cases following it are inconsistent with the more recent opinions of the court as to the coverage of the Sherman Act. So it is quite possible that the Supreme Court may not adhere to its earlier decision in the Federal Baseball Club v. National League case. However, the Circuit Court of Appeals for this Circuit only recently in Conley v. San Carlo Opera Co., 163 F. (2d) 310, 311, reaffirmed the controlling authority of the Federal Baseball Club case where the facts are substantially similar.

Notwithstanding that there seems to me to be a clear trend toward a broader conception of what constitutes interstate commerce than formerly in view of the expanding and changing conditions since the decision in the Federal Baseball Club case, I feel that as the Circuit Court of Appeals of this Circuit regards Federal Baseball Club v. National League as authority, this court must do so.

The motion to dismiss the complaint is granted.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of South Carolina, Greenville Division. C. A. No. 792. July 9, 1948.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Motion to Strike—Materiality of Allegations—No Direct Injury to Plaintiff.—A complaint setting forth a private cause of action for damages and injunctive relief arising from an alleged conspiracy in violation of the Clayton Act is restricted to antitrust violations which directly injure the plaintiff. In an action brought by a theatre operator against motion picture producers and distributors, allegations as to the institution and determination of antitrust suits brought by the Government against the defendants, references to alleged restraints in the production of motion pictures, and allegations of defendants' unlawful conduct towards other exhibitors, which conduct was not alleged to have been employed against plaintiff, are ordered stricken from the complaint.

See the Clayton Act annotations, Vol. 1, ¶ 2036.

For plaintiffs: Kendrick & Stephenson, and Haynsworth & Haynsworth, Greenville, South Carolina; George S. Ryan, Boston, Massachusetts.

For defendants: Wyche, Burgess & Wofford, Greenville, South Carolina; Donald Russell, Spartanburg, South Carolina; M. G. McDonald, Greenwood, South Carolina; Brooks, McLendon, Brim & Holderness, Greensboro, North Carolina.

[Motion to Strike]

The defendants move this Court to strike from the complaint certain specified allegations as irrelevant, immaterial and reptitious.

In considering such motion, it is proper to bear in mind the plain admonition of Rule 8 (a) (2) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, which enjoins the limitation of pleadings to a "short" and "plain" statement of a party's claim. Mindful of the object of this admonition and under the authority of Rule 12 (f), Courts should, in the interest of orderly procedure and clarity, strike from a pleading matter which is "verbose, repetitious, superfluous or foreign to the issue". This we held generally in McNorrill v. Gibbs (D. C. S. C. 1942) 45 F. Supp. 363, at p. 364.
